BY LOUISE S. DORR.

"WAITING and waiting. That is a woman's portion. God grant me patience." So thought and prayed Irene Kent, walking home from the post-office, with an anxious, troubled look upon her face, where the keen wintry air was mixing purple with its accustomed pink. The face was that of a woman about twenty-eight years old. It was not pretty, but sensible-looking, and capable of lighting up into something better than mere prettiness. Irene Kent was of medium height, straight and slender in figure, quick of motion, as her rapid walking indicated, and neatly though plainly dressed. So much for externals. In character she was shy and proud, not always self-possessed; self-reliant, rather through circumstances which had forced her to become so than naturally; strong, because she must be, but with a capacity for vine-like clinging which few would have suspected; positive in her opinions—"as set as the hills" her sister Rosamond called her; high-principled, generous, but not always patient, though she tried hard to become so. Such was one of the two women. Her work was that of a writer, and the waiting which fretted her now was for the money which her last story ought to bring her. The expense of her own and Rosamond's fall clothing, modest as was the outlay, had drained her purse, and she needed money sorely. Then her daily morning walk to the post-office consumed valuable time, which she could ill afford to spare. The distance, in going and coming, was nearly three miles, and the time thus spent broke in sharply upon the short wintry forenoon. Rosamond might have gone, but she was less strong physically than her sister; and did not bear long walks so well. There was, moreover, another reason why Irene preferred going for herself: Ulfred Bellair was that reason. She had cause for believing that Rosamond never went into the village without meeting this young man. It was one of Irene's trials that her gay, pretty sister had formed his acquaintance.

Rosamond was four years younger than Irene, but she looked at least ten years younger. She had a childish prettiness of face, and a naive simplicity of manner, such as induce forgetfulness of birthday reckonings. Gay, and sprightly, and affectionate she was; but she was also vain, and wilful, and a trifle insincere. She had promised to give up her intimacy with Bellair, for into that the acquaintance had grown, but Irene feared that Rosamond still retained a secret fondness for him in her heart.

Ulfred Bellair was a year or two younger than Rosamond Kent. He had dark curling hair, a full, fair, red-cheeked face, thick lips under a jetty moustache, a retreating chin, a short, thick neck, and a stout figure, which, if not dressed in the extreme of elegance, might have had an appearance of clumsiness. Some people, mostly very young ladies, in consideration of his pink cheeks and curling hair, called him handsome; but, with those who looked for intelligence and strength in a man's face, his could scarcely have found favor.

Though not of kindred blood, there was a loose sort of family connection between this young man and the Kent girls. The father of the former and the mother of the latter had grown up together in the same house; the one the daughter of Mrs. Bellair, the other the son of her husband. When the young people became of suitable age, their parents proposed to marry them. Barkis was "willin'," and so was Frederick Bellair, but Amy Hollis was not. She preferred George Kent, an intelligent mechanic, whom her worldly-minded mother hated. Amy, who had inherited the will, if not the prudence of her parent, adhered to her choice, and married George Kent, thus incurring the lasting resentment of Mrs. Bellair, who, from that time, knew no other child than her husband's son.

After Mrs. Kent's death, Irene and Rosamond went once to visit Mrs. Bellair, in accordance with a promise their mother had exacted on her death-bed. This visit they had no inclination to repeat. The stern dame assured them that Ulfred Bellair was the only grandchild of whom she had any knowledge, and that, if it was money they were after, she had none to bestow upon strangers.

"We do not want your money," said Irene, proudly, "and something better than money we can offer you—the Christian virtue of forgiveness for the insult you have given us." Thereupon, with an air as lofty as the dame's own, she left the house, her manner, and, perhaps, her spirit, less forgiving than her words.

About this time an old friend of their father offered the girls a cottage near the village of Hillsborough at a merely nominal rent. They accordingly decided to make that their residence. Soon afterward Ulfred Bellair found out the pretty Rosamond, and contrived to open an acquaintance with her, by which she was greatly pleased and flattered. Irene, however, had the penetration to see that the young man's principles and habits were not such as to make him a desirable acquaintance, and she set her face like a flint against him. At first Rosamond resented her sister's remonstrances, but afterward she seemed to acquiesce, and promised to give up the acquaintance. Nevertheless, Irene feared that the promise was not quite given in good faith, and she was far from feeling at ease about it.

"God grant me patience." This was often enough the burden of her prayer, as it was while returning home this morning. Her rapid walking soon brought her to the cottage. Rosamond she found in the kitchen washing the breakfast dishes. It occurred to Irene that she had left her at the same employment when she went out.

"I thought you would have your work all done," said the latter, standing in the door between the kitchen and sitting-room.

"I wasn't in any hurry," answered Rosamond, curtly, her face reddening with no visible cause.

"No, there was no need of that, I suppose, and you haven't hurried, it appears," the other remarked, turning away as she spoke. Crossing to the sitting-room closet to put away her shawl and hood, she stepped upon something lying in her way, and stooped to pick it up. It was the end of a cigar. Instantly it flashed upon her that Ulfred Bellair had been there during her absence. He was Rosamond's reason for not hurrying about her work, and for changing color when taxed with her tardiness. "Rosamond, where did this come from?" she demanded, displaying what she had found.

"What is it? I don't know. Somebody dropped it, I suppose. I don't smoke cigars, so you need not try to make me responsible for it," replied Rosamond.

"There are other ways in which you might be responsible for it. Do you not know who dropped it?"

"No," but her voice wavered upon the monosyllable, and Irene knew that it was not the truth.

"Ulfred Bellair has been here," the latter affirmed, quite positively.

"Well, what of it if he has?" said Rosamond, sulkily.

"But you promised me!"—

"Now, Irene, don't. I know what ails you. You did not get any letter, and have come home cross. Do, for goodness' sake, put off your lecture until you are better natured."

Irene turned away without a word. There was some truth, she knew, in Rosamond's assertion. She would have given much for a better power of self-mastery; but, with her peculiar temperament, and so many things working against her, it was impossible that the friction should not fret her soul. "It is worry, not work, that kills," says Beecher, not, perhaps, in these very words, but in similar language. There is undoubtedly a great deal of truth in the saying. No one would sooner have admitted this than Irene Kent. But how is an impatient, sensitive spirit to refrain from worrying? That was the question, and a serious one it was to her.

She went to her writing-desk now, and tried to concentrate herself upon her work. All the morning's trials came between her and her subject. The people of her story she seemed to see as through a glass darkly. It was difficult taking any interest in them or their movements. A certain amount of work, however, she must accomplish within the day; but the effort was doubly exhaustive from the trouble she had in fixing her mind upon it, and, when she read over what she had written, she felt that there was a heaviness of style and conception, betraying the effort by which it had been produced. "She must try to lighten it up a little in copying," she thought, as she put away her papers, and then sat down in her comfortable rocking-chair, with folded arms, and an attitude indicating utter weariness and listlessness.

Rosamond, meanwhile, had recovered from her sulkiness of the morning, and was singing at her work, which was at present that of preparing the evening meal. She had a sweet, clear voice, and sang very well. Irene listened. The song was all about a "lover," and "I'll never forget thee, no, never," and "Naught shall our spirits dis sever," and "Love's fetters golden by Cupid's art molder," and so on. Irene had never heard it before, and she fancied that Rosamond must have learned it from Bellair. Suddenly, at the sound of a sharp whistle outside, the singing ceased. The next moment Irene heard the outer door open and close softly. She hastened into the next room, whose windows overlooked the street. Rosamond was just passing out at the front gate. She ran down the road as far as the corner of the yard inclosing the cottage, where Bellair sat in a sleigh waiting for her. Stung with indignation, and scarcely knowing what she did, Irene ran after her sister.

"Mr. Bellair," said Miss Kent, without stopping to choose her words, "if you have anything to say to my sister, I prefer that you should come to the house, gentleman-like. I do not approve of clandestine proceedings, and no gentleman would stoop to such."

"Most happy to oblige you, but I'm in too great a hurry, this time," returned the young man, with easy insolence. "Maybe when I'm more at leisure I can get you to give me a few lessons on gentlemanly conduct."

"The task would not be at all to my liking."

"Unfortunate for me—that is—blamed if it isn't. Well, Rosamond, I must tear myself away. Good-night."

He drove off thereupon, and the two girls re-entered the house, both in a very uncomfortable mood, and Rosamond in tears. Irene, however, felt little compassion for her sister's grief.

"What am I to think your promises worth if this is the way you keep them?" she questioned, rather severely.

"I am not a child, and you have no right to exact promises from me," retorted Rosamond.

"No, you are not a child, Rosie," said Irene, more kindly, "but if I saw you walking blindfold into the fire, would you not think I had a right to put out my hand to save you?"

"Stuff! I can't see why you are making all this fuss just because a young man happens to be civil to me. Yesterday when you came back from the office, I saw you out here in the road talking to Mr. Symonds, 'a respectable widower, who, like Cælebs, was in search of a wife.' If it ever happens again, I'll run out and send him off, see if I don't," and in spite of her vexation she laughed gayly at having turned the tables upon Irene so nicely.

There was no use in prolonging the discussion after this, and it was abandoned.

That night Irene formed the desperate resolve of taking Mrs. Bellair into her confidence. That stately dame, she knew, would feel towering indignation at the possibility of her grandson's forming an alliance with one of her cast-off granddaughters. Perhaps her authority, backed up by the consideration of self-interest, might have some weight with the young man. The following morning, therefore, after calling at the post-office—she had got her letter this time—Irene went straight on to the Bellair mansion. This was an imposing place, massy, and gloomy, and grand. Irene grew faint-hearted and tremulous as she ascended the steps, but with a strong effort she summoned back her fitting courage, and rang the bell. An elderly woman-servant, prim and grim enough to suit the place and its mistress, gave admission to the visitor, and led the way to a drawing-room, where, stately, in black satin and glossy linen, Mrs. Bellair was engaged with her solicitor. That gentleman—Mr. Southmore—rose, however, at Irene's entrance, and bowed himself out. Mrs. Bellair acknowledged the new-comer's presence by a nod frozen enough to have come direct from the regions where icebergs are manufactured, and waited for her to state her errand. Irene came to the point with nervous abruptness.

"Your grandson annoys me by coming to see my sister. Can you make him stay away?" she spoke out in a breaking voice.

Mrs. Bellair put on her glasses and peered sharply at the flushed face and erect figure of the woman standing before her.

"Why should my grandson's visits annoy you?" demanded the dame in measured tones. "Upon what grounds do you object to Mr. Ulfrid Bellair?"

Irene was on the point of avowing that she objected to his morals and habits, but she recollected that such a statement might injure him with the woman she was addressing. She was not vindictive, and had no wish to come between him and his expectations of inheriting the Bellair property.

"I do not choose to give my reasons for objecting to him?" she replied, after a momentary hesitation.

"Perhaps you wanted to do me a favor by apprising me that my grandson is forming objectionable acquaintances."

"No," said Irene, with changing color, "that consideration did not influence me."

"Your sister, I believe, is quite pretty. I have heard one of the Miss Kent's spoken of as 'the pretty one.' I wonder you did not choose rather to trust to her entanglement of the young man, than to your enlightenment of the old woman."

"Madam," said Irene, drawing herself up proudly, and looking at least three inches taller than ordinarily, "all that I ask, either from the young man or from the old woman, is that we may be let alone."

"You shall be," affirmed Mrs. Bellair, with a haughty nod.

"Thank you, and good-morning," said the other, giving back nod for nod, haughtiness for haughtiness; and thus the interview ended.

In the hall, as she was going out, Irene again met Mr. Southmore, who lifted his hat to her in passing. A genial looking man was this, with soft lights in his gray eyes, and something kindly and sincere in the whole expression of his face. Irene felt this so strongly that she half wished she had some excuse for speaking to him, having an unaccountable impression that there would be friendliness and protection in the very sound of his voice. This feeling passed with the moment, however.

"Irene Kent, don't make a fool of yourself. Your business is to write romances, not live them. You are old enough to know better than to fancy a friend and a hero in every man of gentlemanly appearance whom you meet. So, if you please, no more of that folly."

The reproof was doubtless effectual, for the next moment her folly was forgotten in the consideration of weightier subjects.

A month passed, and she saw no more of Ulfred Bellair. Her last step had been a decisive one, she thought, with inward congratulation. At first Rosamond was restless, ungracious, and hard to please, but her elder sister strove mightily for patience and forbearance that, as far as possible, she might make up in her own person for the loss of Bellair. Her efforts seemed to be well rewarded, for it was not long before Rosamond got back her old cheerfulness. Irene assured herself that the hurt was not so deep as she had feared it might be.

One day about this time—it was a clear, sparkling morning in January, with a white rime, bringing out in delicate tracery bare trees and shrubbery, and making of the whole landscape a glittering, beautiful piece of frostwork—Rosamond came into the room where Irene sat at her writing, hooded and cloaked for going out.

"Where is this marvellous morning tempting you, Rosie?" Irene asked, looking up from her work.

"I'm going down to Carrie Blaisdell's. She has promised to teach me that new stitch in crochet."

"I should like to go with you if I could spare the time. You had better go to the office while you are out."

This Rosamond promised, and went on her way, the frosty air stimulating a rich color in her pretty face, and some inner feeling lending a lustrous brilliancy to her eyes.

Irene resumed her writing, at which she worked steadily for an hour or more. Then, pausing for a moment, she wondered why Rosamond did not come, and looked down the street if she were in sight. No, but some one was coming in a sleigh—Mr. Southmore, Irene soon perceived, and was greatly surprised by his stopping at the cottage-gate. He knocked presently, and she went to the door.

"You are Miss Kent, I believe," said the gentleman, in mellow, friendly tones.

"Yes," assented Irene.

"Do not alarm yourself, I beg, but there has been a slight accident. It is nothing serious, I assure you."

"Something has happened to Rosamond!" cried the frightened sister.

"Your sister is quite safe now, but she has been in some danger. She was riding on the ice with young Bellair, when the horses took fright at something, and became unmanageable. There is an open place in the river, and at that very point your sister was thrown out, and, I am sorry to say, got very wet."

"Where is she now?"

"At Mrs. Blaisdell's, waiting for you to bring her some dry clothing. Her friends would have been happy to supply her; but Miss Carrie's dresses would fit Miss Rosamond about like a doll's, and Mrs. Blaisdell's very much like those of the fat woman of Brentford."

Irene smiled at this, in spite of her alarm and regret. The half-jesting tone of the communication was assumed, she knew, to set her mind at ease, and she felt grateful in spirit for the friendliness of the messenger. "I will be ready in a moment," she said.

Literally it was scarcely longer than that before she came out to the sleigh, where Mr. Southmore stood waiting for her. Her dress, however, showed no signs of hurry or carelessness, and she had forgotten nothing that Rosamond would need, the bundle being packed in a travelling-basket, which she carried on one arm.

"When a woman tells me 'in a moment,' I always prepare myself for a good hour's waiting," said Mr. Southmore, as he handed Miss Kent into the sleigh, "but you seem to reckon time by a different system."

"Most women can be prompt when there is urgent need," replied Irene.

"You are loyal to your sex, I see, and do not mean to take credit for exceptional excellence."

"Do you mean that for a compliment? If you do, I suppose I ought to thank you."

"Can you not tell whether it has the ring of one or not?"

"I believe I shall not take the trouble to test it. You have not told me yet by whom Rosamond was rescued."

"I had that pleasure. It was nothing, bless you. There were a dozen rushing to the spot who would have done it quite as well, if I had not been ahead."

"You may make light of it, if you please, but it is no light thing to me that you have saved my sister. If words could thank you"—

"I would rather you should use your words for any other purpose, even if it were for railing at me."

"I am not likely to do that, but I will not burden you with the expression of gratitude against your wish. Did the other—did Mr. Bellair receive any injury?"

"He clung to the reins after being thrown out, and was dragged some distance on the ice. He was considerably bruised, I believe, but not seriously injured."

They talked further about the accident, but we do not care for minuter details. A drive of about ten minutes brought them to Mrs. Blaisdell's.

Rosamond, wrapped in warm blankets, was lying in bed. She put up her hands in a beseeching attitude when Irene came in. "You'll not scold me, will you, Renie?" she said, imploringly.

Irene bent down to kiss the pretty, pale face, then turned away, sobbing.

"Don't cry, Renie," entreated Rosamond, in a coaxing voice. "I want you to sit here where I can see your face," she added, presently. "I thought once to-day I should never see it again. I did not know what a dear face it was until then. Renie, I've given up Fred now for good. If he had been sober to-day, the accident wouldn't have happened. And we might both have been killed! Only think! I never want to set eyes on him again."

"Thank God that your eyes are opened at last," Irene returned, with a swelling, grateful heart.

Rosamond soon got up and dressed herself, protesting that "she did not like the role of a naughty child, punished by being sent to bed." She did not seem much the worse for her sudden plunge into the water. An hour or two later Mr. Southmore came to drive the sisters home. He had told Irene that he would, and she had accepted his offer gratefully. She was already beginning to feel toward him as if he were a friend of long standing.

The next day Mrs. Bellair's solicitor surprised her by speaking out boldly in favor of her granddaughters. "Either of those girls is worth a dozen of Bellair," he averred, warmly.

"Are you thinking of marrying one of them?" asked the old lady, suspiciously.

"A man might go farther and fare worse," the other declared, coolly.

"That is, if he could get Ulfred ousted, and them taken into favor."

"Good heavens, madam!" retorted the lawyer, with rising heat, "can't a man speak a word to their nearest relative for two of the bravest and truest women in the world without being suspected of mercenary motives?"

"They may be the bravest and truest women in the world, but they are nothing to me. You say either of them is worth a dozen of Ulfred. I suppose you mean to hint that my grandson is a little wild. Most boys of his age are, and they do not make the worse men for it. That is a pretty ugly looking bugbear which you trotted out to scare me with, Mr. Southmore, but you see it won't bite."

The lawyer did not attempt to trot out his "bugbear" again, but left it to hibernate in peace. He did not lose sight, however, of the Kent girls, calling often at the cottage of an evening.

Irene was quick to discover that he was getting strongly interested in Rosamond. Of her sister's feeling for him she could form no conjecture. Sometimes the capricious girl treated her admirer with marked cordiality, sometimes with chilling reserve. This might have been from liking or from coquetry; Irene could not determine which it was. When inclined to believe that the former was the controlling power, she felt that she ought to be grateful and happy; for, if Rosamond liked Mr. Southmore, Ulfred Bellair was undoubtedly forgotten, and her happiness secure. Duty was a strong word with Irene. What ought to be, in her own character, at least, she tried vigorously to effect, not always successfully, but with commendable sincerity of purpose. So, when she had assured herself that she ought to be happy because Rosamond had won Mr. Southmore for a lover, she straightway determined that she would be. She so planned her work, however, that she had little leisure for considering her own emotions, and in her heart she blessed God that she had such work at hand. She was getting better pay now than ever before for her stories, and her courage was proportionally greater. Then her bugbear, Ulfred Bellair, troubled her no more. Surely her life was full of mercies, and why should she not be the happiest of the happy? The resolution which Rosamond had made in full sincerity Irene believed her to have kept religiously, but she had something yet to learn of the power of that infatuation so often misnamed love.

And here let me stop to air a little opinion of my own. I believe that there is more nonsense written, sung, said, and believed on the subject of love than any other under the sun. Young girls—and older ones, sometimes—become possessed of the idea that a lover is the grand desideratum of life; and, when they have one, they straightway set about working up their sentiments for him after the model furnished by the Mauds and Lidas, the Stellas and Gertrudes, with whom their reading of stories has made them acquainted. Of course, constancy is always a strong point with these heroines, and constant they must be. No matter what the faults and deficiencies of their lover, either of temper, or morals, or intellect, they must adhere to him "through thick and thin." Empty and vacant lives give them little else to do, but to glorify themselves through devotion to their appointed hero, of whom they learn too late that he is as little a hero as a chipmunk is a lion. They sow the wind only to reap the whirlwind. Of course, this onslaught against the "tender passion" is only directed against those cases to which it will apply, but they unfortunately are too numerous.

"I tell you love has naught to do With meetness nor unmeetness," forcibly declares Whittier's farmer—a truism, doubtless, from which, however, spring multitudes of unhappy marriages.

When Rosamond formed the resolution of giving up Bellair, she was perfectly sincere in her intention of doing so; but she had been so long in the habit of occupying herself with devising plans for meeting him secretly—displaying in that an address of which few would have believed her capable, so open and ingenuous did she appear—that, like Othello's, her occupation was now gone. It became necessary, therefore, to adopt another, and she chose that of making excuses for her lover. "Suppose that, for once, he had taken a glass too much, it was not the unpardonable sin. She doubted not that he was sorry enough for it afterward, and very likely he would never do so again. A great many men, on rare occasions, had so indulged themselves, and had made none the worse husbands and citizens for it. Forgiveness was a cardinal virtue, and charity should cover a multitude of sins." Just as she had reached this pious frame of mind, there came about an accidental meeting, at which Bellair struck the notes of protestation, reproach, penitence, his own need of her, with a running chord of endearments tinkling through the whole, and, presto! change, the work was done. Their stolen interviews were renewed with greater care than formerly, that no accident might lead to betrayal; and, having overleaped its impediment thus triumphantly, the course of their true love flowed smoothly on once more. Perhaps Rosamond had some compunctions of conscience for deceiving her sister, but Irene, she argued, had no right to dictate to her in such a matter. She was old enough to choose for herself. It was her affair wholly, and one in which no one had a right to meddle.

Mr. Southmore, meanwhile, was growing anxious. He could get no satisfactory answer from Rosamond. "Do you like me any?" he asked of her one day.

"Like you? To be sure I do. I think you are a darling, 'somebody's darling,' I mean."

"Yours, I hope."

"Goodness, no! What should I do with you?"

"You might marry me."

"And reduce you to the point of desperation in six weeks afterward by quarrelling with you every minute. The prospect looks enticing, but you must give me an indefinite space of time for considering it." Off she ran at this, leaving him to wonder at his leisure whether his suit was in a prosperous condition or not.

Irene often wondered over the same thing. Something restrained her from speaking to Rosamond about it, and the latter gave her sister no confidences. So all through the spring and summer Irene—and Mr. Southmore, too—was kept in a state of uncertainty. But early in the following autumn the former got her eyes opened. Having stepped into a jeweller's one day to get her watch repaired, she saw Ulfred Bellair buying a handsome diamond ring. Before completing his purchase, the young man was called out for a moment by one of his cronies, and the jeweller, who had some pride in the gems he was selling, showed the ring to Miss Kent. It contained two fine diamonds and a turquoise in a peculiar claw-like setting.

Some time afterward Irene had a restless night; and, finding it impossible to sleep, sat up in bed with a shawl thrown around her, lighted her lamp, and began writing out some haunting sentences supplementary to the day's work. While stopping to recall a phrase, which, now that it was wanted, had chosen to affect shyness, and hide itself in a corner, she discovered something flame-like glittering outside Rosamond's nightgown. After the first start, Irene stooped down to examine it. It was Ulfred Bellair's ring, hung by a ribbon around her sleeping sister's neck. The whole story was out now. Irene was tried beyond measure, and sorely disheartened likewise. She wrote no more that night, but blew out her light, and lay back upon her pillow to think what she ought to do. To try remonstrance again she knew would be quite useless, and she had lost faith in Rosamond's promises. She could think of only one thing that gave her any hope. That was a change of residence. It would involve considerable expense, which she could ill afford, but she believed it necessary, and before morning her plans were all arranged. They would go to Boston. Irene knew the head girl at a fur dealer's there, and through her Rosamond, she thought, might get fur to sew. They could make up in that way the greater cost of rent, and she had money enough on hand to pay the expense of removal.

She lost no time in carrying out her plan. To Rosamond she assumed that she desired the change on her own account. She needed the more varied experiences, the greater scope for observation, the larger culture, the fuller clash of mind with mind which city life affords. This she said to Rosamond, who acquiesced, though at first rather unwillingly, but afterward she grew more eager for the change than Irene even.

Before they went Mr. Southmore tried once more to get a decisive answer from Rosamond; but she put him off with teasing raillery, which left him no wiser than at the beginning of the interview. I cannot account for her treatment of this man otherwise than by supposing that she had some latent doubts of Bellair's constancy, and meant, if he failed her, to accept Southmore.

The middle of October found the sisters established in a couple of cheap rooms in a quiet street in Boston. Irene's friend at the fur dealer's had not failed her, and Rosamond found remunerative employment. Though removed from Bellair, she did not mope nor sulk; but, on the contrary, was gayer than ever before, and her sister took heart again, believing that Rosamond would soon get the better of her infatuation.

Except the friend who has been mentioned, they knew no one in Boston. Irene did not wish to make other acquaintances, but Rosamond had always a surprising facility in forming friendships. It was not long before she was hand in glove with a young lady living on the same street. This was Mabel Cheswick, who seemed to be something of a madcap, but pleasant and companionable. Irene was glad her sister had found so entertaining an acquaintance, since she herself was almost constantly occupied with her work.

"I'm going into Mabel's a little while this evening," Rosamond soon got a habit of saying almost every night as soon as they had had their tea, and Irene consented cheerfully to be left alone. She knew that she was but a dull companion when tired out with the day's work, and she desired all manner of brightness for Rosamond that she might the more easily become reconciled to separation from Bellair.

One evening, when the younger sister had gone out for her usual nightly pilgrimage "to Mabel's," she came back presently for something she had forgotten. Irene, looking up at her entrance, received an unpleasant shock from the sight of Bellair's ring upon her finger. The other, perceiving that it was discovered, blushed deeply, and hid her hand in her shawl. Then, seeming to have taken a second thought, she held up her finger boldly.

"Mabel's ring," she said, hastily. "She lent it to me a week ago, but it is so costly I was afraid to wear it, for fear of something happening to it. I am going to return it to her to-night." Having said this, she went out hurriedly.

Irene dropped her head upon her hands, pained beyond measure by the untruth. "If I could only trust her! Oh, if I could only trust her!" she murmured, grievingly.

A few evenings afterward, when the elder sister was left alone as usual, a caller came—Mr. Southmore.

"I was in Boston for a few days, and thought I would drop in and spend the evening with you—that is, if you will compassionate my loneliness so far as to take me in." This he said at the door. When he had entered the small sitting-room, Irene noticed that his eyes travelled hastily through the apartment, and his face lengthened visibly.

"Rosamond has gone out to spend the evening," she volunteered, instinctively divining that it was her sister his searching eyes had missed.

"Then you are left alone. I am glad I came, or you would have been getting the blues, solitude being a bountiful dispenser, I believe, of the colors of Il Penseroso."

"I am glad you came, too, though I don't think I was in such danger as you imagine."

"You don't mean to give me any credit, I see. I always suspected that it might be my sad fate to live and die unappreciated, wasting my 'sweetness on the desert air,' you know. 'The evil that men do lives after them. The good is oft interred with their bones.' That is what Shakspeare says, or is it somebody else? But the good I do doesn't wait so long for interment even. Speaking of Shakspeare, I have just recollected that Forest plays at the Boston to-night. Would you not like to go and hear him?"

"I should be most happy," Irene affirmed, thinking at the same time, "He wouldn't have remembered Forest if Rosamond had been at home," and something—her vanity, perhaps—felt a hurt that he could not content himself to spend an evening with her. She declared, however, that she would soon be ready, and withdrew to dress for going out.

"You retain your old habit of promptness, I see," Southmore observed, when, after a few moments, she returned. "You have been gone just seven minutes, and here you are, 'all saddled, all bridled, all fit for the fight.' Well, that isn't exactly what I should have said, is it? But I hope you are not critical?"

"Not at all," laughed Irene, fastening her gloves, and then shaking out the folds of her veil.

The night was bright with starlight, and the streets with lamplight. The wind, which was blowing freshly, had steeped itself in "the wine of mountain air" at some distant quarter, where it had tarried for a moment, and one could hardly breathe it without exhilaration. Irene felt the healthful stimulus, and her spirits rose. All the latent gayety in her nature was evolved, and their walk—they had chosen to walk—made lively by her merry banter. It was not easy to sober down, even when they were within the spacious temple of the buskined muse. Irene was smiling, happy, almost beautiful.

"You are looking your best to-night, Miss Kent," Mr. Southmore observed, in a low tone. "If you had taken a longer time to dress, I should have suspected you of practising I don't know what mysterious arts of the toilet."

"I fear that whatever the art may have been, it will be one of the lost arts by to-morrow," said Irene, smiling pleasantly. She glanced over the crowd of pleasure-seekers surrounding her as she spoke. "'And the people, ah, the people!'" she quoted, lightly. Then suddenly she grasped Mr. Southmore's arm, stifling at the same time a cry of pain.

"What is it?" asked that gentleman, wonderingly, looking down into her face, and then following the direction of her eyes.

"You see?"

"Yes, I see."

He saw—that is to say, Ulfred Bellair and Rosamond Kent.

"Irene," said Southmore, his tone low, but full of intensity, "does she care for that puppy?"

"I fear she does. I thought we had got rid of him by coming here, but I believe it is vain to indulge a hope of escaping his vigilance."

"I don't know about that. Give him rope enough and he will hang himself," returned Southmore, affecting to speak lightly, though his brow was bent to a heavy frown.

"I should like to make him a present of the Atlantic cable," Irene declared, wrathfully, but she repented almost instantly. "I don't want any evil to befall him," she went on. "I think that grandmother's life is bound up in his almost, and I wish for her sake that he might become a better man than I believe him to be now."

"That is past praying for, I fear. If there were any foundation to build upon, one might hope, but the cur knows only just enough to be a rake."

"What can Rosamond be thinking of?"

"The Bellair property, perhaps."

"I don't think it is that," said Irene, but the curtain rising at this point, they did not converse farther.

The play was that of Richelieu. There is no need to enlarge upon it, nor upon the power of the principal actor. Irene forgot all that troubled her while the representation lasted. It seemed to her that she was in another world; that the vast theatre, the crowd, everything, was visionary and unreal; that she herself had lost her identity, and was no more the person she appeared than the people upon the stage were the characters they represented. The illusion lasted for some moments after the curtain had fallen, but when the air had ceased to quiver with the clamor of applause, she recollected herself. The walk home was accomplished almost in silence.

"You will come here again before you leave Boston, will you not?" said Irene, when they reached the block in which she lived.

"I am going back to Hillsborough to-morrow. Good-by."

"Good-by," giving him her hand.

Irene went in then, lighted the gas, and sat down to wait for Rosamond. It was half an hour longer perhaps before she came in.

"You are late," said Irene.

"Yes; there was company at Mabel's to-night, and I couldn't get away."

"How long has Ulfred Bellair been in Boston?"

"How do you know he is in Boston?" returned the other, rather sulkily.

"I saw you with him at the theatre."

"You at the theatre?"

"I went with Mr. Southmore."

"So Old Hundred has come to town, has he?"

"Where did you learn that choice name for the gentleman who saved your life once?"

Rosamond's cheeks crimsoned at her sister's tone of rebuke.

"I have heard somebody call him that. I did not mean any disrespect to Mr. Southmore," she affirmed.

"You have not answered my question yet"—from Irene.

"Haven't I? Oh dear me! How sleepy I am! I am going to bed, and you can come when you get ready."

Irene did not attempt to stay her. She knew that if she pressed the matter farther it would only end in a quarrel, in which she had no heart to engage.

For several evenings after this, Rosamond refrained from going "to Mabel's." Her temper in the mean time was fretful. At times she was extravagantly gay, at other times unnaturally depressed. In all that her sister said, she seemed to watch for some cause of anger, and often fired up resentfully at the most innocent observation. It was a season of great discomfort for both. At length, one evening she dressed herself carefully and went out without saying where she was going. She came home rather earlier than usual, looking pale and considerably excited.

"Have you had a pleasant evening?" asked Irene, suppressing the anxiety that she felt.

"Of course," returned the other, shortly, seating herself by the stove with her back towards Irene. By-and-by, with a sudden spasmodic movement, she turned around and faced her sister.

"What should you say, Irene, if I were to tell you that I am married to Ulfred Bellair?" she spoke out, her tone half of terror, half of defiance.

Irene dropped the book she held, and burst into tears. Her emotion seemed to exasperate Rosamond.

"Look here, Irene," said the latter. "Anybody would think I had done something terrible by the way you are going on. I am sure you might get married a dozen times and I wouldn't make such a fuss about it. It is what I like in your stories that you always have your lovers happily married at the last. I wouldn't give a fig for a story that doesn't end so."

"In a story it is the end," said Irene, impressively.

"And in our case it won't be unless we happen to die, which neither of us thinks of doing at present. I believe, Irene, that you wish Fred would turn out miserably, just to verify your groundless prejudices."

"In that, you are wrong," replied the other.

"If I had the same power over your future that I have over that of the people in my stories, your marriage should bring you nothing but happiness. I hope it may as it is."

"Of course it will. Fred isn't perfect, I know, but he's got a good heart, and he means to be steady now, and give up his wild ways. The worst of it is, that we've got to keep the marriage a secret while grandmother lives. So if you are not too angry to have me here, I shall go on living with you at present. We can take two or three more rooms, and Fred won't be here much of the time until he comes into his property; nor then either, for of course we shall go and live in the Bellair mansion then. If you would prefer it, I can go somewhere else to board, you know, just as well, but it would suit me better to be with you. What do you say? Is it go, or stay?"

"Stay; but I don't approve of keeping the marriage secret. Grandmother has a right to know, and she is so fond of Fred that I dare say she would forgive him, if he were to make a manful confession of what he has done."

"Confession! At the risk of losing all that magnificent property. Fred would rather"—apparently she could think of no suitable ending for this sentence, so she left it, and began another. "It won't do, so there's no more to be said about it. You must have been wild to think of such a thing."

"Perhaps I was wild," said Irene, in a low tone, rising, and making preparations for going to bed. Rosamond followed her with her eyes. She really loved her sister, and it troubled her to see Irene looking so sad. Watching her opportunity, she got her arms about the other's neck and kissed her.

"We are sisters, you know, Renie," she said, in a breaking voice.

"Yes, always sisters, Rosie. May God in heaven bless you."

The additional rooms were taken, and the small household was established upon its new basis. Bellair looked undeniably sheepish at his first meeting with Irene, but, finding that there was going to be no scene, he quickly recovered his usual easy, self-assertive manner. Irene treated her new brother without much warmth, indeed, but with well-bred courtesy. What had happened was now inevitable, and her long war with destiny at an end. Warily she rested from hostilities, but she could not quite take her victorious antagonist to her heart.

After a week of the new relation, the young bridegroom announced, on coming in at night, that he was going home the following morning. "I've had a letter from Joanna," meaning Mrs. Bellair, "and she is getting uneasy. If I keep her waiting much longer, I'm blamed if I don't think she'll be toting her old bones up here to look after me."

"O Fred! you had better go right away," said Rosamond.

"Well, ain't I going to? Blame me if I should want to stand to the windward of such a gale as Joanna'd blow up if she should catch me here."

The gale, however, was nearer than he thought. In less than half an hour Mrs. Bellair actually appeared. She was accompanied by Mr. Southmore and the clergyman who had married Bellair. Having taken alarm at her grandson's protracted absence, she had determined upon a personal investigation, and came to Boston for that purpose. Going down town in a horse-car, soon after her arrival, she overheard a rattling conversation between two young ladies who sat near her.

"Where is that young cub of a Bellair you were showing off here last winter, Mabel?" asked one.

"Oh! he's off my books altogether now."

"Any chance for a fellow-sister to step into your cast-off shoes?"

"None at all. You mustn't tell for the world, but he's married. It's to be kept a secret from property considerations. There's an old dragon of a grandmother, or a great aunt, or something of that sort that isn't in any particular hurry about dying and leaving her property; you understand?"

"Oh, yes! that is plain enough. Who married him?"

"Our minister, Mr. Melden."

"I didn't mean that. What young lady has taken him in hand?"

"Oh! it was Rosamond Kent. You don't know her. She isn't anybody in particular."

"Young woman," interrupted Mrs. Bellair, in a severe voice, at this point, "will you give me the address of your minister, Mr. Melden?"

The address was promptly given. An interview with the clergyman proved to Mrs. Bellair that it was all true. She telegraphed at once for Mr. Southmore to come to her in Boston, and to bring her will, that document being in his possession. Mr. Southmore came; and soon afterward Mrs. Bellair, the lawyer, and the minister struck a terror to the hearts of Bellair and his bride by appearing suddenly before them. Mrs. Bellair wore a look of grim determination, which was quite appalling.

"Is this the pair whom you married the other night?" she demanded, shrilly, of the clergyman.

"Yes, it is the same couple," assented that gentleman.

"Now, Southmore, where is that document you brought here?"

The lawyer produced it from an inside pocket.

"Read it, first."

He read a will, that of Joanna Bellair. After suitable bequests to the servants, five thousand dollars were devised to each of her granddaughters, and the rest of her property to Ulfred Bellair as sole residuary legatee.

"Now burn it," commanded the dame.

The paper was thrown inside the grate, and was soon in ashes.

"Grandmother, I hope you don't mean"—Ulfred Bellair began, looking white and terror-struck.

"Be silent, young man. I mean to endow a public library in Hillsborough. Have the goodness to draw up a new will to that effect, Mr. Southmore, with such specifications as I shall name."

And this was done. The document, when completed, was witnessed by Mr. Melden and, rather, reluctantly, at his grandmother's command, by Ulfred Bellair. Then, with a chilling bow, and the remark to Ulfred that "now he had got a wife she hoped he knew how he was going to support her," Mrs. Bellair withdrew, still accompanied by the professional gentlemen who had assisted her in destroying a towering structure of "great expectations."

Irene, who had been present at the interview, soon afterwards went to her room, and the married pair were thus left to themselves.

"You see what you have brought me to," said Rosamond's husband, reproachfully, after a gloomy silence of some length.

"It is as much your doing as it is mine, but whining won't change anything," retorted Rosamond.

"No, but I wish"—

"Why don't you say it out? You might as well. You mean you wish you had not married me."

"Well, I do then. A fellow can pick up a wife any day, but such a property as the Bellair estate is hard to find."

Rosamond flung back an angry retort, and burst into tears. Afterward a reconciliation was patched up; but bitter feelings rankled in both hearts, which were sure to break out in future quarrels.

A day or two afterward Mr. Southmore called to see Irene. "I loved Rosamond," he said, "but next to her I can value no woman as I do you. Will you marry me?"

"No. I am too exacting to take a divided heart. I should make you miserable if I married you."

"I should have no fear of that."

"I should, and it cannot be."

"But we may still be friends?"

"I hope so. I value your friendship highly, and should be sorry to lose it." After that Irene worked for many weeks almost without intermission. It was a sharp struggle of occupation against some strong inner feeling, and the former triumphed.

Rosamond, meanwhile, had gone back to the work, which, after her marriage, she gave up. Bellair made no effort to get employment, but lived wholly upon what his wife and Irene earned. He fell into sottish habits, and, a year after his marriage, perished miserably in a drunken quarrel.

Mr. Southmore had continued to visit Irene occasionally all this while. At last, one day in the month of roses, when Rosamond had been six months a widow, and was getting back some of the bloom which her married experience had dissipated, he again spoke to Irene of marriage; but this time he did not preface his proposal with the assertion that he loved some one else better. "I have learned to prize you above all women. Rosamond is free now, but I could not go back to her, though you should tell me again, as you did once, that you will not marry me. I love you, only you. What equivalent can you give me for my love?"

"Love for love. Will that satisfy you?"

It did, apparently.

The Hillsborough public library had not to wait long for its endowment. A codicil had, however, been added to the original will, providing for an annuity of three hundred dollars annually to be paid to Mrs. Rosamond Bellair as long as she remained a widow. She is still in receipt of her annuity. She lives with her sister, Mrs. Southmore, and is much improved in character by the disciplining power of her past experience.

IN SORROW.

BY CARRIE D. BEEBE.

Say not, "'Tis well that he slumbers;"

Say not now, "God knoweth best—

Out of life's sin and life's sorrow

Calmly he lieth at rest."

How can I hear you, when silent,

In the dread stillness of death,

Is the voice, which in low, tender love-tones,

Spoke my name with its last breath.

Praise not his name in my hearing,

Say not, "Her sorrow is sore,

For, though his features were noble,

We loved his virtues far more."

Do I not know he was noble?

Was not his love to me, bliss?

If I speak harshly, forgive me,

You have ne'er known grief like this.

For his dear breast was my pillow,

In pain or in trouble, for years;

Ever my refuge in sorrow,

Now I sit lonely in tears.

Say not, that unto the widow

God's tender promise is sure;

Do ye not know that existence

Scarcely my soul can endure?

God's comfort cometh more slowly,

Softly it steals o'er the breast,

Like the sweet chorus of angels,

Lulling a spirit to rest.

Well do I know that His pity,

Falling like dew from the sky,

Gently will soothe my worn spirit—

I shall grow calm by and by.

Now, but two things my heart knoweth;

Cold and dead lieth my love;

And—or my heartstrings would fall me,

The great God dwelleth above.

And by His grace He will lead me

Gently through sorrow's dark night;

And my soul, chastened, but peaceful,

Strengthened, will walk in His light.

I shall again hear the bird-songs,

I shall again prize your love;

Work at the duty assigned me,

Until He calls me above.

Dear, I would not seem ungrateful,

I would not wrongly repine;

Say but this, "Darling, I love thee,"

Then I'll know my grief is thine.

MYRTLE'S NEW-YEAR.

BY VIOLETTE WOODS.

"How do I look, Chester?" and the thoughtless young wife turned from the mirror, in which she had been contemplating her loveliness for some moments, full upon her husband.

His cheek had been resting in his hand, his eyes upon the floor; but he raised them with a look of unutterable love, and gazed upon the resplendent figure before him. "You are beautiful, Myrtle, beautiful. Your eyes rival your diamonds in brilliancy, and I am sure you have robbed the roses and lilies of their lovely complexions."

"You are proud of me, then, aren't you?" She knelt beside him, resting one slender jewelled hand upon his knee.

"Indeed, indeed, I am, Myrtle." He placed his arm caressingly about her, and drew her nearer to him. "What an unfit mate I am for you, darling. My helpless limbs render it so impossible for me to be your constant companion, as I sigh every moment of my life to be. I sometimes compare myself to a bird, whose pinions are broken, and whose wanderings are confined to earth; whilst you, my lovely mate, can soar away beyond the clouds into the realms of eternal sunshine."

The roses upon the cheeks of the young wife assumed a deeper hue as she listened to her husband's metaphor; and, observing it, he added, quickly: "But you have not told me whither you are bound to-night. Is it to the opera, or another party?"

"Oh, the opera, to be sure! Madame Parepa sings to-night, and my ears are aching to hear her. I have thought of her voice, and the sensation I shall create, until I have scarcely an idea left. I wish you could go, darling; but, since I have such kind protectors as Mr. and Mrs. Howard, I oughtn't to complain. But there is the carriage now. I hope Madame Parepa will sing for us again when you are well of that horrid rheumatism, and then we will enjoy the treat together. Sit up for me, won't you, dear?" as she threw her ermine-lined cloak about her shoulders. "I have ordered James to bring you some oysters and coffee at eleven to cheer your spirits and keep you awake. You must think of me whilst I am gone, Chester, how much I am enjoying myself, and how every one is envying you your wife."

She pressed her lips to his, and passed from the room. A moment later the heavy door closed upon her retreating figure, the carriage rolled away, and Chester, reaching his crutches, which rested against the fauteuil upon which he was reclining, with their aid hobbled to the door. Thomas, who had been closing the house until the return of his mistress, hearing his footsteps, waited respectfully.

"When your mistress arrives," said he, in an unsteady voice, "tell her that I have retired, so that she will not look for me in the library. Tell James, also, that I shall not need any refreshment as was directed. That is all; you can go."

Thomas bowed and departed, with a look of sympathy for his lonely, suffering master; and Chester Starling turned with slow steps to his comfortable arm-chair, and threw himself wearily within it. His thoughts followed his gay young wife to the brilliant scene of which she was so bright an ornament. He recalled their first meeting to the present moment, and lingered lovingly over its happy incidents.

Two years before he had met Myrtle Vane at the house of her uncle in an obscure country village, through which he was passing on his way to the mountains. She was young and beautiful, possessing a warm, loving heart and a more than ordinary intelligence. These, added to her personal charms, speedily won the heart of the wealthy young student, who was travelling for his health. The engagement was short. She was poor, and keenly felt her dependence upon a relative whose salary as a country pastor barely sufficed to meet the wants of his own large family. Chester was rich, his elegant home needed a mistress, and himself a companion to cheer his hours of loneliness. "And why," Chester argued, "should Myrtle be longer deprived of those social advantages which she is so well calculated to receive and bestow?"

Immediately after the wedding the young couple took possession of the house in which Chester was born, and in which his parents had died, but which was remodelled and refurnished in a style better suited to the somewhat extravagant taste of its beautiful young mistress. For awhile Chester accompanied her everywhere her inclination suggested, he gave up his hours of study to her amusement, and laid aside his books that her pleasure and enjoyment might be abridged in nothing. "She is like a bird which has been caged from its birth," he said to himself, "and now that she is free she shall roam wherever her own sweet will dictates."

But after a few months a change came. His enemy—the rheumatism, which had attacked him at intervals from childhood—seized upon him with a grip from which no medical skill seemed to have the power to free him. In his wildest paroxysms of pain Myrtle stood by his bedside, knowing neither sleep nor rest, and giving all the comfort which sympathy can give to its fellow-sufferers; but, as soon as he was convalescent, she flitted like a bird to her own enjoyment, leaving him to the care of hired attendants. And yet he never complained. He loved her with a devotion unsurpassed, and he confided as implicitly, and rested as securely in her affection as he would have done had she been constantly beside him, seeking no pleasure which he could not share. She was young and thoughtless; had been fettered by poverty, and circumscribed in feeling and action; and, as he recalled these facts, he judged her leniently and without the shadow of reproach. He had never attempted to dissuade her from the course she pursued; had never discouraged her visits to the opera when accompanied by those friends upon whose judgment he could rely; but to-night, as he sat alone, and thought of her so resplendent, so fascinating, and so loving, his feelings began to change. She was young, younger by ten years than he; she was scarcely eighteen, and he more than twenty-eight. What if the world, always so eager to denounce the thoughtless, should take her name upon its lips, and sully its purity with its polluted breath. She was but a child yet, chasing a butterfly; society, operas, balls were new to her; she was gathering her flowers whilst the fresh dews of morning lay glittering upon them, not thinking of the thorns which lurked among them. As Chester Starling thought of these things, his heart seemed to die within him; his child-wife, his Myrtle, was in danger of which her innocence had never dreamed, and to save her was his resolve.

It was New-Year's morning, a week after the incidents recorded in the last chapter. Chester sat alone in his library, his lips compressed, and a look of doubt and trouble resting in his fine eyes. Presently his wife entered in obedience to his summons; and, as he made room for her at his side, the trouble in his eyes grew denser, and the lines about his mouth more rigid. She was dressed in a morning-robe of crimson, lined with white, and faced with swansdown; and, as she toyed carelessly with the heavy silken tassels, Chester thought he had never seen her look so lovely. "You received my message, did you?" he inquired, scarcely knowing what to say.

"Yes, but had half a mind not to obey you," she replied, glancing brightly into his face. "I have been as busy as a bee all the morning getting ready for Mrs. Fortesque's party to-night. I am to personate 'Winter,' and am having the loveliest gray velvet dress made, just the color of winter clouds, trimmed with down in imitation of snowflakes, and am having my diamonds reset to represent icicles." She looked up into his face as she concluded her narration, and, startled by its pallor, exclaimed: "What is the matter, Chester? Tell me, darling, tell me!"

He put his arm around her. "O Myrtle!" said he, in a voice which he vainly endeavored to steady, "are you so wedded to the vanities of the world that it would kill you to be divorced from them?"

"Wedded to them! Divorced from them!"

she repeated, vaguely. "What do you mean? Why do you not explain?"

He looked into her face as sternly as he could. "If I should tell you that this house and furniture, your diamonds, and servants, and equipage could in some degree meet the demands of hungry, nay, insatiate creditors, what would be your reply?"

The truth burst upon her like a peal of thunder from a cloudless sky. She was unprepared for it; two years before she had assumed an exalted position, and she had worn the honors it conferred as regally as a queen wears the crown destined to her at her birth. Myrtle loved splendor and gayety as dearly as the summer bird loves sunshine and warmth, but she loved her husband and his honor beyond all else. She did not realize it in its full force until he added:—

"When we were married, Myrtle, I had this property and its appurtenances deeded to you. As the record now stands, they are yours personally, as much so as are the garments in which you are clad. Make your own decision, darling, take your own time. The law cannot rob you of these things if you wish."

The true nobility of womanhood, which had been slumbering in Myrtle's nature like a diamond within a sealed casket, displayed itself as she twined her white arms about her husband's neck. "I do not need time to decide this matter, Chester," she exclaimed. "Ingrate, indeed, would I be could I falter now. Take all, everything. Leave me but your love, Chester, and my own health, and I ask nothing else."

"But, Myrtle, does not the prospect seem dark, indeed? To be bereft of the wealth and luxury in which we have revelled, the 'purple and fine linen' in which we have been clothed every day, the society and gayety in which you have delighted so much, the"— "Hush, Chester, do not refer to that! How reckless, how careless, I have been! How has your love ever survived my negligence of your comfort?"

"You shall not upbraid yourself," he replied, firmly, though affectionately. "If fault exists at all, it is mine, not yours. You were young, and, although chained myself, I urged your freedom upon you."

"Explain to me, Chester, how this state of affairs came about," she said, after awhile. "Have not my wilful extravagances been your ruin? Am I not to blame as the sole cause?"

"Not at all," he replied. "All of my life my business has been in the hands of agents. I have been an idler in the vineyard. I have never withheld my wealth when it could in the least contribute to your happiness or my own. But, since misfortune restores to me my wife, and proves that she is not the gay butterfly the world doubtless thinks her, I am satisfied. Come poverty, come toil, but leave my wife pure and unspotted from the world."

"As for myself, I do not dread our altered circumstances," she said, bravely, "but my heart aches for you, Chester. These surroundings have been yours from infancy; they were mine but for a day. In going back to the poverty from which your love so generously rescued me, I feel not one regret for myself. Your love shall be my incentive to unceasing energy, and your faith in me my redemption. If the world has ever said of me that I have been careless of your welfare, it may recall its verdict now; henceforth my life shall be devoted to you."

The young couple had many long conversations over their altered fortunes, and laid many plans for their future. At last it was decided that they should remove to the little inland town which Myrtle had left two years before a joyous bride. Chester had purchased a small cottage, and thither they were to remove in a few days.

"We will remain there at least until my health is permanently established," he said, "and then I can return to the practice of my profession. We will have a sufficiency to support us comfortably for a year, and surely by that time I will be completely restored."

"I do not intend to be idle," said Myrtle. "My musical proficiency was so well appreciated in D—— that I can easily procure a class. And if I was a good performer before I was married, I certainly am a better one now, or else the care that has been bestowed upon that part of my education in the last two years has been sadly misplaced."

"I do not know whether I can agree to your proposition or not," he replied, sadly, "but we will refer to this again at some future time."

Mr. Gardner, Chester's lawyer and friend, passed in and out every day. Myrtle had had no idea of the extent of her husband's business until she saw the heaps of papers which were constantly being brought into and carried out of the house. One morning Chester entered her chamber and found her in tears. She had borne her reverses not stoically, but bravely hitherto, and now to see her weeping almost unmanned him.

"Are these the first tears you have shed, Myrtle?"

"The very first," she answered, truthfully.

"Then, my darling, what is the cause of this emotion? Do you regret your decision? It is not yet too late; you have another day in which to act. No earthly power can take this property from you without your own consent. Do not act upon the impulse of the moment, and then regret it all of your after life."

"I do not regret it," she said, courageously. "I have never regretted it an instant since you stated the circumstance to me."

"Then tell me what has excited you so?"

She wiped the tears from her eyes, and, folding her white hands in her lap, said, in a low voice: "A nameless something for which I cannot account, incited me this morning to arrange the house as I would have done had we been going away upon a visit instead of forever. I had gone carefully through the chambers and parlors, leaving my own room until the last, but when I arrived here and opened my jewel-case, my spirits sank. My diamonds gleamed within, but for them I felt no regret except for the pride and vanity they had engendered. I placed the tiara upon my brow, womanlike," she added, as she saw his smile, "but I really thought it unbecoming now, and laid it indifferently aside. But, darling, when I espied my wedding-ring, the one you placed upon my finger within the moment that made me your wife, the very happiest of women, I could not repress my tears. I felt unwilling to resign it; I feel so yet, Chester, although I am ashamed to acknowledge it. It is not for the sake of retaining a vestige of my former glory, but because with its bestowal I realized that I was all in all to you."

"And you shall retain it," said Chester, "let it cost what it may. You are a brave woman, Myrtle, and Heaven grant that I may properly appreciate and cherish you."

Almost a year had passed away. It was New-Year's Eve, and within the Starling cottage all was love and happiness. A bright wood-fire burned within the open fireplace of the little parlor, throwing its ruddy light upon the few choice engravings which adorned the walls, upon the rows of shelves which, filled with books, occupied one entire side of the apartment, and upon the rosewood cradle containing a chubby baby of four months, the pride and pet of the household. Chester sat near the blazing fire, enjoying himself in the winter twilight, if one might be allowed to judge from the settled complacency of his countenance. As he sat thinking, his wife noiselessly entered the room, in her dark dress and snowy collar and cuffs, the very personation of a model housewife and mother. She advanced to the cradle, and, drawing the covering more closely about the little form it contained, turned to her husband.

"Tea is waiting, Chester."

"And I believe I am ready for it," he replied, following her into the drawing-room. "My ride to and from the city to-day has sharpened my appetite finely."

The supper laid out for his enjoyment was certainly sufficient to have tempted the most abstemious, and Chester expressed his appreciation as his fragrant tea was handed to him. Snowy bread and golden butter, preserves, steaming oysters, and deliciously broiled ham, all prepared by Myrtle's own hands, for their one domestic had not had enough experience to be trusted alone in the culinary department.

"I wish you and little Chester to accompany me to the city to-morrow, Myrtle," said Chester, when the meal was about half finished.

"To-morrow!" exclaimed Myrtle. "Why, have you forgotten that it is New-Year's Day? Besides, I have an abundance of the 'good things of this life' in preparation for dinner, and have invited uncle's family to dine with us."

"Transfer the eatables to the care of your aunt, and recall the invitation until a more convenient season. I must have you and Chester with me to-morrow. We will go up upon the two o'clock train."

They returned to the little parlor, and lighted the lamp. Myrtle drew her low chair to the side of the table and unfolded her work, a little dress she was embroidering for her babe. She was never idle now; there was always some employment for the busy hands or the busier brain, always some knitting or sewing, or a book which her husband had requested her to read. Chester noticed that she sighed wearily as her trembling fingers almost refused to thread the needle.

"We will have a holiday to-night, my love," he said, taking the garment from her lap and replacing it in her basket. "You are tired, I know; let me rest you."

He pillowed her head upon his breast, and lifted her face to his.

"The old year is ebbing away, Myrtle; have we spent it profitably or unprofitably?"

"Profitably," she replied, her energies reviving, "and happily, too. How has it been with you, Chester? Is the retrospect pleasant, or is this hour 'a time for memory and for tears'?"

"No, Myrtle; I can honestly say that since we have been living in this cottage, I have known more genuine happiness than I ever experienced in the whole of my life-time before. I need not tell you that when we removed here I feared the effects of the change upon you. I installed you mistress of my house when wealth seemed to flow in upon us from every side; but before two years had passed, home and wealth vanished as if they had been the creations of a dream. Myrtle, have you never in your secret heart reproached me for the change?"

"Never, never, Chester! I have blamed myself rather than you. And more—if to-night our lost fortune could be restored to us, I feel that the strength and wisdom I have gained in the passing year would keep me forever aloof from the follies in which I once indulged so recklessly. I feel no regret for their loss, no desire for their re-possession. In your restored health and continued love, my sincerest prayers have been answered; and society, no matter how fascinating, could never again furnish an inducement for me to leave your side. I have learned that woman's sphere is home, and that if there is a tie stronger than that which binds her to it, she does not deserve the holy name of wife."

Chester drew her more closely to him and pressed his lips to her brow.

"This year of comparative poverty has been a greater trial to me than to you, Myrtle," he replied, in an unsteady voice; not because I have had many of its privations to bear, but because in seeing you bear them so nobly, I have realized how utterly weak my infirmities rendered me."

"But that is all over now, Chester. Our misfortunes were for our own immediate good, though when they came upon us so suddenly, I could not see it clearly, strong as I thought myself to wrestle with them. These invigorating mountain breezes have been your restoration to health, and my separation from fashion and its votaries has been my temporal salvation. I tremble to think what I would have been to-night had not Providence so kindly interposed. That I was almost hopelessly vain and careless a year ago, you know too well; but if in the past months I have in any degree atoned for it, I am grateful."

As they stopped at the depot upon their arrival in the city the next evening, Myrtle recognized in the dusky twilight the carriage and horses which had once been her own, and even the driver who had formerly been in her employ.

"Come, my love, the carriage is waiting," said Chester, and too much surprised to speak, Myrtle suffered herself to be placed within it.

"Where are we going, Chester?" she asked, as soon as she could command her voice.

"I am anxious for you to become acquainted with the mistress of our former home, and her husband desired me to bring you directly there. You will find her a woman who has but few equals, and no superiors; one in whom her 'husband's heart doth safely trust.' You will love her for my sake, I am sure."

Myrtle did not reply, but after a few moments' drive they reached the luxurious house in which they had spent the first years of their married life. Chester led her up the marble steps, through the broad hall, into the very chamber which had been her own a twelve-month before. Everything was unchanged; carpet, furniture, curtains were the same, even her very jewel-box occupied its place upon the dressing-bureau.

"What does it all mean?" she asked herself upon looking around and seeing that Chester was absent.

She removed her wrappings mechanically, and laid them upon the bed; took little Chester from the arms of his nurse, and laid him within the elegant cradle, the only addition which had been made to the furniture of the apartment. Chester entered, looking radiant with happiness; he put his arm about his wife's waist, and said, softly:—

"Before presenting you to the lady of the house, I must tell you that you must never be jealous of my exceeding love for her, nor deprecate the wonderful influence she possesses over me. This is she."

He turned her around so that she could see herself in the full length mirror, and exclaimed:—

"Let me introduce you to Mrs. Starling, the only mistress this house has ever had since her husband's mother died. Long may she reign, the queen of his home as of his heart?"

The tears rolled down Myrtle's cheeks.

"What do you mean, Chester? Are we in a dream?"

"No, Myrtle, it is all a blessed reality." He drew her unresisting form to his knee, and continued: "Let me tell you a little story, Myrtle. There was once a wife, young, and beautiful, and admired. Her husband was wealthy but was an invalid, and he loved her too well to confine her at his bedside. He urged her to go into society without him, and she went until she was fast becoming a slave to its fascinations. He determined to rescue her from the giddy vortex to which she was so rapidly moving, and to do this he resorted to measures which otherwise would have seemed harsh. He conversed with her in such a way regarding his affairs that she thought him a bankrupt; thought him reduced to poverty, and she heroically sustained her part in the conflict of life. It was a furnace of fire in which he tested her womanhood and her affection, but she came forth refined, purified, exalted. Her husband's love and confidence had not been misplaced. Was his course wrong?"

"No, no, Chester, that course was my salvation. I needed the retirement in which to think over and repent of my former follies. You pursued the wisest plan, and how grateful I am my future life shall prove."

"This, then, shall be your New-Year's gift," he returned, presenting her with the deed of the property, "and with it the assurance of my unbounded love and faith."

A CHILD'S PLEADINGS.

BY ESPRY.

"Oh! leave the lily on its stem,
The rose upon its spray;
For think how short is life for them,
How sweet its little day!"

A little child thus once to me,
In pleasing pity, spake;
I passed her treasures harmless by,
And spared them for her sake.

"Oh! leave youth's lily thought its stem,
Its budding hopes their spray;
For think how short is youth for them,
How sweet its little day!"

An angel winging near to me,
In holy accents, spake;
I kissed the child, and passed them by,
And spared all for her sake.

HAVING IT OUT.

QUARRELS are bad things, and no one in his senses—his moral senses, we should say, these being different from mere intellectual sanity—would advocate them, save under such provocation of insult as must be chastised if self-respect is to be retained. But, bad as it is, quarrelsomeness is better to bear with than that heavy, sulky temper which broods over a wrong, fancied or real, in a deep and sullen silence, and never has it out—never has done with it. Of course, best of all is the tact which avoids the occasion of unpardonable offence, and the patience which overlooks small wrongs, and magnanimously forgives them when committed. But, unfortunately, we have not to deal now with the absolute best, only with a choice of evils—our election lying between sullenness and quarrelling—silent chafing of a sore, or having it out let what will come of it.

Having it out, however, does not necessarily include anger, only an explanation, full, free and frank—the unreserved exposition of your state of mind, and the candid confession of what has displeased you, why you are annoyed, and what you dislike and want altered in your friend. Take, for example, a person who has a disagreeable trick, physical or mental—and a great many very worthy folks have tricks, and of the most unpleasant kind, too—a trick, say, that specially revolts and disgusts you, and that you cannot abide, be your patience anything short of Job's. You are thrown into close contact with your friend who has this annoying habit—genus undetermined at this present moment. You have seen it, of course, ere this, but only in a cursory, superficial sort of way; you have never lived in daily sight or hearing of it before now, and you are naturally disgusted. At the first you are only enduringly disgusted, patience taking a certain length of time before it is worn threadbare; but by degrees you become so painfully impressed by this unpleasant habit—it assumes such gigantic proportions, and is of so much importance in your life—that you run great risk of losing all regard for your friend, and of seeing every good quality he possesses obscured, nay, swallowed up bodily, by this horrid hydra-headed ugliness. You get colder and colder—you are more and more disgusted each day—more angry with him that he does not see your change of manners, and does not understand the cause of that change—more angry with yourself that you have not courage and straightforwardness enough to have it out with him, and have done with it. Meanwhile the trick increases in virulence and frequency; so, at least, it seems to you; your friendship goes down to zero, and your disgust increases in proportion as this subsides; when suddenly you take your courage and common-sense in hand, inform your friend, who has been wondering in silent pain at the unaccountable change in you towards him, that he has such and such an objectionable excrecence which revolts you past bearing; such and such a habit, of which he, poor fellow, is as innocent as a dove. You have it out, and henceforth the sore is healed. He learns his defect for the first time, perhaps, and cures himself of it before another week is passed, and you go on together again, better friends than ever. This is possible, however, only when the friend and yourself are people of good judgment and wise temper. If you are snappish and insulting in your manner, and he is one of those stupid fools who must be considered perfect, else he is affronted, the chances are that your having it out will lead to a break between you that will last your lifetime; in which case you must take your choice of three alternatives—letting your friendship die away by degrees, flinging it abroad to burst up on a sudden never to be re-composed again, or accepting the trick which revolts you now with patience and shut senses, which last is the hardest trial of all.

In another case it may be some personal misunderstanding, some fancied slight, over which you brood and fume; believing that you have been injured and insulted, that your friend or your lover has done something to hurt you intentionally, and that, although you do not like to take any notice of it, you are expected rather than not to be annoyed; and, if you show your annoyance by your coldness and reserve, no one will be astonished, and no one bewildered. Your friend, your lover, has not had the remotest intention of hurting you. He had no more idea of slighting you in that little matter which has pricked you so deeply than he had of committing murder. He cannot imagine why you are cool, no more than could your friend with the unpleasant habit before you enlightened him as to the reason why you had sulked with him so long; he all the while, innocent of anything like a cause. Your lover, as you yourself, thinks explanations dangerous; and so you both drift farther and farther apart, till either you are forced to be candid to each other—when the spectre which has come between you dissolves into thin air—or your pride and fiery tempers build up a fresh barrier, which is too high for your weak-backed love to surmount. Yet, even in such a case, having it out is better than letting your poor love die of the baleful effects of a vapory spectre; and, at the worst, having it out gives you a chance in hand.

It has been noticed before now how much novelists trade on that silly reticence which never has a thing out honestly, but lets misunderstandings and secret slanders part the dearest lovers without an effort made to clear the fog, and without a step taken towards a frank explanation. Indeed, were this well-worn device to be forbidden, the poor weak painters of human nature and society as neither ever existed would be at a sad loss to know how to run the fortunes of hero and heroine through the orthodox three volumes—by what device to make John marry Kate when he ought to marry Jane; or how to complicate the love affairs going on between Charles and Jemima, which the exigency of “copy” requires should not run smooth for two volumes and three-quarters. One often gets impatient with those novels which found their tragedies on a misunderstanding that one moment of honest explanation would entirely remove. If, indeed, one takes enough interest in these poor weeds of literature to be either glad or impatient at whatsoever they may put forth; for one cannot help feeling what an absurd picture of humanity they offer; and why cannot these two simpletons meet face to face, and, meeting, have it out with a will, leaving nothing behind to ferment and breed corrupt humors? When they do meet, we know the things will go smooth enough, unless, indeed, it be too late, which is an aggravation of the original offense; but generally it is a sign that all the right people will marry, all the bad ones be found out and punished, and the good ones consoled and rewarded. Authors of this kind of weak, weedy literature, however, seldom give us this humane satisfaction before the last chapter; writing of life in its subtle phrases, and delineating the heart in its secret recesses, being a more difficult feat than the time-honored mechanism of misunderstanding for the result of sundering loving souls.

Though having it out need not necessarily include a fit of anger, yet even this sometimes clears the moral atmosphere, as a tempest clears the physical one. Old griefs which have made you morose, and old vexations which have made you suspicious, get then their utterance, and the house is perhaps all the happier for the bursting of the storm that has been so long abrewing. Still, we do not advocate this playing with fire and tempest; and, if things can be got shapely and distinct by sunny weather, it is so much the better. Yet some families are so unhappily constituted that nothing short of a domestic whirlwind breaks the clouds, or drives off the mephitic vapors that have accumulated by long indulgence of sulks, brooding, sullenness, and nursing grievances in silence; with them then having it out means a stand-up fight, as much as the meeting of two North American Indians of hostile tribes means the throwing of a few spears, and, if the chance offers, a turn at scalping; as much as the meeting of two clouds charged with electricity means a flash of lightning, a clap of thunder, and the nervous terror of some old lady below. In fact, the lives of such as these are passed in an exercise which never lets itself get exhausted, in having out that which no explanations in the world bring to an end. Again—going into politics now—it would be far better for the nation if we had out honestly the questions which agitate men's minds below the surface. When things come to such a point that they boil over the rim of the state cauldron, and splutter all abroad, then they are attended to, and "remedial measures" are taken before the whole thing is spoilt; for such boiling over would soon put out the fire, and then the world would go but queerly. But long before that moment of ebullition comes, to have it out manfully, bravely, and thoroughly would avoid many a fit of national sulks, and burke many a chapter of national misunderstanding between the governors and the governed, the people and their princes.

TEARS.

BY MRS. T. P. B.

THE mountain torrents of the heart
Well up in times of joy and sorrow;
Their presence shows the better part
Of man's to-morrow.

Tears may be there, and yet unshed;
Some sorrows crush, and tears refuse to flow;
But easier far to bear when tears do rush—
Fit solace of our trials here below.

Tears move to pity stony hearts,
And soften natures naturally cold;
Lead us to choose "that better part,"
And form us in a softer mould.

Childhood's tears are transient woes,
Followed soon by summer smiles;
But manhood's tears are heartfelt throes,
Oft caused by woman's guiles.

Tears calm the tempest of the heart,
And smooth life's rugged, thorny road;
Deprive our griefs of half their smart,
From aching hearts lift half the load.

Men's tears, in this cold world below,
Are caused by woman's guile;
And yet how soon they cease to flow,
Dispelled by woman's smile.

Life without tears could not remain
A happy future state;
Like parched earth without her rain,
Ill fraught would be our state.

Tears well up when we're happy,
As well as when we're sad;
And spread a halo round our lives,
And make our hearts feel glad.

They are founts of living water,
In the desert of our heart,
Springing in secret places
Of our seeming barren heart.

So welcome tears,
Broad river of the heart;
They ease a mind oppressed with fears,
Though keen at time the smart.

ORDER is the sanity of the mind, the health of the body, the peace of the city, the security of the state. As the beams to a house, as the bones to the microcosm of man, so is order to all things.—Southey.

VOL. LXXXII.—4

TWO DAYS OF HOUSEKEEPING.

BY INO CHURCHILL.

"FIDDLESTICKS!" said my Cousin Emma, glancing under her eyelids at me, and half-closing her book.

But, as the elegant word was a common expletive of Em's, my equanimity was not at all disturbed, and I kept on watching the soft shades of wool for the elaborate work I was about to commence.

"Fiddlesticks!" said Em, again, with evident contempt.

"What is the matter, cousin? Is that author unfortunate enough to disagree with you?"

"I should think so, indeed. He believes that the ministry of angels extends even to the floral kingdom, and thinks it would require no great stretch of faith or imagination to believe that their deft fingers are engaged in moulding the calyx of the flower, or weaving the delicate tissue of the leaves."

"Well, cousin, it is certainly a very pretty and harmless theory. I have no doubt, if we could see all that is now invisible, the things we really do behold would be invested with a tenfold interest."

"I prefer truth to poetry," said Em. "I believe the germinal principle of every flower or tree is contained in the seed, which, under the proper conditions of soil, moisture, heat, and light, will develop because it cannot help itself."

"But it can be hindered, cousin. A child's foot may warp, or entirely crush the young plant; and even the miserable crawling worm can perforate every leaf of the tree, and eat the very heart out of the flower. Would you not accord the angels an equal power in the opposite direction?"

"You suppose, then, the angels go about repairing the damage done?" said Em.

"Prevent the evil, not repair it. They could no more do that than they could brush away the serpent's trail from Eden with their snowy wings."

"Yet," said Em, "I much rather suppose them to be spending their leisure moments in weaving celestial tapestry than in presiding over cabbage gardens."

"O Em, you are incorrigible! But what was 'fiddlesticks' No. 2 about?"

"Why, this precious specimen of originality undertakes to say that every sound produced in this, our lower world, creates a symmetrical wave in the air, that finally deposits itself in some beautiful form of flower or star."

"Pray go on, Emma. I'm sure the book is a gem."

She complied, and I gave myself up to enjoyment. She was a beautiful reader; and, though the words might have gathered new meaning and beauty from the rare sweetness and great flexibility of her voice—now clear as the chime of silver bells, now rivalling the liquid tone of falling water—I felt that under less skilful rendering my heart would have beat time to the musical flow of word and thought. For the moment I was perfectly happy, but then the thought of my responsibility in my mother's temporary absence sobered me down again. I ought to have had some fear on the subject, but I did not. I knew that our one domestic, Bridget, held sovereign sway in her particular department, and was really mistress of the situation as far as our material wants were concerned. How material and gross they seemed, as, with my hearty breakfast quietly assimilating itself with my nature, I soared with Em and the author above this sublunary sphere!

Emma had arrived at some of the sublimest passages, and the mossy bedding of my flower-work had grown green and velvety beneath my unconscious finger-tips, when we were suddenly brought down from our ethereal atmosphere to the level of common humanity by the sharp slamming of the door, and a sound between a shriek and a groan that must have imprinted a huge flower somewhere amid the galleries of space. With a confused idea of shattered rainbows in my head, I turned to find Bridget settled down in a heap upon the floor, her apron thrown over her head, her body swaying to and fro as if shaken by some mighty storm of pain or sorrow. The more I tried to discover the cause, the more she groaned.

"Och, murther!" said she, "I shall die, and this is for what I've heard the Banshee wailin' her desolate strains, and had a gleam of the wringin' of hands and the weepin' of tears every time I looked out at the dark. Och! I shall die, I shall die! My mither, my mither!"

Em immediately pronounced it a case of cholera, and I thought her voice had lost some of its angelic sweetness as she called from the pantry to know where the mustard, ginger, and pepper were kept. I knew nothing about it, so I rushed across the street to the office of the young doctor whose shingle had for months been swinging unheeded in the wind. I found him at home, of course, where he should be, and, as he prepared to accompany me, I explained to him the cause of my alarm.

Biddy's voice was still raised in all the eloquence of Irish agony when we came in. Doctor Hamilton regarded her a moment with a professional eye, remarking to me that it was mental rather than physical suffering. He lifted her into a chair, and said to her, rather sternly: "Madam, will you be quiet a moment, and tell us how we can help you?"

To which came the unexpected reply: "Bad luck to ye, sir, for callin' me madam, who niver was married a day in me life, and the good Father forgive your onfeelingness whin ye come to your time of need."

"But my good woman," said the doctor, kindly, "I am not unfeeling. I came to help you. You have alarmed the young ladies, and they don't know what to do. Come, tell me now if you are in pain, or have received bad news?"

Biddy, reminded of her sorrow, went off again: "And, shure! ain't I been telling them my mither's a dying, with her six childer on her knee, savin' the eldest, and niver a body there to help her? And nather kin I go to her; the mistress away, the young ladies alone, and nobody to 'tend to the roast."

"Nobody would keep you from your sick mother, Bridget," said I, quickly; "but it is some distance to walk, and there is no conveyance."

"Yes, but there is, miss, bless your kind heart! Peter Malony is come in his donkey-cart to fetch me, and I'm to come right off and bring the doctor. Will you go, sir?" said she to Doctor H—. "Shure and ye must know how to heal a body, with niver a thing to do the day long but to read how it's done."

Doctor Hamilton colored a little, and I came to his relief by saying that my father would consider himself his debtor if he would go.

"Yes, I will go," he said to Bridget. And to me: "So you think I am too onfeelin' to go for the sake of humanity?"

"Not at all," I replied. "But I presume you will have opportunities enough to exercise all your benevolence, and Bridget is an important member of our family."

Biddy had called to the invisible Peter as she went through the hall "to drive 'round to the front door, for the new doctor was going along with them."

Em laughingly said to the doctor, as she caught sight of the strange equipage: "Surely you are not going to risk yourself and your reputation in that outlandish turn-out?"

"Yes, but I am," said the doctor, "unless you think it will be too much for the donkey, Miss Horton. You would not have me afraid or ashamed to do anything it is right and proper for me to perform?"

The comic horror depicted on Em's face gave way to a smile of approbation as he said this, and she cast an admiring glance at him for his moral courage in being able to brave the ridicule of the populace, which glance I immediately noted down on that broad tablet kept for other people's affairs.

We all walked out on the veranda to await Biddy's appearance. Peter was waiting too. He had evidently struck an attitude; for, with a laudable desire to make his passengers comfortable, he had placed his only seat—a board covered with sheep-skin—at their disposal, and seated himself on the very edge of the cart; the flag of distress floating gracefully backward, betokening the fact that the usual amount of cushioning was wanting in this case. He had endeavored to freshen up his toilet a little, despite his soiled and ragged shirt, for he had thrust his ungainly limbs into a pair of spotless pants that reached just below his knees. His hose were of Nature's fashioning, rent here and there by the thorns he had encountered, and dyed by frequent contact with the soil his ploughshare had upturned. He sat motionless; his long limbs hanging straight down, as if they had nothing else to do, and his feet projected like two wooden pegs on which to hang his great leather shoes. Around his shoulders—more for ornament than use this warm summer day, unless he contended, with Irish logic, that what would keep the cold out would keep the heat out also—was thrown the blue cape of a soldier's coat, reaching just below his waist. His straight yellow locks hung, behind a pair of ears the donkey must have envied, in stubbled luxuriance over the collar; and surmounting all, like a helmet with the vizor raised, was a coarse straw hat, the brim turned up against the crown with a reckless disregard of the power of the sun's rays refreshing to behold. Indeed, I think all the iron in his blood had been changed by King Sol's secret alchemy into the great brown spots that freckled his face like oases on a desert, or, that is, like sand-heaps on a prairie.

Our overflowing mirth was held in check by the doctor's grave yet quizzical eye, for he spied our sorrow-stricken domestic coming near. He advanced to meet her, and, taking her bundle from her hands, assisted her to the back seat of the vehicle, and sprang in after her.

A politely-expressed wish from him that we might not find our duties overwhelming, and a parting injunction from Biddy "to mind the roast," the solemn charioteer drew the reins, and with a sharp snap of his whip communicated to the ears of his steed his desire to proceed. The obedient donkey started, but, probably indignant at his unwonted load, stood stock still again; till, by dint of numerous pushings and applications of the whip, and finally by Peter's familiar voice threatening to see if a bonfire would not start him, he sprang forward suddenly, thereby entirely upsetting our gravity, and nearly dislodging the driver from his narrow seat, despite the great shoes that might have served as sufficient ballast for a ship.

They had gone, and we went in and closed the door. Here was a situation certainly. A combination of circumstances that no strategy could circumvent. The citadel of our difficulties must be taken by storm—and such raw recruits! How we had hailed the promised year that should intervene between our boarding-school life and our induction into the culinary art as a blessed reprieve. How we had ruffled and tucked, embroidered and braided, the contents of our bureau drawers. And now to be hurried from our passive enjoyments into active service! It was too much. To be sure, there were not many to prepare for; only dear, quiet papa, whom we wished to gratify; and tall, teasing brother Richard, before whom we wished to acquit ourselves honorably. So we took up our line of march toward headquarters, and, after considerable reconnaissance, we put ourselves in possession of the implements of war; but how to use them, and where to commence?

"Well, Em," said I, "what shall we do first?"

"I don't know," said she; "I acknowledge you captain of this emergency, or mistress of this mansion, just as you please," and she gave me a military salute, then a drawing-room courtesy.

"Dear me," said I, "I feel as though old Atlas had rolled his burden on my shoulders. Are not the wrinkles of care already discernible on my brow?"

"There certainly is some corrugation there," said Em, "but knowing you as I do, I should say it was rather chargeable to your disposition than to your responsibilities. But seriously, cousin, I think we, two intelligent and accomplished young ladies, can manage to feed a couple of hungry masculines. So do bestir yourself, and give your orders, and they shall be obeyed without demur."

Happily remembering Biddy's last words, I peeped with fear and trembling into the oven. The "roast" was doing nicely; a cream-pie was just ready for the table, and I sent Em to the garden to see if there were not some late strawberries with which to eke out our dessert. Then I put the peas and potatoes into the kettle of boiling water that stood ready, and commenced arranging the table. Everything seemed to be going on swimmingly, and I remarked to Em as she came in with the berries, that the domestic groove was worn so deep that things would come right of themselves by force of habit. She shook her head, but said nothing.

Papa and Dick came in due time, and everything was ready; so we replaced our soiled white aprons with fresh ones, and thought perhaps they would not see the grease spots on our fancy morning dresses. I explained to them how matters stood, and we all sat down to the table. The beef was rather overdone, and Dick said I had left the preservative element out of the potato. Then papa inquired for the early peas he had sent home. I replied I thought they must have been very young and tender, for they had boiled so soft I could not get them out of the pods.

"Very likely they were, dear," said papa, with a queer little smile. But Dick laughed outright.

"Surely, sister," said he, "you did not put in pods and all?"

"Why, of course I did; I know Bridget boils potatoes in their jackets; besides, you would not have the poor little peas hopping about in the boiling water on their own individual account; I am sure if they had each indulged in a separate scald, I never should have found them; even within the protecting pod they were utterly without form."

Dick nearly choked himself with laughter, but when the pie and berries appeared, he was somewhat mollified, though he could not forbear some teasing allusions to our mistakes.

"I would have you know, Mr. Richard Churchill," said I, "that everything eatable before you was prepared by Bridget, and it is very doubtful whether your dainty palate will be at all suited to-morrow. It is much easier to eat a good dinner than to cook one."

"My! sister, what a sage remark; how house-keeping develops you. I should think you had been through a course of metaphysics."

"Well, sir, if your mind had little more of a philosophical turn, perhaps you would be enabled to eat an ill-dressed dinner with somewhat of grace seasoned with patience."

"Minus the salt, eh, sister?"

But papa said: "Never mind, dear; we shall see, some time, how fine a dinner Mrs. Richard can get up, if report says true."

Dick's face crimsoned, and during the few moments that we lingered at the table, he seemed endeavoring to ascertain how many strawberries he could swallow whole, his cheek taking a deeper tinge with every one he ate. But when we went into the library to enjoy our quiet after-dinner talk, the pleasantest of the day, Dick lifted his head and threw back his dark hair, in his own careless, graceful way, and with the crimson stain still on his cheek, said to papa: "It is true, sir, Alice Ray promised last night to be my wife."

Papa grasped his hand, and they stood looking into each other's eyes, those two men; the one calm and serene, as though he had reached the very noon-tide of happiness, as well as of life; the other eager and hopeful, with the bright vista of life just opening before him.

"Then you love this fair girl, my son, better than father or mother, sister or brother?"

"Better than all, father."

"God bless and keep you happy, my boy," and, pressing a kiss on the white, open brow of his son, papa left the room.

Then Dick drew Em and me to the sofa, and I just threw both arms around his neck and kissed him, partly for joy, and partly for sorrow, and wholly for sympathy and love.

"Why, sister," said he, the tears of feeling glistening in his eyes, "what a happy fellow your husband will be, if that is the way you hug people."

"But it is not; I am ashamed of you, to think I would kiss any tall, bearded man who was not my brother."

"But your husband, sister."

"No, I would not; I'd only give him a dainty little bit of a kiss."

"I guess you are all alike," said he. "She would not give me any more, but that was very sweet," and the mounting color and quivering lip told how very dear this fair wild flower had become to the strong man.

Then said Em, softly: "I should fear to inspire such great love."

"I foresee, cousin," said Dick, "that such love will be offered to you; see that you do not slight it."

"I would not slight it, but I hope it will be long in coming. I should want time to grow beautiful. I should want every member of my body to round out and develop into complete symmetry; the very chambers of my soul to grow effulgent, as with the amber light of heaven; every flower of my heart to be in fragrant and perennial bloom; its sanctuary burnished and golden, from whose altar the incense of love and virtue was ever rising."

"But, Emma," said I, "love must be the transforming power. I would rather receive from my husband's eyes a new baptism of light each day, than bathe in any fabled fountain of youth and beauty. I would rather he should discover the rich ore of my mind, with all its dross and obscurities, and set, the refiner, until his image be reflected there, than offer him the gems of thought, all pure and shining, that were yet unpolished by his hand. I would rather he should enter the holy of holies, by right of his priestly office, than receive any oblation from 'broidered altar-cloth or sculptured chalice.'"

Then we all sat quietly musing for a while, till Em broke the silence by exclaiming:—

"Well, I dare say it is all very fine, but those very practical and unpoetic dishes must be washed, and our outward woman must be arrayed in suitable attire. I am afraid, Richard, your rose-lit dreams have awakened our sensibilities to the detriment of our senses, and the prosaic duties of common life will ill accord with our tastes and feelings."

Mrs. Goodman's Ann then brought in a tin pan full of queer looking animals she called crabs, "with Miss Goodman's compliments," she said. "She knew my par was so fond of 'em, as he came from Connecticut, where crabs grew. Miss Goodman's cousin come and brought 'em."

"We are without help, you know, Ann; how shall we cook them, so as to surprise papa at tea."

"Oh, just bile 'em, mem, till they get red, like lobster; put 'em on pretty soon, and they 'll bile themselves, mem."

The sun was looking in at the western windows when we were ready for the parlor. Then Doctor Hamilton came in to say that his patient had the fever and ague; indeed it was quite prevalent in that district. He spoke of the destitution of some families he had visited, and enlisted Em's sympathies in a plan for their assistance, and he argued and she applauded till I grew weary and nervous, not that I was selfish and uninterested, but the Doctor had a way of forgetting me when talking to my cousin. To be sure, our acquaintance was but brief, but he had thus early manifested his preference. At last his eye followed my frequent glances toward the French clock on the mantle, and he jumped up, saying he believed we must be sirens, trying to beguile his hours away, or else Father Time had taken to the hop, skip, and jump, in his old age."

Em replied: "Time is the same monotonous old fellow as ever; it is your interest in your work, contrasted with the tedium of your office hours, that makes the day seem short."

"Pray, doctor," said I, "do you mark the hours with pills as Linnæus did with flowers?"

"I hope to mark them with good deeds, with fruits instead of flowers. You will acknowledge with Linnæus, Miss Churchill, that the bitter is often as important as the sweet."

"There, he's gone at last," said I. "Now for a look into the kitchen." One look was enough to set us both screaming and scrambling, and we landed simultaneously on the table. Those horrid crabs were alive, after being boiled; half a dozen of them were meandering about the floor in a sort of one-sided gait anything but graceful; others were picking up their claws as fast as possible from the hot stove, only to put them down again on the same blistering surface; and one, who, like Lot's wife, thought there was plenty of time, had just begun to tilt the pot-lid in a desperate fashion, but it was of no use; he finally succumbed, and we had at least one "blied" crab.

But it would not do to survey this lively scene at a distance. We must get these creatures out of sight before Dick came home; so, armed with tongs and broom, we succeeded in getting them into the dust-pan, and from that into a covered basket with the lid tied down. Well, at any rate, papa would not know how disappointed he ought to be, and we hurried to lay the table in all the glitter of glass and silver, remembering that old Hannah Brown used to say, "When she had not much to eat, she put on all her dishes, it seemed more sociable like."

Dick said it was a pleasant meal to him. "The tea reminded him of the dear old time when we all sang 'Harvest Home' in grandpa's meadow land."

"How so?" asked I, with a gratified smile.

"Because," he replied, "it has such an unmistakable flavor of hay. I should judge that it was a decoction of that pungent commodity."

His mocking words provoked me, but I kept my countenance serene; and, when he passed his cup to be replenished, I slyly put in five lumps of sugar, knowing he detested sweet tea. He tasted it, and astonished papa by asking if lumps of sugar could in any way be considered coals of fire on one's head.

Our evening threatened to be a dull one. Dick had gone to Love's rehearsal, and papa was closeted with a fussy old business friend who hated the sound of a piano. It was club night, and no beaux could be expected; so we betook ourselves to the piazza, and wandered up and down in the moonlight till our gossamer dresses grew damp with the evening dew. Having failed to make Em see anything but cows and dull-eyed owls in the fantastic shapes the leaves took on with the moonbeams peeping through them, and to my eye seemed shining birds of Paradise or Druids at their solemn feasts, I drew her into the house, and begged her to resume the reading of the morning.

"Not I," said she. "I am a different being. I could not get myself up to so grand a level. I have often thought if I were a common housemaid, I would improve my mind, and be something to myself, if I were nothing to anybody else. But I see how it is; I like to read, but I believe my tastes are changing. I am going on a hunt for the cook-book; that breakfast to come hangs like the sword of Damocles over my head."

"Fie, Em, what a rusty old simile! If I ever write a story, that remarkable piece of steel shall be suspended by the sixteenth part of a cobweb over my hero, and, if he don't do all that is expected of him, it shall fall and sever his jugular in twain."

"Angels and ministers of grace defend him!" said Em, crossing herself. "But that will be an end to your story."

"Not at all. It will give some other enterprising young man a fair chance."

But my listener had vanished, and I think she had found the pepper, if not the cook-book, from the succession of sneezes I heard in that direction. I hastened out to ask what the matter was; but she sneezingly bade me depart, which I did, taking the peppery volume from her hand, and telling her "while she was about it, she had better execute all the sneezes left to her natural life."

By the time she returned to the parlor, I had determined on a nice breakfast, for I could toast bread, and boil eggs hard if not soft. I told her the result of my investigations, and she agreed with me. It was just the thing, but she advised me not to try muffins, as I had no yeast.

"Yeast!" said I, contemptuously. "If I put all the other ingredients in, you will not miss that."

"But Richard missed the salt from the potato balls."

"Well, what is yeast," asked I, "but a little flour or something in a state of fermentation, and what produces fermentation but a mixing of incongruous particles that show their dislike to each other by spreading themselves as far as they can, consequently pushing their neighbors to one side or over the top? I once heard a famous lecturer say that Europe called America the repository of all the scum of the earth, and that he himself gloried in the implied stigma, for the fermentation arose from the fact that the self-governing principles in the hearts of the masses could not submit to be king-ruled or priest-ridden, and the little leaven worked and rose, till the upheaval sought space to spread in our own fair land. Hence I shall mix the muffins to-night, and give the component parts time to disagree."

"I don't know," said Em. "If all the imported ignorance we have over here is a specimen of scum in general, I would rather have the sodden, unleavened mass."

I rose the next morning before the larks had begun to dream of day, performed a hasty ablution, and twisted my long, wavy hair into the tightest possible knot; put on a green gingham dress and a long, broad, and brown apron, whose shield-like bib spread itself over my bust, then hastened down to prepare breakfast. Em soon followed, and, seizing the poker, bade Richard quit the field, now he had made the fire for us. He reappeared in about two hours, begging for anything, so that he might have it then.

Luckily the last muffin was baked, and brother expressed himself paid for waiting, the principal dish looked so inviting. I had arranged the toast-bread on a large platter, placed the hashed meat smoking on top of it, and sliced the boiled eggs for garniture, and we did ample justice to it, poor, hungry mortals that we were. I was not so sure about the muffins. They looked all right on the outside, for I had filled the rings, and they baked just as they were, without manifesting any upward tendency, and I begun to suspect there was not as much antagonism between flour, milk, and eggs as I had imagined. Dick broke one, and began, solemnly: "And it came to pass in the days of unleavened bread"—But Em flared up at this, and told him the muffins were made according to the most scientific principles, that we had gone even to the old world for deductions, and had cited the mighty men of the age in support of our theory.

Dick thought perhaps there had been too much brought to bear upon them, or else they fell like heads of wheat, from their own intrinsic merit.

I am not going to tell how that long morning rolled its minutes away, one after the other, faster and faster, gathering momentum as they approached the dinner hour; or how wearied out two patient girls were who sat down to the table that day. But I must tell something about the dinner itself.

Dick helped us all very generously to beef-steak, and then paused. "Really, girls," he said, "this is something new. I have eaten boned turkey, but I never saw any flayed chicken before. I don't believe Delmonico himself would have thought of that. On the whole, I feel like giving your dinner the toast the Irishman gave his regiment, 'Here's to the glorious 79th, equal to none.'"

Poor, innocent Dick! Of course, he supposed the fowls had been sent ready for the oven as usual; 'twas not so, however. The farmer's wife sent word she was "took sick," and could not "dress" them. Everybody seemed to be "took sick" at a very inconvenient time; and, as for the chickens not being dressed, I think they were dressed altogether too much for the occasion; I'm sure they had on all they ever wore, excepting their heads.

Nothing daunted, Em and I went to work. Of course, we did not know that a hot bath would loosen the feathers, and we gave several unsuccessful tugs at the plumage. "Now," says Em, "for a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull altogether." And, well, the feathers came out, and the skin with them. Oh, it was dreadful! The dry feathers flew all about the room, stuck in our hair, and singed themselves on the stove; each particular quill coming out with such a squeak and a groan that Em declared "she never would believe in manifestations again, if the spirit of that hen was not in purgatory." We did not dare to undertake the internal arrangements, so I took the strange-looking birds over to Mrs. Goodman's to see if Ann would not help us.

"To be sure, mem," said she. "Who picked 'em, mem?"

"My cousin and myself," I answered.

"Poor critters, mem!" said she. But I don't know whether she meant us or the fowls.

We had succeeded in making a very nice, delicate pudding for dessert, and Em took a dish of it to a sick girl in the neighborhood, while I put things in order. We had not understood the expansive qualities of milk when at the boiling point, and the kitchen stove was in a deplorable state. Now this stove was Bridget's especial pride, and it always shone like a "glass bottle," as she said, and I knew she kept her blacking always prepared in case an unlucky grease spot should chance to mar its ebony hue. What would she say if she should see it now, I thought? And it would never do to let mother see it either. So I found the blacking, and went to work. 'Tis true that I applied the long-handled brush with more determination than dexterity, but I spared neither strength nor material. The stove was pretty hot, and the inky fluid spluttered and splattered most musically, and I rubbed and brushed, and brushed and rubbed, in a vain attempt to put the polish on.

Just as I was beginning to see a little light in the midst of all this darkness, the door-bell rang. "Oh, dear! misfortunes never come singly," I said to myself. I glanced at the clock; quarter of two, much too early for calls, and there were no trains from anywhere between the hours of twelve and three. It must be a peddler or that provoking Em herself. I drew off the old gloves that protected my hands, gave my hair a little instinctive brush, and, as I went through the hall, took up the corner of my brown apron, and wiped the perspiration from my heated face, then opened the door. No peddler, that was certain, but a gentleman, exquisite and elegant, from the crown of his glossy beaver to the very tip of his shining patent leathers. He inquired if any of Mr. Churchill's family were in.

"None," I informed him, "but myself; I was their daughter."

A most singular and amused expression shot over his face for an instant, but the glossy beam came off immediately, and he handed me a letter of introduction. Small need of that; I knew only too well that he was brother Henry's particular and elegant friend, Hugh Walsingham. I expected a call from him in about two weeks, but did not think he could possibly get here before that time expired. Henry had insisted that I must not fall in love until I had seen him, and here he was. What a regretful sigh fluttered up to my dressing room, where lay in undisturbed repose that becoming dress, and dainty, ruffled white apron I meant to don when a bit of enamelled card-board engraved with that magic name should come to my room. I welcomed him with what grace I could, and inquired, with the air of a queen, who had all her subjects at command, if he had dined. "He had, at the hotel," he said.

"Thank heaven!" I inwardly ejaculated.

I did not know how I could apologize for my dress, so soiled and crumpled, for, though I knew my visitor was Northern by birth and in principle, he was decidedly Southern in taste and education, and could hardly be brought to believe that a lady could degrade herself by work in the kitchen. He was travelling abroad with his invalid mother during the war, and had only just returned, so that he did not realize the change that had come over the dark eyed daughters of Dixie. However, my brother was a subject of mutual interest, and we glided easily into conversation, going from one topic to another, till we were quite acquainted. Of course, I made great exertions to be agreeable enough to do away with any impression my dress might have made upon him. There was at last a slight pause in the conversation, and he said:—

"I beg you will excuse me, but you have blacked your face a little in some way."

"Have I?" said I, carelessly, taking out my handkerchief and wiping my cheek, and seeing the linen had received a stain, supposed it removed from my face.

Mr. Walsingham turned suddenly to look out of the window, and spoke of the view as being quite pleasant. I inquired about the scenery he had witnessed in his travels, and he replied to me in a most entertaining way, describing very vividly what he had most admired in the old world. How I enjoyed the call! If I had only looked my prettiest, I'm sure I should have made a conquest. He seemed pleased with me as it was, laughing so readily and heartily when I said anything at all witty, and smiling so winningly every time his eye met mine. He was not what I would call handsome, but he had very good features, dazzling teeth, and the merriest laughing eyes I ever saw. He rose to go at last, saying he should do himself the pleasure of calling again when brother Henry returned, if I would permit him. I assured him that Harry's heart was set on having a long visit from him, and papa and mother would be equally pleased.

"And yourself, Miss Churchill, may I hope you will give me as hearty a welcome?"

"Oh, certainly," I replied; "my brother's friends are mine. I hope you will not find me in such a plight when you come again, though I am sure your feelings are not influenced by so trivial a matter as one's outward adorning."

"Thank you for your good opinion, but I fear I shall have to confess that I think a proper attention to the minutiae of dress gives charm and zest 'to the small sweet courtesies of life.'"

I was conscious of blushing deeply as he took my hand a moment at parting, and said: "If you have any occasion to remember this conversation, Miss Churchill, please remember that I said that a highly cultivated mind, and a sweetly-pleasing manner, have far greater attractions for me than any grace or beauty of person. And good-by till we meet again."

I drew a long breath of relief as I went out to the dining-room. I heard Em rattling things about in the kitchen, so I called out to her:—

"O Em," said I, "Hugh Walsingham, 'that glorious old Hugh,' as Harry calls him, has been here; he is perfectly delightful. I'm sure you would have been charmed. I wish you could have seen him."

"If you were very anxious about it, why did you not call me?" said Em, coming into the room where I sat.

"Because you were such a fright. I did not want him to think papa kept a menagerie."

She looked at me a moment in open-mouthed astonishment; then burst into a fit of uncontrollable laughter, breaking forth with a fresh peal at everything I said. I began to think my talent for wit was suddenly developed, or else this afternoon had brought me more than ordinary appreciation. How that girl did laugh! I really thought she had gone demented, and I told her if she did not stop, I would go for Doctor Hamilton. She tried to gasp out something that I could not understand. She was evidently past speaking, but she signified by a sort of frantic movement that I was to look in the glass. I looked, and what a sight was there, "my countrymen!" Mr. W. said I had blacked my face a little. Indeed, I should think I had. I was hideous to behold. The tattooed queen of the Cannibal Islands could not have looked worse. The tip of my nose was entirely blackened, forming an opaque centre, from which, so to speak, the rays of darkness diverged toward the ears. This same nasal organ was marked across its bridge with a jagged line that set both eyes askint. My chin formed the nucleus of a comet, whose dusky train swept its erratic course half round my throat; while on my snowy brow seemed emblazoned all my secret sins in characters too broad and deep for any phylactery ever to conceal! My visitor must have thought I was some grotesquely painted goddess, strayed from the Hindoo jungle; or that my fertile brain had conjured up some weird, mysterious, fantasy, whose cabalistic meaning was symbolized upon my face! How every smile must have seemed a grimace; every artless, engaging way like the trick of a trained monkey! I remembered wiping my face on my apron before I opened the door. Yes, there was the cause of my disfigurement. That unlucky breadth of calico was covered with an infinitesimal spatter of stove polish, or, at least, that part of the smutty substance that had not adhered to my visage. If I had been a man, I should have broken seventeen commandments at one smash, but as it was, I sat down and helped Em laugh, and the peals of merriment that issued from that room would have made a cynic hold his sides from sympathy. We laughed, and cried, and went through a regular course of hysterics, before I could rouse myself to action. Then, armed with a scrubbing brush and a quart of soft soap, I proceeded to the bath-room. When I came out, I might have been red, but I certainly was not black. Em, herself, acknowledged that I outshone "our biled crab."

Was I not glad to see my mother when she came home? I had registered a secret vow that if I lived till she came, I would learn to keep house or die in the attempt.

That evening when we were enjoying our quiet home chat, Doctor Hamilton came in, and by way of entertainment, Dick began to tell him and mother about our blunders, in a most amusing way. He did enjoy any such thing so much that I said to Em:—

"Do tell them, coz, how things went on behind the scenes, and Dick, do not feel at all delicate about laughing all you wish to."

So Em told them all that had occurred, in a most ludicrous and graphic style. When she got to the chapter on crabs, I could not keep still, but must cry out:—

"Oh, mother, we were going to cook the poor creatures alive. We supposed they had been already killed."

Doctor and Dick fairly yelled. They had both been in the army, and thought they knew everything about cooking.

"It was all right to put them in alive," said mother, "but you should have put them in scalding water; of course, they were not going to submit to slow torture; so as the water grew gradually warm, they very sensibly crawled out."

Em went on with the recital, not sparing Dick, who lay on the sofa in perfect paroxysms of laughter, till, when describing my attempts at fascinating the distinguished stranger, she said, "You know, Dick, she would rather be the unfinished picture, to be retouched and beautified by his hand, than be a whole gallery of paintings that had not received the imprint of his genius." Then mother begged her to desist, for poor Dick was actually writhing in convulsions, and the rest were dangerously near to it. Em and I were the only sedate ones of the party. The collected wit of the universe, condensed into one titillating sentence, would not have brought the ghost of a smile to our faces; the reaction was too great.

When brother Henry returned, Mr. Walsingham came with him, and spent the bright autumn days with us, and I don't exactly know how it all came about, whether he found I was not so black as I was painted, or whether, after patient winnowing, he found the little golden kernel lodged somewhere in my nature, but this I know: last night, under the shadowing roof-tree, I gave him the little bit of a kiss that sealed me his betrothed.

MY HEART, MY HEART IS AWEARY.

FROM THE GERMAN OF H. HEINE.

My heart, my heart is aweary,
Though the bright May day is so still;
I sit in the shade of the linden,
High on the ancient hill.

Beneath, the moat's blue waters
Are calmly flowing away;
A boy in a tiny boat is angling,
And whistling a merry lay.

Beyond is a mellow landscape,
Misty and rainbow hued;
Mansions and gardens and people,
Cattle and meadows and wood.

Some maidens are bleaching linen—
Through the fragrant clover they come;
The mill-wheel is scattering diamonds,
I can tell by the musical hum.

Close to the moss-grown tower
Stands the sentry-box, ancient and gray;
A sentinel, crimson-coated, is passing,
As he paces there, day after day.

He toys with a bright new rifle,
That gleams in the sunbeams red;
Presents arms—takes aim—then fires!
Ah! would he had shot me dead.

FALLING IN LOVE.

NOVELISTS are accountable for the inculcation of not a few follies of thought and sentiment; and with novelists we would bracket poets, who, indeed, are even more extreme in teaching the absolute supremacy of sentiment over self-control, and the beauty lying in the sublimities of unpractical romance rather than in the commonplace levels of reason and common sense. And in nothing do they inculcate more the impossibility of human nature to attain to real moral restraint, and the necessity it has for giving way to sentimental fancies and instinctive passions, than in the manner of falling in love. Assuredly Love is the best, the dearest, the purest thing on earth—that which gives the most happiness, that which inspires the noblest deeds; but that love is worthiest which is wisest and most unselfish, and which gives the lover a moral standard up to which to live and be worthy of. Yet this is not the love which writers for the most part idealize. They never rank the affections before the passions, and morality is by no means so great a thing in their hands as self-indulgence and the exercise of an unbridled will. If there is an unwise affaire, out of which any one who had reason enough wherewith to control inclination would keep himself or herself with most careful diligence, they make their heroes and heroines rush into it as irresistibly as Edgar Poe's ship went down into his fabled Maelstrom—as certainly as Sinbad's vessel flew all to pieces on the loadstone rock; and when they also have broken themselves to pieces—when they have wilfully dashed themselves against the rocks, and have not a whole spar saved out of the shipwreck they have made of their own happiness, then they cry out against the unyielding nature of rocks, and the destructive powers of the Maelstrom; they fall foul of the social law against the might of which they have measured their own, and expect that others shall sympathize with their broken lives and bleeding hearts, and pity the woe to which they have piloted themselves. Yet the shipwreck they have made was patent to the whole world as inevitable. They were urged, advised, entreated to beware, to refrain, to steer quite another course; the shoals and reefs on which they were drifting with such insane persistency were pointed out to them, the places where others had made shipwreck before them carefully noted down, but it was all of no avail; they were in love, and that was answer sufficient why he should marry an artful, scheming, and untrustworthy woman—why she should give herself to a man bankrupt in purse and in name, and whose solitary merit was a handsome face or a fascinating manner.

They were in love, and what can you expect? indeed, what could they do, given this condition? For it is always assumed that falling in love is a thing quite out of one's own control, and that once in that state all else must be given up to it. It is never supposed for a moment that people can prevent themselves from falling in love, and that it is their duty to so prevent themselves from the very beginning, if their love should be unwise, or lead to disastrous results—not to speak of wicked ones. Love is assumed to be the lord of all, and the soul must capitulate at once, without striking a blow, or offering the shadow of a defence. Elective affinities and the realization of ideals on the one hand, discord of nature and disillusionment on the other, are sufficient excuses to those sentimental ladies and gentlemen who write love stories, even when they make them turn on the neglect of such a homely, old-fashioned old code as is to be found in the ten commandments; but when they have to deal with the love affair of two young people, which is simply foolish and not criminal, then un wisdom sinks into nothing in proportion to the immense, the irresistible power of the impulse, and the majesty of love is vindicated, though reason and wisdom go discredited. If Jules and Juliette rush into eternity by means of charcoal, and because of the obduracy of parents who see a little clearer than they, and who know that Jules, accustomed to all the luxuries of a jeunesse dorée, is not likely to make Juliette happy on a thousand dollars a year, which is all that the little pleasures of foreign travel have left him out of his inheritance—if William and Mary get married secretly, and in defiance of paternal advice and maternal bugbears of a more detailed kind, and live in a garret with love, poverty, and squalling children as their portion, the love for which these poor idiots have braved death and misery is quoted as sublime; and the poet and the novelist idealize the folly with which the satirists were the best men to deal. Yet that suicide of the one was quite unnecessary. After a few sacres on Jules's part, and a great many tears on Juliette's, each would have fallen in with the plans of their respective parents. He, with his ruined fortunes, would have married some good made-moiselle who had enough for both, and he would have made her tolerably happy, and perhaps happier than he would have made Juliette. For his character is a little difficult, according to the idiom; he is not innocent of jealousy, nor yet of suspicion; and in all probability he would have translated for the future benefit of his too impulsive, too confiding little wife Brabantio's celebrated axiom to Othello, and have reminded her more than once that the woman who had deceived her father would more than probably deceive her husband after; and so the miserable round of wrong would be played out, as it generally is in such cases. As for Juliette, she would have been given to a gros bonhomme who would have loved her and been tender of her, and she would have had children who would have satisfied her soul and rendered her life blessed and busy ; and in time the two lovers could have met quite tranquilly together—these two who had been so passionately attached that nothing but charcoal and eternity could satisfy them—and, after the hesitation of a moment, would have exchanged confidences and hand-shakes, and been rational, calm, and pleasant friends. Without doubt, too, Jules would have said below his breath, “How fat she has grown !” and Juliette would have laughed and sighed together as she whispered to her gros bonhomme, “How bald this poor Jules has become !” and both would have thought fate might perhaps have dealt with them more cruelly than in keeping them apart. But no ! they saw nothing of all this, believed in no future, no healing, no calm. In their angry despair there was nothing left them but a chauffrette and closed windows, and death in each other's arms as their apotheosis of love and constancy. The same with William and Mary. He would have gone out to California, where he would have worked off much superfluous energy of sorrow in the bush or maybe at the mines. He would have thought a great deal about Mary, and he would have determined in his own mind to be faithful unto death, and beyond ; while Mary would have first fretted, then taken to district visiting—perhaps she would have become a Sister for the time—and finally would have married Mr. Heavyside, who had loved her all along, and who had a balance at his banker's which made matrimony possible. And then, when William had seen the marriage quoted in the California papers, he would have settled down on his own account, and have made the barren wilderness of his life a blooming garden before it was too late. But what young person will ever believe that love is not the sole thing in life worth living for, and that, when once this is taken from them in its perfectness, there is aught left to fill its place ? No philanthropy, no home duties, no intellectual advancement, no compensation of small pleasures and tender affections ; there is nothing for them, according to their philosophy ; and so they throw away what they might have had of joy and serenity, and go in for the doctrine of all or none ; all, with future misery as certain as annihilation. And fiction writers and poets bolster up this foolish creed with their more foolish praises, and lead still more astray those whom youth and ignorance, and the undisciplined force of the passions, have already set face foremost towards the wrong point.

It is very delicious to fall in love ; quite as delicious for the fiftieth time as the second. We omit the first, which is the prime time of all, the one unapproachable and ineffable. But, save this, one falling in love is very much the same as another, and all are, as we said, delicious. So are many other things, yet in which we may not indulge ourselves. But we do not cry out against the hardship which forbids us to eat fruit because it does not agree with us, which denies us a carriage, a horse, fine pictures, choice wines, because we cannot afford them. The man or woman who wept and took all other things askew because these did not lie straight to his or her desires, would be held a mere sensualist, whose sorrows no one would commiserate. But it is quite another thing when it comes to falling in love, which is, however, as manageable a want in the beginning as the desire for money and money's worth ; and the denial of which, if folks would but control the first issues of the soul, ought to be as bearable as the denial of sweets and fruits because of that unaccommodating digestion of yours. This sounds high treason in the ears of the young and romantic, but we, the “hoary old” and the experienced, know how incontestable its truth. In our complicated state of society, there is so much more than that sympathy and fitness of feeling, which we call love, to be considered in a marriage. We are not savages to be content with a few blankets hung on poles, and the produce of our own spear and fish hook ; nor cottiers to whom four mud walls, a patch of potatoes, and if we are very ambitious, a side of bacon would be all the wealth we could desire ; but the children of a fastidious, eager, seeking generation, who want many things to make life easy, and to whom love is only one of the many. This is just the kernel of the case. Love is only one of many things absolutely necessary to happiness, decency, and self-respect. Grant that you get none of these three conditions in a marriage made without love ; grant that fully ; yet neither would love alone of necessity include them. They are dependent on many matters—fruits hanging from various trees ; and those who choose to throw aside every other consideration for the mere sake of love, and that love a foolish one, will find themselves in the end stripped of the happiness they have grasped so blindly—of the decency which comes from a life in harmony with the times—of the self-respect which is the product of self-control and dutiful obedience to the higher law of a wise and necessary renunciation.

WHEN our hatred is violent, it sinks us even beneath those we hate.—La Rochefoucauld.

GOLD is the fool's curtain, which hides all his defects from the world.—Feltbam.

ORDER is a lovely nymph, the child of Beauty and Wisdom ; her attendants are Comfort, Neatness, and Activity ; her abode is the Valley of Happiness. She is always to be found when sought for, and never appears so lovely as when contrasted with her opponent—Disorder.—Johnson.

MAXWELL ALLEN'S NEW-YEAR'S CALLS.

BY S. ANNIE FROST.

"If this is your first New-Year's Day in W——, you must make calls with me. We are near enough to New York to conform to that custom."

"Thank you. This is not my first year in W——. I was here some years ago, and was about to inquire of you about a family in which I felt some interest."

"Yes? Whose may that be? I believe I know most of our old residents."

"They are not old residents, having moved here from New York about seven years ago. The name is Barclay." An innocent sounding name enough, but spoken with a difficulty that rather surprised the hearer.

"Barclay! I don't seem to remember," he said, musingly. "Oh, yes, yes! The father failed in business, did he not?"

"I believe he did."

"He came here, as you say, about seven years ago with his wife and two children, little girls then, the eldest one a cripple."

"I did not know the family."

"Very sad affair. The child was injured by the fall of a piece of furniture when the family moved from New York. It was said that an operation could have been performed, and a peculiar form of treatment for the spine undertaken; but the expense was too great to be incurred at the time, and she became a cripple for life. She is very patient, I have heard, and able to assist her mother in her sewing and such work as does not require her to move about much."

"Do you call there?"

"Well, to tell the truth, Mrs. Barclay is not—not—I mean does not receive callers. Since her husband died"—

"Dead!"

"Oh, yes! He died four or five years ago, and left them very poor. They say his partner embezzled funds, and caused his failure; be that as it may, the family was left almost destitute. Mrs. Barclay learned dressmaking; Clara, the crippled daughter, who is quite a young lady now, assists her; and Louie, the other little girl, is still at school."

"Do you know how old the daughters are?"

"Clara must be eighteen or nineteen, Louie about thirteen."

"And they are very poor?"

"Well, you know, Max, dressmaking in a town as small as W—— will hardly support three people in luxury."

"True, true. You think the daughter is incurable?"

"I do not know that. There was some talk of sending her to a hospital; but her mother thought her too sensitive and delicate to be removed from her own care, and the idea was abandoned. To be frank with you, all I know of them at all is mere gossip. Mrs. Barclay is my mother's dressmaker, and she chats with my sisters about the family."

"Where do they live?"

"231 Elm Street. But, come, if we make calls to-day, it is time we were moving."

"Pray excuse me. I am not acquainted here, and my stay will probably be but a short one."

"I should be glad to introduce you."

"You are very kind, but I must decline your offer. Do not let me detain you now, but come in and see me to-morrow."

"Well, if you will excuse me"—and with a few more words of parting the gentlemen separated; Maxwell Allen to shut himself in his room at the hotel, Walter Putnam to speed homeward to dress for New Year's calls.

The latter-named gentleman need only be introduced as a young lawyer who had just returned from a business trip to San Francisco, and his introduction of his companion to his family will suffice for mine, for the present, to my readers. He described him as "A first-rate fellow I met in San Francisco, clerk in a dry-goods house, and now buying goods in New York. I do not know his business in W——; but he says he will be here for a week, probably, and will remain in New York for several months, settling some business for the firm employing him. We came home on the same steamer, and I like him, though he is the most reserved man about his own affairs I ever met."

The comment of Miss Caroline Putnam was: "He is not handsome, but has a good face. I know he is honorable by his expression."

"And very gentlemanly," was Miss Ida's rejoinder.

"Honorable!" That was the verdict.

Pacing up and down the room he called his own in the hotel, muttering between his set teeth, the gentleman's thoughts ran in this wise: "How can I ever atone? Poor, crippled, suffering! Oh! how can I repair this hideous wrong? I have no money, only a salary sufficient for mere living; no influence; not even a physician's knowledge to offer to the child. O Heavenly Father, if the sins of the father are visited upon the children, forgive and pity me! Show me how to atone for this misery!" Suddenly (some thought seemed to strike him as a relief, for his face brightened a little, and he ceased his monotonous walk. "I can do that," he said, in a low tone. "It will serve for an introduction at any rate. I will call at once."

Leaving him to carry out his idea, we will look in upon the inmates of 231 Elm Street.

It was New-Year's Day, and the hour when fashionable saloons were filling with guests, but there was no sign of preparation for callers in Mrs. Barclay's sitting-room. The widow herself was stitching on a heavy silk dress, and Louie, at her feet, was ripping up an old garment for alteration. A commonplace group, merely a middle-aged lady and little girl sewing, but looking in the window-seat a different impression was given. At first glance one might easily have fancied the winter sunshine falling upon an angel, rising from the clouds, so exquisite was the fair face seen above a creamy froth of soft white lace. It was Clara Barclay, finishing a bridal dress of tulle and lace. Her small figure was completely lost in the mass of snowy material, for the bride elect was very tall, and the dress was carefully gathered into the invalid's great arm-chair to preserve it from contact with the floor. The face delicately lovely, with short golden curls, violet eyes, and exquisitely moulded features; the small white hands and above all the expression of patience and sweetness, all seemed removed from the mere everyday atmosphere of dressmaking; but, after all, poetry aside, it was merely a lame girl sewing for her daily bread.

"New-Year's Day," said Louie, tugging at a refractory thread in her ripping. "I wonder if Mrs. James is wearing that pearl silk she was in such a hurry for?"

"Probably. Mrs. James will have a full drawing-room by this time, no doubt," said Mrs. Barclay, a vision of her own well-filled saloons of former years flitting for a moment before her eyes.

"It won't take long to count our callers," said Louie, "and our presents consist of one Dutch cake, left by the baker, and my 'reward of merit' book from school."

"Some one is ringing, Louie," said Clara. "If it is Miss Lewis' girl for this dress, tell her it will be finished in about an hour."

Both Mrs. Barclay and Clara looked up in surprise, however, when Louie returned, followed by a gentleman, whose face was strange to them.

"I trust I am not intruding," he said, courteously. "I called upon business, and my time being limited must be my excuse for selecting a holiday."

"Pray be seated. We hardly recognize holidays here," said Mrs. Barclay.

"I am travelling in the interest of Wells & Co.," said the gentleman, "and am in search of a lady who will undertake quite a responsible position for them. Our ready-made dress, cloak, and suit department is but just opened, and we need a competent practical dressmaker to take charge of it. The duties are not very heavy, but there is a responsibility. What we need is a superintendent, who will order and control the work, select patterns, give out material, and keep the operators in order. She will have no actual work to perform, only the arrangement of work for others. In offering the position to you, Mrs. Barclay, I can also undertake to have a suitable residence in readiness for you upon your arrival in San Francisco."

"Offering it to me!" said Mrs. Barclay.

"Of course you will require time to consider the proposal and some credentials. I can refer you to the legal advisers of our firm in New York, who will tell you that I am authorized to make all these arrangements as my own judgment suggests. Allow me to say that the situation will be guaranteed for one year; and, if at that time you wish to leave us, you will command far better prices for private dressmaking in San Francisco than you can here."

"May I inquire the salary?"

The salary! Mrs. Barclay could scarcely believe her ears when her visitor named a sum more than treble the amount of her present hard-earned income, and Louie could not restrain a shout.

"O mamma! What a lot of money! And Clara could have the sea-voyage the doctor says will do her so much good."

Clara's glad eyes, turned fondly to her mother's face, were as eloquent as her sister's words, and Mrs. Barclay at once accepted the offer, conditional upon the answer to her letter to the lawyers mentioned. A long conversation followed, of a strictly business character at first, but gradually becoming more personal.

"You will have to see me very often when I return to California," said the gentleman. "I shall be detained here until May or June; but I will write at once about your house, and hope to find you comfortably at home when I call upon you in San Francisco. I must say good-morning now, but I will call for your final decision on this day week. My card will be sufficient introduction to the lawyer I spoke of," and a courteous bow finished the leave-taking.

"What is his name, mother?" said Clara, as the door closed upon the visitor.

"Maxwell Allen."

"Allen!" cried Clara.

"It is a very common name," said Mrs. Barclay. "This is a young man, you see, and a clerk, too. His sons do not need to work for a living, if he has a family."

"Don't you know, mother?"

"I never saw Godfrey Allen in my life, although he was your father's partner. After he absconded with the money raised in the name of the firm, and left us ruined, we heard once that he was in Europe, once that he had gone to Australia. Either may be true. He was a man older than your father, a widower, but I do not know if he had children. Wherever he is, he is probably wealthy, as he turned everything he could control in the business into money and escaped with a large sum. So this cannot be his son."

But it was no other than the son of the man who had robbed his partner, who was trying to atone for the sin so committed. Maxwell Allen was a man of nearly thirty years of age when he learned how his father's wealth had been acquired. A studious boy, a youth at college, a young man sent abroad to finish his education in Germany, he had no knowledge of business, and accepted, without question, the plans his father offered him. He had been travelling in Norway when his father joined him and accompanied him on an extended trip into Russia; from there to the Holy Land, restlessly roving from spot to spot till finally he returned to America, and settled in California.

Accident had revealed to the young man the cause of his parent's restless movements, the subsequent safety from legal proceedings, and the source of the wealth now growing in his hands. Argument failed to induce the unscrupulous avaricious man to refund any of the money so wrongly won, and Maxwell refused to live upon it. High words followed, and the petted student went from his father's house to seek a living, to be earned honestly. At the time of his interview with Mrs. Barclay, he had been for three years clerk for Wells & Co., ignorant of the fact, however, that his father's mercantile influence had really gained him the opening there.

Living in the same city, estranged in heart, with the secret unsuspected by all others between themselves, the father and son only occasionally met, and then with only the surface civilities of mere acquaintances. It was therefore no matter of regret, though one of some surprise, when Maxwell returned to California to find his father had retired from business during his absence, and again gone to Europe. He had hoped to bring him into intercourse with the widow and fatherless he had wronged, but, disappointed in that, he was only more firmly resolved to himself atone by every means in his power for his father's crime.

The most surprising change in Clara was the first comfort and reward given for his efforts. The sea voyage and the medical skill now easily obtained for her, the rest from trying work, and gentle exercise for which she now found time, were working wonders for the cripple. From the lovely face the pallor of suffering was fast vanishing, the little figure was slowly coming into the erect bearing it had worn before her accident, and every day limp and stoop were becoming less painfully apparent.

While the body was thus recovering, the mind was not idle. For the first time since her father's failure, Clara Barclay had time and opportunity for study. Music became a passion, now that the tinkling old piano she had kept up her childish practice upon was replaced by a fine instrument, and she could afford some good instruction. Life seemed to her just opening and Maxwell Allen the hero who had unfolded the portals to release her from toil and pain.

And what was she to him? At first an object of keen pity, to awaken a remorse and grief that were almost unbearable; then the living proof that his efforts to atone were not in vain; later, the dearest hope of his lonely life. Could he win her for his wife, then, indeed, he could give his whole life to the woman his father had beggared. Every year his salary would increase, and he could bring comforts around them, while the devotion of a husband to the cripple would be not only his duty, but his happiness. Impetuous always, in spite of his grave face and reserved manner, he laid his proposals before Clara, and was refused.

"You think you love me," she said, gently; "but you pity me more. I will never consent to burden your whole life with a crippled wife."

In vain he tried to move her. In vain he gained an advocate in her mother. She was resolute in her rejection of his suit, and because she loved him utterly and unselfishly, see would not be his wife.

Finding her immovable, he took such measures as secured Mrs. Barclay's position, and accepted an offer from the firm to go to Paris for business purposes.

"Five years since I was in New York, and here I am again, on New-Year's Day, too."

"Five years ago to-day we were in W—— together, and surprised enough I was to see your name on the list of hotel arrivals," was the reply of Walter Putnam to Maxwell Allen's remark. "You refused then to make calls with me. Come to-day."

"But I know no one."

"Never mind. I can introduce you. That is the privilege of the day. And by-the-by, do you remember the Barclays? You asked me about them when we were in W——."

"I remember."

"They left there soon after and went to California. Last winter they returned to New York, and are now living on Fifth Avenue, keep their own carriage, and have renewed the old friendships of Mr. Barclay's prosperous days."

"Married rich?"

"Not at all. Some property lost in the failure and now recovered, so rumor says. Be that as it may, they are in their proper position. Clara is much admired, and Louie made her entrance into society in a Christmas party last week, that was one of the most brilliant gatherings of the season."

"Do you call there to-day?"

"Certainly."

"I will go there with you and renew my acquaintance with Mrs. Barclay."

The drawing-room was crowded with guests when the gentlemen entered, but Maxwell Allen saw but one face. Seeing her gracefully moving here and there, radiant in beauty, it was hard to believe Clara Barclay had ever been crippled. Small in form, slender in proportion, she was still rather spirituelle, but there was no trace of deformity or lameness left. She was the centre of a gay group when she saw Maxwell Allen standing in the doorway, looking earnestly upon her. Before he could realize that she had recognized him, she was beside him.

"Not here," she said, before he spoke; "come into the library," and she led the way.

Once alone, she came and stood before him, her face raised to meet his gaze. One look into his loving eyes sufficed her.

"Maxwell," she said, "I am well. See, all my lameness is gone. Oh, my own, you love me still?"

"Love you? When have I ceased to love you? But you are an heiress now, Clara. I am but a poor clerk still."

"Ah, Maxwell, we know your secret. When the news first came that Godfrey Allen was dead, and his son had resigned all claim to the estate, and by deed of gift restored to us our father's property, we little guessed who that son was. But one letter in a mass of legal documents betrayed you."

"Will you then forgive my father?"

"Hush, dearest. Surely, all the past is forgiven. I have been to Europe, Max, and found health there. Always seeking that for your sake, now you will forget the past, for your little wife will not be a cripple."

"Do you know, Clara, where and when I made my last New Year's call?"

"No, tell me."

"In W——, five years ago."

IN MEMORIAM.

BY L. S. C.

STEP softly! breathe lightly! the baby is sleeping,
One dimpled hand 'neath the coverlid peeping,
One snowy arm on the soft pillow lying:
Dream-pouted lips, with the budded rose vying;
Warm glowing cheeks, where an angel's kiss lingers;
Bright golden tresses and peach-tinted fingers;
Eyelids closed lightly and fair open brow—
Hush! she is slumbering, disturb her not now.
Step softly! breathe lightly! the baby is sleeping,
The mother beside it her love watch is keeping.
Step softly! breathe lightly! the great Lord hath spoken:
The slight silken chain of our babe's life is broken.
The marble-like hands are in purity crossed,
And over our darling death's delicate frost;
The white rose-buds cling to the motionless breast,
Peace, peace to the soul, to the sweet body rest.
We'll lay the fair form on a pillow of flowers—
And handle it gently: 'tis all that is ours.
Step softly! breathe lightly! though she is not sleeping,
Around and above us her love watch she's keeping.

MISS MINERVA TWIG.

SCENE, MARGATE.—A Drawing-Room in Margate. Tea-Table set out. MISS MINERVA, CLORINDA, CAPTAIN DASH.

Minerva. Well! tea-time, and no sister Spoony! Very odd, to be sure. My poor sister is addicted to spasms in the heart, and I really must go and see how she is. Excuse me, Captain Dash; I dare say Clorinda will manage to amuse you during my absence.

[Exit MINERVA.]

Captain Dash. Amuse me! aw! how little your worthy aunt is aware, adored Clorinda—

Clorinda. Hush, Eustace! have you yet to learn how terrible may be the wrath of a jealous, an incensed parent? My sire! oh! should he suspect—

Captain Dash. Take courage, lovely being. Aw! if your papaw should be fly—take the alarm, I mean—his anger could not be so vewy tewwible, after all.

Clorinda. Eustace, you know him not. He is a stern spirit—an austere man.

Captain Dash. (Aside.) An oysterman! and deals in spirits, too. The old chap must be a kind of fishmonger. (Aloud.) Be brave, charming girl; nothing dweadful shall happen. Eustace Dash will pwotect you with his life. Aw! positively now—

Clorinda. My own noble, heroic Eustace! Yet my sire is harsh. He will return on Saturday next by the boat from London. The "Red Rover" will waft him to these shores, so writes he to my mamma.

Captain Dash. (Aside.) Saturday! oh! Short notice, 'pon my life. Then I must make hay while the sun shines—walk my chalks.

Clorinda. Eustace! my Eustace! ravest thou? Thou speakest of chalks!

Captain Dash. (Confusedly.) The—the cliffs! Yes, 'pon honor, the chalk cliffs. I was—I was thinking how nice a picnic would be—Clorinda. (Eagerly.) Oh, delightful. When the waning moon—here 's aunt!

* Proverbs are acted exactly in the same manner as charades. As the name implies, the play is founded on a proverb, which, after two or three scenes, is left for the audience to guess; but, unlike the case for charades, one scene usually suffices to indicate the proverb. Nevertheless, for the sake of effect, and also to prolong the amusement, two or more scenes are given. A great deal naturally depends upon the quality of the acting. If this be indifferent, the amusement is sure to flag; in which case, of course, the effect of the proverb is marred.

Enter MINERVA and MRS. SPOONY.

Mrs. Spoony. Good evening, captain. I envied you all your nice cool walk on the pier. I saw you with the telescope.

Captain Dash. Good evening, dear Missus. No—Maddymoiselle, I mean.

Mrs. Spoony. (Simpering.) You flatter me, Captain Dash; I'm not a mademoiselle.

Captain Dash. Aw—really! re-ally, that's too bad. He! he! he! But the ladies always are so smart.

Minerva. Captain Dash is a critic of severe discernment; yet it must be owned that at Margate our sex are, perhaps, too fond of exuberant adornment, which in dress produce the effect—

Captain Dash. Oh, dwess—I believe you! One sees some dwesses down on the pier that are the cheese, rather.

Minerva. Do you take sugar, Captain Dash? Perhaps you would be kind enough to hand me the sugar-basin.

Captain Dash. Sweets to the sweet, eh? Aw! now!

Mrs. Spoony. You army gentlemen are so gallant.

Clorinda. Oh, mamma, don't you love a soldier?

Mrs. Spoony. I, my dear? What a question! It's lucky your papa's not here.

Minerva. It is interesting to the philosophic mind to remark how supply creates demand. This Chinese herb, for example—

Captain Dash. Shall we stwoll down to the waffle to-night, aw?

Minerva. This humble Chinese herb—

Captain Dash. It's such fun—the wheel of fortune—all pwizes and no blanks. Two-pence more, and up goes the donkey.

Mrs. Spoony. You military gentlemen are such wicked wits.

Minerva. This Chinese herb—

Clorinda. (Aside, to CAPTAIN DASH.) How enchanting! And I hope that, if we do go, a certain person will draw for me as he did last night; for even the trifling prize of three cakes of brown Windsor soap, gained by his dear hand, outweighed coronets and diamonds to his own Clorinda.

Minerva. This Chinese herb—but I lose the thread of my ideas. You have been in China, Captain Dash?

Captain Dash. Aw—yes, yes, to be sure. Ours was out there ever so long, and, aw, peppered the pigtails pwetty handsomely. We were under Commissioner Lin; queer chap, Lin.

Minerva. I understand Commissioner Lin to be a mandarin of China.

Captain Dash. (Laughing.) Ah—yes. Bless me, how stupid I am. I meant we were after Lin, of course; chevied him out of the town of Souchong, and captured two yards of his pig-tail, 'pon honor, at the battle of Howqua.

Captain Hyson and Captain Twining commanded our fellows.

Clorinda. How thrilling! to hear battles spoken of by those who bravely took a part in those daring deeds! Were you in India, captain?

Captain Dash. India! aw—that's the ticket. I beg your pardon, ladies; it's an expression I picked up in Jamaica.

Minerva. Jamaica! We were speaking of India, surely—not of the West Indies.

Captain Dash. Yes, to be sure—India. Ah! it's such a place for shawls.

Mrs. Spoony. What, real Cashmeres? and are they cheap?

Captain Dash. Oh, for nothing—nothing at all, when you know how to set about it. And such a lot of India pickles, too—hot and all hot. And the people—just like the blackamoors that sweep the crossings in London, 'pon my word.

Clorinda. How graphic! I seem to see before me the sultry splendors of that torrid clime.

Minerva. (Playfully.) Did you shake the rupee-tree, Captain?

Captain Dash. Oh, yes, I should hope so. Ruby-tree—I believe you. Rubies, and diamonds, and—cornelian-stones, and real pearls, all to be had for the gathering. But our regiment was in such a hurry when we passed the place where the twee gwew, there was hardly time to shake it.

Mrs. Spoony. I wish I'd been there, to have a chance.

Minerva. Which is your regiment, by the by, Captain Dash? I looked through the army-list, but I didn't see your name anywhere.

Clorinda. (Archly.) I guess—the Blue Horse Guards.

Captain Dash. Those army-lists are shameful, 'pon my word, too bad—all government interest, you know. (Mysteriously.) My family are regular liberal conservatives—opposition, 'pon my life!

Minerva. But your regiment.

Captain Dash. The wives! The wife brigade! I've, aw! been in the wives ever such a time!

Clorinda. The rifles, with their sweet pretty uniform! So cool and green, too!

Captain Dash. (Laughs.) None so gween, perhaps! Cool, may be, but fine wegiment—famous wegiment!

Minerva. Is yours the first battalion of the rifles?

Captain Dash. No—no; not the first. Second battalion—second battalion, to be sure.

Minerva. Why, that's Major Ramrod's battalion—one of our oldest friends!

Captain Dash. Bwother officer—dear fwiend—deuced intimate, Ramrod and I.

Clorinda. Two such perfect soldiers!

Mrs. Spoony. Why, sister, there's Major

Ramrod passing the window this minute. (Calls.) Major! Major!

Minerva. The dear man! Run, Clorinda, and open the door. Come and meet him, sister Spoony.

[Exit MINERVA, CLORINDA, and MRS. SPOONY.]

Captain Dash. I must get what I can before all's blown, and the gallant capting bowled out. (Pockets the teaspoons.) These spoons are silver, anyhow; not shabby electrotype impositions. Could I bag the tea-pot?

Re-enter MINERVA.

Minerva. What joke is that about the tea-pot?

Captain Dash. Oh, nothing; only admiring the bird upon it.

Minerva. It's a goose displayed—the Spoony crest. Ah, here they come!

Enter MAJOR RAMROD, MRS. SPOONY, and CLORINDA.

Mrs. Spoony. The major will be glad to see his old friend.

Major Ramrod. Old friend! What! is Spoony come down from London?

Minerva. No. But here's your—your brother officer, Captain Dash.

Major Ramrod. My brother officer! Some mistake.

Minerva. No. Yours is the second battalion of the rifles?

Major Ramrod. To be sure. But there is no Captain Dash in the battalion. I never set eyes on this gentleman before.

Captain Dash. (Confusedly.) A foolish blunder—aw! I did not say second battalion. In fact, I don't—exactly—belong to the—second battalion. ;

Major Ramrod. (Dryly.) Not exactly, I flatter myself.

Minerva. Why, surely, Captain Dash—

Clorinda. Why, surely, Eustace—

Mrs. Spoony. What's become of the spoons? Has the silly girl come and fetched them away before tea's half over?

Captain Dash. Sir, I don't, aw!—understand you, aw! I belong to the wives, sir, as much as you do, sir!

Clorinda. Eustace, be composed. O mamma, there will be a duel!

Minerva. What is your battalion, Captain Dash? Pray clear up this business.

Captain Dash. (Aside.) Now, which shall I say? I say the fifth, that's not the next battalion to his. (Aloud.) Mine is the fifth battalion, major, at your service.

Major Ramrod. You have convicted yourself, you impostor! There are but four battalions in the corps. O Mrs. Spoony! what sort of an acquaintance have you picked up?

Captain Dash. (Aside to the ladies.) I thought so. Government oppression and cowwption! You know—I told you. Ahem!

Major Ramrod. I was wrong; I have seen that gentleman before.

Clorinda. (Eagerly.) In uniform, no doubt. It makes such a difference!

Major Ramrod. (Dryly.) In uniform! Certainly, and a becoming gray uniform it was.

Clorinda. Green, you mean?

Major Ramrod. Gray! gray! But no matter.

Captain Dash. Now you flatter me, weally! No doubt you saw me on parade with my company?

Major Ramrod. With your company, sir, I did see you, and the captain and his company were well matched. I wish you a good day, sir; you shall hear of me.

[Exit MAJOR RAMROD.]

Clorinda. (Proudly.) So the false aspersion is cleared away, and the honor of the noble, the insulted, the heroic Eustace Dash shines forth in splendor!

Mrs. Spoony. Clorinda, what is all this?

Clorinda. True love laughs at tyrannical restraint! I no longer shrink from avowing that to Eustace Dash are plighted my tenderest affections.

Mrs. Spoony. Hoity-toity!

Minerva. The spontaneous avowal of the tender passion has ever been considered as unbecoming to—what's this?

Enter POLICEMAN.

Policeman. Don't be alarmed, ladies. As I was watching the house, a military gent told me I should find—ah! here he is. You are my prisoner, old buck! (Collars CAPTAIN DASH.)

Clorinda. Unhand him, base minion of despotism!

Mrs. Spoony. Lawks!

Minerva. The Act of Habeas Corpus presents a barrier.

Policeman. Never mind the Have-his-carcase Act, miss. All's reg'lar and proper. Here is a warrant for the apprehension of the pris'ner. (Produces paper, and reads.) Joseph Smudge—Clorinda. (Indignantly.) Smudge!

Policeman. Joseph Smudge, alias Insinuating Joe, alias Wheedling Jerry, alias Sir Tilbury Smart, alias Lord Percy Plantagenet, alias the Hon. Captain Cracker, alias Captain Dash, or the Dashing Captain.

Mrs. Spoony. How can he have so many names? You're joking.

Minerva. Where can the spoons be? Has any one taken them off the tea-table? Sister, where can the spoons be?

Policeman. (Smiles.) I can guess. (Takes them out of CAPTAIN DASH's pocket.) What do you think, ladies, of the precious captain now?

Clorinda. (Wildly.) Eustace, justify yourself! Speak to me—say it is some trick, some plot!

Minerva. Appearances are often fallacious, but in this case it is too palpable—we have been duped!

Captain Dash. Spoonies! spoonies! that's all, and lost your spoons, and serve you right. And I hope you'll get back the three guineas, Mrs. Spoony, that you lent me to send off the telegraphic message to my Iwish estates. Ha; ha! ha! my Iwish estates! *Oh, you spoonies! (CLORINDA faints.) Keep up your spirits, little Clo, there are plenty more captains of my sort at Margate.

Policeman. You come along, and no more chaff!

[Exit with the prisoner.]

(Curtain falls.)

ARTIFICIAL PEARL MAKING.

EMPLOYMENT FOR WOMEN.

A CONSIDERABLE portion of the various operations of pearl-blowing, as of fan making, is body to require an express statute for their regulation. Although even at that time the large export of pearls to the East brought large sums of money to the Venetian republic, it would appear that it had not yet reached its apogee, for the same author adds: "The fabrication of artificial pearls, by means of the glass-blower's lamp, confers immortality on the name of Andrea Vidoare, to whom we owe, if not the inventing, at least the perfecting, of this process in 1528." The manufacture is now carried on chiefly in Rome, Venice, and Paris, and in those cities it has reached a dangerous excellence. So perfect beyond all others are the French imitation pearls, that it is difficult for the practised eye of a jeweller to distinguish the true from the false. The French are very happy in the production of black pearls. The perfection of these imitations renders them all but indistinguishable from the real pearls. The process of the manufacture of these charm-carried on by women. Although this work is but poorly remunerated, yet, as affording employment to many hundreds of women, it would be a useful introduction into America.

The first mention of artificial pearls is found in 1318. M. Lazari, in his "Notizie delle opere d'arte e d'antichità," tells us that the makers of them, called "chaplet makers" and "pearl makers," were established at Vienna and Murano, and formed a sufficiently numerous ing little fancy articles is carried out in the following manner:—

The pearl-blower's workshop is of the simplest character. It is composed of a little table about a yard long, on which is placed a lamp with a thick wick, which, fed either with oil or lard, gives forth a long jet of flame—this flame being regulated by a bellows arranged under the table, and moved by the foot of the operator. On this table are placed some hollow glass tubes of different kinds—some of ordinary glass, which are used to make the common kinds of pearls; others of a slightly iridescent tint are only employed for the best description, known commercially as "Oriental pearls." The secret of the composition of the latter kind of glass, due to the researches of the chemist, M. Pierrelot, who died some years ago, now belongs to the house of M. Valez & Co.

We will now describe how the pearl-maker, with the aid only of a tube of hollow glass (precisely the same as a child's peashooter), is enabled to produce pearls of all kinds, some of which, by the beauty of their form and their opaline lustre, can with difficulty be distinguished from the finest Oriental variety. The pearl-blower, seated at the table, has the lamp before him. On the right are placed tubes of very small dimensions; the size of the tube employed naturally is in proportion to the size of the pearls required. The first operation of the workman is to draw out the tube—that is to say, to increase its length, to diminish its diameter. The tube being drawn out to the required dimensions, he breaks it into minute fragments; he then takes up one of these fragments, and presents one end of it to the lamp. As soon as the glass begins to liquefy, he blows softly into the tube, which, though drawn out, retains the internal passage, and the air dilating the warmed end, a globule is formed. This globule will eventually be the perfect pearl; at present it is incomplete, for in order that it should assume a faultless form three operations are indispensable—firstly, the piercing, which consists of two holes if the blower is making round pearls for necklaces, or of one hole only if he is making round or pear-shaped pearls for ear-rings, buttons, etc.; secondly, the required form, whether round or pear-shaped; thirdly, the coloring of the interior of the pearl.

The double piercing necessary to admit the string, which is to unite the pearls, and form them into a necklace, is done at the moment when the glass, still of a spheroidal form, and adherent to the tube, is yet ductile. The first hole is made in the lower half of the pearl by the breath only of the blower, and the second is the natural result of the hollow of the tube at the point where the pearl is separated from it by means of a sharp tap.

All artificial pearls are made in the manner here described; but what are termed "Oriental pearls," being the most exact imitation possible of the real article, require a still further application of the pearl blower's art. Although the method of manufacture is precisely similar in both cases, the so-called Oriental pearls are distinguished from the commoner kinds, not only by their being made of an opalescent glass, but by the care the blower bestows on their form, as well as on their varied internal tints.

Every pearl buyer knows the difficulty of finding a pearl without defect, not in the material of which it is composed, but in shape and color. The art of the pearl blower, then, consists in the production of the best possible imitation of Nature; his talent is evinced not only by his neutralizing the exact regularity obtained by blowing the pearl, but he must produce on it the effects usually found in natural specimens. The work requires long practice, and is the fruit of careful and patient observation. An artist in pearl blowing ought to be sufficiently acquainted with the appearance of real pearls, only to place on his own productions such defects as shall, by the aid of skilfully devised reflected lights, enhance the beauty of the work he has completed. In order to obtain this important result, the blower, taking advantage of the instant while the pearl yet adheres to the tube, takes a small iron instrument, with which he strikes lightly on certain portions of the pearl that are yet malleable. It is this last labor which, producing on it here an elevation, there an almost imperceptible depression, ends by forming a pearl which, losing its mathematical regularity, becomes a perfect imitation of nature. At this point the blower has finished his work. The pearls, which as yet are only morsels of colorless glass, will now pass into the hands of workmen whose business it is to give them the requisite coloring.

Although the work of coloring which will now be described is the same in all pearls, yet as the manufactured pearls are divided into two categories—ordinary pearls and oriental pearls—it is evident that two kinds of workwomen are necessary to finish them off. One undertakes the coloring of the ordinary ones, the other of the finer kinds. We shall only detail the method of coloring the latter sort; it merely differs from the other process by requiring a larger amount of finish. Our illustration exhibits the process of finishing. It will be observed that each workwoman has before her a series of small compartments, containing altogether several millions of pearls, so arranged that the side with the hole left by the blower is on its upper surface. Before introducing into it the coloring matter, which would be too easily detached from the glass if it were not consolidated by some fixing medium, each pearl receives inside it a very thin layer of a quite colorless glue made from parchment. This layer being spread over the internal cavity of each pearl, the workwoman takes advantage of the moment while it is yet wet to commence the real coloring operation.

The workwoman, taking up her slender hollow tube of glass, dips it into a paste composed of the scales of a tiny fish called bleak, of which she blows a certain small quantity into each of the pearls. Reference to the illustration will show the figure on the left hand in the act of performing this operation. The pearls are now finished, and have to be sorted and packed for the purposes of commerce. The fish-scale paste now used in filling the pearls is said to be the discovery of a Parisian chaplet maker, named Maitre Jacquin, in 1686. It was a most useful and fortunate discovery, for up to that period artificial pearls were colored by quicksilver, and its emanations proved most deleterious to the health of the workpeople employed in the manufacture.

Colored pearls are made in precisely the same manner as the white varieties, except that instead of the bleak-scale paste a compound of the color desired in the pearl is blown into it.

It has already been stated that the women practisers of this art gain but a poor livelihood; in order to earn from three and a half francs to four francs per diem, they must color forty thousand pearls. Still, even this rate of pay contrasts favorably with that obtained by needlewomen, and induces us to wish for the introduction of this branch of industry into our own fields of labor.

DRIFTING ON THE TIDE.

My dreams went drifting on the tide,
The glorious tide of life;
As happily as dreams need be,
As full of sunshine and of glee,
As summer bird in forest tree,
As though there were no storms-at sea,
My dreams went drifting on:

My dreams went drifting on the tide,
The joyous tide of life;
My boyish dreams of my own true love,
With voice as soft as the cooing dove,
And a form as fair as an angel above,
And a heart as full of tenderest love—
My dreams went drifting on.

My dreams went drifting on the tide,
The fickle tide of life;
My dreams when wealth and fame should meet,
To strew their flowers before my feet,
And twine a wreath for hero meet,
While the world's applause mine ear should greet—
My dreams went drifting on.

My dreams went drifting on the tide,
The cold, stern tide of life;
Of my own sweet flower, who lost her bloom,
The victim of an early doom,
And buried deep in a mournful tomb,
Left me alone in grief and gloom—
My dreams went drifting on.

My dreams went drifting on the tide,
The wondrous tide of life;
'Twas years, and years, and years ago,
And they were buried at its flow,
And my poor head is white as snow,
And I am waiting but to go—
To drift, to drift, no more.

EXTRAORDINARY afflictions are not always the punishment of extraordinary sins, but sometimes the trial of extraordinary graces.—
Henry.

ONE OLD MAID.

BY MARION HARLAND.

THE Scribners were dining en famille on the afternoon of the last day of the year. Mr. Scribner, gentlemanly and quiet—one of the solid men of the town, who, if he found solidity a serious matter, was yet amiably-disposed toward the world that had bestowed the distinction upon him—discussed the contents of his plate, as he did most subjects, with deliberate care, the slight plait between his brows becoming a shrewd and solid man. Mrs. Scribner had been passably pretty in her youth, and, being plump and well-dressed, was even more comely in the autumn of her matronhood. Complacent in her house, the dinner, her toilet, and her children; satisfied with her husband, and content, for the time, with her servants, she listened with beaming face to the merry rattle of the young people, answered indulgently and judiciously the various appeals to her judgment and memory. There were four of her children at the table—John, Jr., aged twenty-five; Emma, twenty-two; Effie, eighteen; and Harry, thirteen. They were all goodly to look upon, pleasant of temper, well-educated, and stylish. I do not like the word, but, through much use, it has come to express what I mean—a certain air of high-bred fashion and ease that is not put on and off with one's clothes. The equally well-looking young gentleman who sat at Emma's right was Mr. Edwin Rowland, her betrothed, and therefore entitled to a place in the family circle even upon not-at-home days, and such is New-Year's Eve generally in households that expect to be overrun by emulous friends on the morrow. Only nobodies paid visits on this day, and the Scribners were too near the top of the tree to trouble themselves about that class of their fellow-creatures. Sitting there, under their own frescoes and chandeliers, they suffered no thought of possible intruders to make them afraid, and enjoyed the goods of fortune with open hearts and happy faces.

Until the conversation struck something projected into the frothy current by John, that diverted it from its course, Effie, a giddy tease, had accused him of a lack of philanthropy in remaining single to the ripe age of twenty-five, "when so many worthy women were sinking into elderliness and melancholy without the husbands to which their merits entitled them."

"I am not a philanthropist!" asserted her brother, boldly. "I have no patience with the stock cant about doing good to one's kind, self-immolation for the elevation of others, and the like heroic humbug. I don't want to serve my age one-tenth as much as I want to serve myself; to make such use of my time, talents, and money as will make me wisest and happiest. Providence has put me into John Scribner's keeping, and he means to take excellent care of the consignment."

"But it is surely nobler to live for others?" ventured Emma, with a slight blush.

John laughed. "Put it in the singular, Em, and I grant you it must be a nice thing—so very comfortable as to come within the range of my philosophy of self-improvement. What I inveigh against is separation, not identification of interests; this making one man's meat to be another's bane. When it comes to that, I respectfully decline the bane. 'Live and let live' is a decent and sensible motto. To die, that other people may live and have a jolly time, is, to my perception, simply and barbarously unreasonable."

"That is a terrible blow at heroism, as exemplified by ancients and moderns," said young Rowland. "What would become of the poet-historians if you class Curtius, Lyncurgus, Arnold Winkelried, and a host of other stand-bys among the world's chief simpletons, instead of worthies? No, Emma is right. Self-abnegation is a glorious thing. There is a spring in every man's heart that stirs at such stories as these; that chokes and blinds him, when he hears, in our day, of conduct like Herndon's, the commanding officer of the Central America. You remember it, Mr. Scribner? And so should you, John. When the vessel was foundering, he kept the men on board at bay by force of exhortation, command, and threat, until all the women and children were in the boats, then suffered the remaining places to be filled by other passengers. There were still many on the sinking steamer for whom no room could be made. Herndon put his favorite servant in the seat reserved for himself, took off his watch, and sent it by the man with a parting message to his wife. 'As for me, I shall stay by the ship, and with these!' he said, pointing to the doomed band. These were the last words the survivors ever heard him speak."

"That was grand! sublime!" cried Emma, twinkling back the tears that applauded the story and her lover's rhetoric. "Is it possible, John, that you can see no beauty in such conduct?"

"Beauty! do you call it? I name it arrant folly, the rankest kind of absurdity, since he threw away his life for an idea. The sacrifice did not save the meanest creature in what you term 'the doomed band.' They died as surely as if he had not widowed his wife and, perhaps, beggared his children. You can extract no grains of romance out of my composition, Em. Even in my boyhood, I saw the fatuity of that undersized, overrated prig, Casabianca, the boy of burning deck notoriety."

"I thought his name was Pat Malloy," interrupted Harry. "The song says so. What are you all laughing at?" hetly, as the merriment heightened.

"The boy stood on the burning deck,
His baggage checked for Troy!"—

"Miss Boyle!" announced the footman, throwing wide the dining-room door.

A tall, meagre lady entered, wrapped in a thick plaid shawl, simpering and blinking as the blaze of the gas-lights struck her eyes.

"I am afraid I have called at an inopportune moment, but I get out so seldom, and I could not deny myself, to-morrow being New-Year's, and I was at your very door, as I may say!"—

"Miss Boyle, allow me to present Mr. Rowland," said the stately host, checking her in mid-career.

"Happy to make your acquaintance, Mr. Rowland." Miss Boyle bowed stiffly, yet low, until Effie afterwards declared she was afraid she would break in the middle, backing away, as she did so, from the gentleman, who had arisen to be introduced. "I have often heard of you from our mutual friends—cannot meet you as a stranger, as, indeed, I know you are not in this house," another simper. "Fine winter weather this, Mr. Rowland; bracing to the entire system. I enjoy walking—pedestrian exercise—in cold weather much more than I should riding—although the street-cars are a great convenience—it imparts a fine glow to the whole frame. No, thank you, my dear girls, positively nothing for me! It is near my tea-hour, as you are aware; I cannot think of tasting a morsel."

"Sit down, Co. Coffee will be brought up directly," said Mrs. Scribner, in the tone of good-humored patronage people near the top use to those at the foot of the allegorical tree aforesaid. "You will feel better for eating and drinking something warm. James, take Miss Boyle's hat and shawl."

"I won't trouble James—thank you, Juliana! Since you are so urgent, I will just loosen my shawl, but not remove my bonnet. Thank you!" to the waiter, who set a chair for her next Mrs. Scribner's. "I am absolutely ashamed to put you all to such trouble. I only said to myself in passing—I will just peep in for half an instant to see how they all are, and to wish them 'Happy New-Year!' It has been such an age since I saw you, and I get out so seldom, and to-morrow, of course, no lady can show herself in the street. No, my dear Harry, no oyster paté for me, thank you! I rarely touch such rich dainties. No wine, thank you, John! Or, if you insist, just the wee-est drop—enough, thank you! Dear me! am I keeping the table waiting?"

"There is no haste," remarked Mr. Scribner, politely, while Effie said she was glad there was somebody to keep her in countenance, "since she was not half through her dinner, having talked while the others ate."

Miss Boyle would not be put at her ease. She felt that she ought to make herself agreeable, especially to her new acquaintance; but, the walk in the frosty air had sharpened her appetite; the dinner, so much more savory than she was wont to see on her own board, appealed irresistibly to her senses. She was keeping everybody waiting, she could see, despite the well-bred feint of occupation kept up by most of the party; her bonnet-strings got in her plate; the wine titillated her palate, until she had to cough behind her napkin, vulgar as she deemed the action; the trained waiter's attentions embarrassed her, especially as she turned her head to thank him every time he offered a dish, and she was unused to eating in the presence of so many people. The sweat—she would have said perspiration—oozed in minute specks to the surface of her sallown skin by the time she laid down her knife and fork, her hunger but half-appeased. She remembered, just in season to mention it in justification of her ravenousness, how little dinner she had eaten at noon.

"I had just taken my seat at the table when I was interrupted, and when quiet was restored—I would say a degree of comfort—that is, when I could resume my meal, I found the zest had departed. Indeed, I do not think dining alone is conducive to appetite at any time. I consider sociability the very sauce of—ahem! gastronomical refreshment. Do not you agree with me, Mr. Rowland?"

Emma thanked her lover in her heart that his smile was polite, not one of amusement.

"I do, madam, entirely. I think fasting is preferable to taking one's meals in solitary wretchedness. Cheerful society and conversation upon pleasant topics—even such accessories as the tasteful arrangement of the dishes—a clear, soft light, flowers and fair faces surrounding the board, undoubtedly promote, not only appetite, but digestion; and the reverse likewise holds true. We study these things too little, as a nation and as individuals!"

"A very just observation," Miss Boyle interposed, hastily. "Very neatly put. My dear Juliana, how well you are looking; and Mr. Scribner, also. You are actually renewing your youth. It is a gleam of genuine sunshine, the glimpse at this festive scene. This ice cream is truly delicious; and what luscious grapes!"

Nevertheless, Mr. Rowland noticed that she plucked but a single berry from the cluster, leaving the rest upon her plate.

"What noble oranges!" she exclaimed, when they were passed to her, and selected one, which was laid beside the grapes.

The gentlemen quitted the dining-room with the young ladies, leaving Miss Boyle alone with the hostess. Mr. Rowland sat opposite the open door of the parlor, fifteen minutes afterwards, when the lean figure tip-toed through the hall, still with the air of being in the house upon sufferance. She was accompanied by Mrs. Scribner and Harry, and the latter had a covered basket in his hand. The visitor's apologies, uttered in a wheezing undertone, were quite audible to the young lover, while she halted to put on her overshoes, and tie a thick veil over her best bonnet.

"It is a downright imposition, Harry, dear, to make you play porter, but your mamma most generously pressed the hamper upon me. Say 'Good-night' to the girls for me. I hear the piano, so won't disturb them. If I were not pressed for time—for I have not outlived my love of music—I should be tempted to linger. I think one never outlives a real, honest love for anything. Good-night, Juliana! I have had a charming visit—charming."

"Harry, be sure you put your aunt on the right car," was Mrs. Scribner's parting injunction.

"Aunt!" Emma's betrothed believed he had not heard aright. He had supposed the gaunt spinster who had made herself so uncomfortable as his vis-à-vis at table, to be an old school friend, or, at the nearest, a far-off poor relation of his plump mother-in-law—expectant. Yet he now recollected that Mrs. Scribner's maiden name was Boyle. This was, then, her own sister, whom he had never seen, who had never been named in his presence. It was odd. The duet was finished, and Effie flitted back to him from the piano.

"I hope your abstraction is born of our music, and not of a sudden passion for our fascinating aunt," she said, saucily. "Em, Mr. Rowland is congratulating himself upon your resemblance to Aunt Co. It is so nice to think that you will look just like her when you are—Mamma!" as Mrs. Scribner entered, "how old is Aunt Co? Forty? fifty? seventy-five? a hundred?"

"She looks older than she really is, and her secluded life has made her old-fashioned in dress—stiff in manner," responded Mrs. Scribner, with gentle seriousness. "Don't laugh at elderly people, dear, or papa and I will come in for our share."

"Now, mamma, as if I could. But why must old maids be?"

"Old maids!" supplied John. "Don't struggle for an expressive adjective, Em. I have covered the whole ground. Celibacy in man or woman is an offence against natural laws, and the offender bears the stamp for all time. Nobody, for example, could mistake our excellent aunt for anything but an elderly maiden of increasingly uncertain age."

"She is an excellent woman," said Mrs. Scribner, yet more gravely. "And although you may not credit it, Miss Effie, she was really handsome in her youth, besides being very vivacious and pleasing in conversation. Young people are incredulous and uncharitable as regards the ravages of time and care."

"They needn't make one finical and artificial," murmured Effie to her sister, somewhat sobered by her mother's manner. "What is it, James?" to the servant who appeared at the door with a card in his hand.

"A gentleman to see Mr. Scribner, ma'am."

Mrs. Scribner took the card, and her face lighted up instantly. "He's in the sitting-room, James. Take this to him when you have showed the gentleman in here." She advanced a step nearer the door, and the irrepressible Effie made time for her query

"Who is he, mamma?"

"Mr. Lloyd—Aleck Lloyd, we used to call him; an old friend, whom I have not seen since John there was a baby."

The stranger was on the threshold as she said it. He was tall and sinewy, erect in figure, quick of eye and motion, although his hair and beard were grizzled. The spectators noted, without interpreting it, the searching glance that swept the room ere his hand met Mrs. Scribner's in a long, hearty grasp.

"I cannot tell you how great this unexpected pleasure is," said the lady, cordially.

"What must it be, then, to me, who have not looked upon my former home and friends for almost a quarter of a century?" said a deep voice, so round and pleasant as to prepossess his youthful auditors at once in his favor. "And to meet you so becomingly surrounded enhances the enjoyment. Are these all yours?"

"Almost."

The visitor caught the meaning of her smile.

"More congratulations?" asked he, returning it brightly. "There is no need to tell me which are already and quite yours. I see father and mother in each face."

Effie was the prettier of the two, as the wicked witch well knew, and she was puzzled to understand why he looked oftener and more earnestly at Emma during the half hour he stayed.

"He's the most delightful old gentleman I have seen this century," she grumbled aside to John. "And I always had a fancy for being an 'auld man's darling.'"

Mr. Lloyd had lived in Mississippi since his removal from his native city, the Scribners learned in the course of their familiar chat. He had married there, had three sons born to him, and was now a widower. Effie imagined that her mother looked more serious at this announcement than was required by decorous regret, his wife having died three years before.

"I wonder if she suspects in him a possible aspirant for my hand!" she meditated, maliciously. "But won't I tease her for that when he has gone!"

The seriousness deepened into sadness when he contrived to talk aside with the lady of the house for a few minutes just before he took his leave. Effie was near enough to catch the drift of the conference.

"Your sisters are well, I hope? Do they live near you?"

"Mrs. Rawdon resides in Hartford, but I see her frequently. She has a fine family and a beautiful home. My youngest sister"—there was no mistaking the mutual embarrassment that prevented them from meeting one another's eyes—"still lives at the old homestead. It was left to her, you know. Her health is very good. She was here this evening, a little while before you came."

A second's pause, in which his mien questioned—the bent head and waiting eyes—and his lips were mute.

"She is still single," Mrs. Scribner added, unable to resist the silent interrogation. "The reason—or what she construed long ago into a reason for not changing her condition—exists still."

"I shall try to see her to-morrow," and he turned to his host to ask some question about local politics.

"Mamma," whispered Effie, crazed by curiosity, yet half-awed by the magnitude of her discovery, dancing up to her mother's side by the time the guest passed from the parlor, "was he an old beau of Aunt Co's? Did she really ever have one?"

"Yes, and threw him away for a whim," ejaculated Mrs. Scribner, petulantly, also sotto voce.

"You don't say so! But it seems so queer. Why, he's splendid! and she isn't!"

"Hush, child! I will tell you all about it by-and-by. Some things are not suitable subjects for parlor talk."

To her husband, when they went together to their own sitting-room, she said: "What a wreck that obstinate girl has made of her life. But for her overstrained notions of duty and persistency in her mad scheme, she might marry Aleck Lloyd even now. He cannot name her yet without emotion. He is going to see her to-morrow."

"She would do a good thing for herself in marrying him," observed Mr. Scribner, in a matter-of-fact way. "But it is not at all likely that he will be inclined to renew his suit when he sees her. He is rich and a live man, full of energy and enterprise. He has kept up with his generation; she has fallen far behind it. You will see that nothing will come of the visit."

Meanwhile, Miss Boyle was making her way, by car and on foot, to a quiet street quite on the other side of the city. The night was clear and cold; but the pavements were damp from recent heavy rains, and the stiffening mud at the crossings was mixed with half-melted snow. Aunt Co's feet sank into it several times above her rubbers, and more than once she clutched the basket tightly, and threw out the other hand to balance herself upon the slippery flagging. It was a disagreeable thing—this going out on winter evenings alone. Yet it was nobody's business to look after her. Her nephews were kind and respectful when they met. Harry had stopped a car for her, and seen her safely into it, getting on himself for a moment, to put her basket in after her, and to pay her fare, as she discovered when the conductor came through. His mother had given him his orders, probably. His aunt could not have expected, indeed, would not have allowed the lad to accompany her all the way—a full mile, at least. Still less could she suppose that John would put himself to such inconvenience. She could get along safely enough; was accustomed to dispense with the service of an escort, as they all knew. Only there was a tremendous distance between her sister's home and hers on this New-Year's Eve; between the two, who for twenty years had lived in the same house, knew the same joys and griefs. Juliana's life had been growing deeper, richer, brighter every year, and month, and day; hers narrowing and glooming in like ratio.

"Not that I would complain," she thought, deprecatingly, as was her wont to think and to speak, and she drew both ankles out of a very sloshy gutter. "Of course, I know it is the Lord's will, but I do get sore and tired sometimes. I have learned not to mind many things that used to seem unbearable; but there are others that will get at the quick, do what I will to ward them off. I suppose it is with the sensibilities as it is with my feet," helped to the simile by another mud-hole; "the rubber doesn't go all the way up." She was at home—a plain, but spacious house, with what had been, in its day, a handsome flight of stone steps leading to the front door. It was a dingy quarter, from which fashion had long since fled, although it remained perfectly respectable. Miss Boyle let herself in with a latch-key, and went along a dimly-lighted entry to a back room, whence issued an odd sound, like the plaining of a cross child, uttered in a coarse, masculine voice. Shriller tones made response as Aunt Co's hand touched the lock.

"Hush up that noise! You'd ought to be well shaken, you had ought! It ain't my fault she isn't here to give you your supper. If I'd my way, you would go to bed without it. Be quiet, or she sha'n't ever come home!"

Amid the burst of lamentations aroused by this threat, Miss Boyle entered. Something sat on the floor in the middle of the room, whimpering and rubbing one eye with a big fist—a woman as tall as Miss Boyle herself, and obese to unsightliness; with a thick, hanging jaw, and small eyes set very far apart, low forehead, beetling brows, long upper lip, and a mane of coarse gray hair hanging over her shoulders—a creature from which sane humanity turned, sick at the caricature of itself. The face was wet with tears, and smeared with dirt from her soiled hands, but she stopped crying at sight of her sister. Springing up, clumsy and eager, she ran to her, caught hold of her dress, and babbled in furious gibberish, illustrating her meaning by angry gestures toward the other occupant of the apartment. This was a shrewish little woman in cap and spectacles, who, without noticing the pantomime, stooped to lift a tea-pot from the hearth to a round table set on one side of the fire.

"Yes, my baby; sister knows," responded the guardian, patting the fat cheek, and smiling fondly. "Sister didn't mean to leave her so long. Now, Lulu will be good, and she shall have something nice for her supper. Has she been very troublesome, Mattie?" to the sharp little maid.

"'Bout's usual. She's always ugly as sin. She threwed a new handkerchief of yours into the fire, and would 'a sent your work-box after it, if I hadn't ketched it as 'twas goin'. You was 'out later'n common, and she worried awful 'bout that. She knows when time's up well as you do."

"It is wonderful how smart she is!" commented Miss Boyle, in plaintive admiration. "I didn't mean to be away so long—I just ran in for a minute to see Juliana." She was washing the idiot's face with a wet cloth, and panted out the broken bits of sentences in a frightened way that seemed to be habitual to her.

"Hold still, my precious child! You see I hadn't seen her for an age—and they were just at dinner—such an elegant affair it was, too—I wish you had seen it, Mattie—and Emma's betrothed was there, a very handsome, agreeable young man he is—and they would make me sit down, although I told them I hadn't time—and I ran away the minute I was through eating. That is," with conscientious accuracy, "the instant Juliana had this basket ready. Yes, there is something in it for Lulu," the idiot was tugging at the cover; "but she must eat her bread and milk first, like a nice girl, and not slop it over the table, or pull the cloth off, as she did at dinner-time."

Lulu began to cry again; then, stopping suddenly, laughed yet more disagreeably, and pointed to a large grease-spot on the carpet.

"The carpet will have to come up before that can be cleaned," snapped Mattie. "I've been at work scouring it, off and on, the whole afternoon. If she'd been mine, I'd a boxed her ears for that job. She knowed better."

Lulu spit at her spitefully, and Miss Boyle stepped between them.

"Here, Mattie, that is for you," she whispered, covertly conveying an immense bunch of black Hamburg grapes into her hard hand—the cluster she had saved from her own dessert. Juliana had sent some to Lulu; but these were honestly her own, and she threw them as a sop to the household Cerberus. "Lulu doesn't mean to be naughty, but it is natural for Mattie to get a little, just a little out of patience with her sometimes, when she is very mischievous.

Mattie is very good and kind, and Lulu mustn't be cross to her."

"She'd behave herself more like folks if somebody else wasn't so partial with her," growled the sharp one. "It ain't the right way to manage 'em, as I've told you a thousand times. If she was in a 'sylum, she'd be taught after a different style, I can tell you."

Miss Boyle's face twitched. "Don't speak of it, Mattie. Haven't I thought of all that? I can't be hard upon her. I haven't the heart to do it, even if I hadn't promised my mother. The Scotch call them 'innocents.' I remember mother told me that when I was a little child. It has helped me often and often when I remembered it."

They were twins—these two—and the fond mother, who had just finished Madame de Stael's incomparable romance, had them christened respectively Corinne and Lucile. Corinne grew up shapely in body and intellect; Lucile had never spoken an articulate word, never passed in mind the first year of babyhood. It was a sore affliction to the father, and, as they came to the understanding of it, a trial and mortification to the brothers and elder sisters. But to the mother and Corinne Lulu was the most interesting member of the household. Her bursts of temper, her crying fits, the demon of wanton mischief that continually possessed her, the helplessness that demanded the constant services of one or the other of her devoted nurses, could not weaken their attachment. When the father, secretly urged by the other children, spoke of hiding, what he was disposed to regard as a family disgrace, in the safe seclusion of an asylum, Mrs. Boyle's terror and indignation were like the rage of a bereaved lioness. The subject was never broached again while she lived. She survived her husband but a year; and, dying, bequeathed the unfortunate girl—a sacred legacy—to her twin-sister's keeping, exacting from her a promise that she would never be over-persuaded to abandon her to the care of hirelings; that, while Corinne lived, her household should be Lucile's also. Corinne gave the pledge without visible hesitation. She was alone with the sick woman. There was no one by to remind the parent of the blight she was laying upon her child's life, to remonstrate against a sacrifice so disproportioned to the end to be gained, or to mark how deadly white grew the girl's face as she made the vow. For Aleck Lloyd and she were troth-plight even then, and the mother knew it. In the death-hour she remembered it, perhaps with futile misgivings, for her eyes turned wistfully to the faithful daughter nearest her pillow.

"About Lulu," she whispered. "If there were any other way, if Aleck should not like it—but, if he really loves you, he will not mind! You will watch over her, will you not? Nobody else cares for the poor darling."

"My home shall be hers while she and I live," repeated Corinne, steadily. She had sworn to her own hurt, but she changed not at the united expostulations of brothers, sisters, and friends; went not back from her word, when her betrothed husband besought her to lift the shadow from his path and hers, to delegate to others the heavier duties involved by her acceptance of the trust. Without violation of her pledge to her mother, she might engage a keeper—a trustworthy person, who could be with the imbecile night and day—and her asylum be his house.

"Ours, dearest, for in the sight of heaven you are my wife. Have mercy upon me! Be just to yourself! Is it right to bind down your free, full life to such a service? To crucify your heart that a half-witted girl, who cannot appreciate your devotion, may not be subjected to the trifling pain of being tended by a stranger?"

"I see now, more plainly than I ever did before, that she would be a curse in any home but mine," was the sadly-patient rejoinder. "I will not take her into yours, Aleck; I love you too truly for that."

Within a month after the mother's death the twins were left to themselves in the old house. Mrs. Boyle had willed it to them, with a sufficient sum for their support. The other daughters were married; the brothers settled elsewhere. Aleck Lloyd went "out West." The words were a synonym for "lost" at the date when the Boyle homestead was in a fashionable locality. It was out of the world, now, and so were the inmates. For twenty-four years the twain had lived there together, without other companionship than such servants as could be hired to assist in the work of an establishment to which there was such an objectionable appendage as the mischievous, mindless "Lulu." Mattie had, as she put it, "stuck it out" for ten years, as "help," not servant. She liked to rule; and, in consideration of her privileges in this respect, she stayed on from month to month, always grumbling, and making herself at once indispensable and terrible to the nominal mistress.

Twenty-four years! Aunt Co thought them over when the tea-tray had been removed, and she had put Lulu to bed, and waited to see her sound asleep. Her time was at her own disposal for some hours. The fire burned brightly in the sitting-room. Sharp Mattie was neat as her mistress, and the old-fashioned furniture was in irreproachable condition, dustless and shining. The curtains were dropped, the reading-lamp was on a table in front of the grate, and a rocking-chair beside it. Miss Boyle understood the practice of many small economies. She was not as rich as when her mother left her this house and the rent of certain others. Her property had depreciated in value, until her income just met the necessary expenses of the small family. She never complained; and her wealthier kinspeople spoke approvingly of her modest wants and thrifty management, and made her New-Year's presents of hot-house fruit and sweetmeats. She made over these to Mattie and Lulu. But she did like to read. A new book was a Lethæan spring, in sipping which she forgot time and care. One lay on the stand now—a gift from Effie, who “found it too solemn for her taste,” and amiably handed it over to her novel-reading aunt. The title was, “Waiting for the Verdict,” and a little silver paper-cutter Aleck had given her was laid between the leaves against a spirited wood-cut of a kneeling woman; her arms crossed on the sill of an open window, her head embraced by them. Her hair floated wide, and the tense clasp of the locked hands told the intensity of her supplication. Underneath was written, “THOU knowest I have need of these things!”

Aunt Co adjusted her eye-glass and scanned the point long and fixedly. The book sank gradually to her knee; the eye-glass fell into the place of the silver marker. No need of that to read the record of the four-and-twenty years stretching in monotonous dreariness between her and all she could rightly term life. Youth was gone forever, and all of beauty and grace and sprightliness she had ever possessed. It was as if a butterfly had folded its wings tightly and been fastened again into the chrysalis. Whims and habits—little “old-maidisms” learned in her straight and eventless existence—clung to her like barnacles to a becalmed ship. The petty, oftentimes annoying, oftener ludicrous peculiarities that incrust the characters of so many single women, are not always the offspring of selfishness. They seem to me more like dead shoots that would have been noble, beneficent growth, had not circumstances stifled them in their birth.

“I am different from most people,” said the dreamer to herself, drawing a deep breath. “Different from what I once was. Most different from what I might have been had the Lord appointed to me the lot I would have chosen for myself. It’s past my finding out. He knows I have needs, too,” glancing at the book. “Somehow, I feel them more than usual to-night. I suppose it was seeing them all so happy at Juliana’s—and Emma and Mr. Rowland—Bless me!” aloud. “That is the door-bell! Somebody wanting to inquire the way to somebody else’s house, probably.”

But after the front door opened, a man’s footsteps came along the hall. Getting up in a flutter, she shook out the skirt of her black alpaca, and adjusted her head-piece of brown ribbon. Announcements were a refinement of etiquette unknown to Mattie. She merely pushed back the door, said huskily, “There she be,” and returned to the kitchen fire.

“Is this Miss Corinne Boyle?”

She saw nothing but the hand, half-extended, after she heard the unforgotten voice, that filled her ear, and, it seemed, her soul also.

“I don’t wonder you ask, Aleck,” faltered the poor lady, standing stock still by the chair from which she had arisen; “but I should have known you anywhere.”

Then—she was ashamed of it even while the excitement of the meeting was fresh upon her—she put her handkerchief to her eyes and cried heartily. The soft-hearted Westerner came down at once from the stilts of comparative strangerhood. He made her sit down, helped himself to a chair, and begged her to compose herself.

“I should not have come in upon you unexpectedly,” he said, and went on to tell how, being in town for a day or two, he could not resist the temptation of calling to see a few of his oldest friends; and how he had just missed her at Mr. Scribner’s. “I had a delightful visit there. What a charming family your sister has! Emma reminded me of you,” he added.

By this time it was safe to lower the handkerchief and apologize for her nervousness. They talked for an hour after that; of old acquaintances and old times, and the changes that had come into their lives—especially his—since they parted. Talked as elderly friends—nothing more. This was not the woman whose image Aleck Lloyd had kept locked away in the far-in chamber of heart and memory for the twenty years in which another woman had called him husband; which he had brought forth to the light, and studied of late until he had obeyed the ardent impulse that urged him to seek and woo her, if she was still single. He had come to her, from the gladness and beauty of her sister’s home, the treasured picture, the fairer and more distinct after seeing pretty, modest Emma, saying to himself as he hurried along, “We were made for each other. I will make her believe this.” He was met by a prim, neutral tinted spinster, who towered up lankly and bonily for an instant, then dropped into a chair, without touching the back, and cried into a starched handkerchief until her prominent nose was red. The shock killed love, and romance fled affrighted out of sight. He could not squeeze the hand half covered with a black silk mitt. It would have been absurd to put his arm around the flat perpendicular of her waist. Cured were the passion and the pain of expectancy; gone like a mist was the dream of reunion and constant companionship. Something besides duty put and held them asunder now. What a fool! what a sentimental simpleton he had been to forget that a woman must fade fast in a life like hers! fade, and shrivel, and dry into hardness! He was very kind with all this going on within him; so sorry for her in her isolation that some sweet drops of comfort dropped through his talk into the starving heart.

“I may not see you again soon,” he said, rising at half-past nine. "Perhaps never again in this world, for our ways lie far apart."

"Far, indeed," echoed his heart drearily over the crumbled image.

"But I wish you would let me help you feel that I had been of some use to you before we part."

A silvery tinkle on the marble-topped table diverted his eye from the face that was very gray and wan in the lamp-light, and strange, with the bunches of curls he had thought a bewitching setting for it when it was young and rosy, which were wiry wisps now. The book-marker had fallen off a pile of books where Miss Boyle had laid it. He took it up; looked at it intently as it lay in his palm.

"You have kept it all this while, Corinne?"

She did not speak. Knowing that he was going from her again—and why—how could she?

"It was a happy time," mused the disenchanted lover to himself, not to her, although he spoke aloud. "So fair, it grieves one to think it is dead, with so many other dear and beautiful things. Yours is a sad lot, dear old friend. I wish I could comfort you in some way; do something to lessen your privations, or give you pleasure."

"I do not complain. I have fallen into the Lord's hand, not that of man," Miss Boyle said, meekly, looking up at him. "I have tried to do my duty, in a humble sphere, but still it was duty. I know my best friends have blamed me; do blame me. It has troubled me sometimes that they didn't see things as I do, but I have this great cause for thankfulness: The Lord has never let me doubt for a moment that I was bearing the cross He meant for me, and for nobody else. It would have been a great deal harder had I ever imagined that I had gotten hold of the wrong one. And there are compensations. The poor child is very fond of me. It keeps up one's heart to know that one is absolutely necessary to some living creature. She couldn't get along without me."

"This is all the comfort she has. This persuasion is all the fruit of her twenty-four years of bondage," thought Aleck Lloyd, as he tramped back to his hotel, with a great void in his heart. "Heaven help her!"

Miss Boyle turned out the light, looked at the grate to see that the fire was safe, at the windows to be sure they were fastened, and went slowly up stairs. The gates of Paradise had opened a very little way, and in swinging to, had dashed her to the ground. The cross was heavy and sharp, and the thongs that bound it upon her very tight and cruel. Her face was grayer and more drawn as she made the arrangements for the night in her chamber, omitting none of her old-maidish precautions and "notions." When she knelt to pray, the faded lips parted for the first time since she had said "Good-by" to Aleck.

"Thou knowest I have need of these things," she groaned. "Thou knowest! Thou knowest!"

It was the drowning wretch's death-clutch at the rock. She felt it beneath her—a sure foundation—when, far into the night that had been for her sleepless, the mindless creature, who had not slept away from her side in all these years, stirred, and cried out in a distressing night-mare.

"Yes, my baby," as her hand was caught fast by the dreamer. "Sister knows."

The words came involuntarily to her lips, but they broke the spell of the dumb anguish. Slowly through the thick darkness the light of the better knowledge dawned.

"Sister knows!" She said it a hundred times a day. It meant protection, strength, sympathy, whatever was loving and reassuring. The imbecile did not grasp the full import of it; understood neither the extent of her will nor her power to serve her, but the mere sound quieted her.

"She trusts me as I ought to trust my Heavenly Father. I am, in His sight, as ignorant and helpless as she is in mine. As she gropes for me in the darkness, help me, LORD, to feel after THEE; and when I have found THEE, to hold!"

My New-Year's story has preached its sermon. Sad—is it, dear and patient readers, with whom I have held converse for so many years? I grant it; sad and yet so true that my heart has ached in the writing, as it did in the hearing of the simple tale of the heroism of a lowly heart in one of life's by-places. In my short-sightedness I would—had this been a fancy sketch—have given Corinne's history a happier ending. And yet, when she has passed through the mire and frost (for she still lives upon the earth), when no longer tired and sore, she finds all the goods of which she had need here, with greater and more abundant riches in the light and warmth and companionships of the "other side," she may think that the tenderest love could have awarded her no more blessed portion, even in this life, than to "touch and hold."

WINTER, who strips the leaves from around us, makes us see the distant regions they formerly concealed; so does old age rob us of our enjoyments only to enlarge the prospect of eternity before us.—Jean Paul Richter.

INDUSTRY.—If industry is no more than a habit, it is at least an excellent one. If you ask me which is the real hereditary sin of human nature, do you imagine I shall answer pride, or luxury, or ambition, or egotism? No; I shall say indolence. Who conquers indolence will conquer all the rest. Indeed, all good principles must stagnate without mental activity.—Zimmerman.

A RAINY DAY.

BY ISABELLA MEREDITH.

THE rain poured pitilessly. Not with the pleasant murmurous sounds as of fairy feet pattering over the green turf; not with showery coquetry, leading one on through the day, with ever the fascinating hope that each fall of silvery drops would prove the last, and give way to a streak of light in the west, and the compensation of a gorgeous sunset. It was a hopeless drizzle, drenching the sodden lawn, filling the hollows of the walks with lakelets, dripping with dull monotony upon the stone flags, and beating every second of the long hours in pattering drops upon the vine-leaves of the porch. Doubly dull the morning seemed, because she—Agatha—my queen, the brilliant star of the last night's revelry, was under a temporary eclipse, and had not come down to breakfast.

I was just charmed to that dangerous degree that one step more and I should be irretrievably in love. And as I wandered from my solitary breakfast, to thrum on the windows and stare idly through them at the dreary prospect, I was hotly impatient for the coming of that moment in which it would be all over with me, so far as cool judgment was concerned.

Three weeks before, I had come down to my old friend Ned Gray, at the parsonage, to spend my brief holiday from Chambers; to exchange the musty companionship of Coke and Blackstone for the brilliant society of fair women and brave men, queens of the drawing-room, and Nimrods of the field. It was quiet enough at the parsonage, however, for the first few days, since Ned, good fellow, loved the quaint lore of the fathers, and the seclusion of his book-lined study, better than the mild dissipation of dining out, and the continual round of gayeties at the hall, which Squire Dalton provided for his house full of guests.

Then came upon our quiet a change, in the person of Agatha Amadroy, an old school friend, and present guest of Ned's sister, Winnie Grey. Miss Amadroy was a name with which my ears had long been familiar, for the fame of her belleship and her conquests had drifted from the west end of the town to echo faintly among the dingy corridors of the courts. It was currently reported that young Barmore was pining away of a hopeless attachment for her, and he had furnished grounds for the belief, having lately purchased a flute, on which he practised Moore's melodies with unceasing devotion. But I had never seen her until we met at the parsonage.

Was she beautiful? At first I thought not. I was disappointed. She was dark, and large, and had a manner quite her own, hardly prepossessing. So I studied her at ease, and looked into her great eyes, and listened to the voice of the charmer, until I suddenly found myself bewitched. She was majestic in the drawing-room, superb on horseback, and last night, at the ball, radiant in beauty she well knew how to enhance by cunningly chosen effects of dress; last night, when half the men were flattering her with undisguised admiration, she turned eye and smile upon me; yielded to my asking, every waltz; in short, distinguished me with her favors. Was not the rose bud she gave me from her bouquet—accompanying the gift with such a soft smile—withering even now upon my toilet-table up stairs? My restless heart longed for her presence, longed to renew the sweet excitement of the last night's half coquettish, half tender episode.

Half the morning I wandered through the empty rooms like an uneasy spirit, sighing, longing, while she above lay idly dreaming, careless of me, perhaps, as of the scores of other hearts she had played with and flung by. With what cool indifference she half listened to, half turned away from that old lover of hers, Sir Ralston Ralston. By the way, it was for him that she threw poor Barmore over. Barmore had expectations, and she encouraged him, so the talk ran, until Sir Ralston got "spoony" about her, and the baronet had dangled after her for the past two seasons without being able to quite make up his mind to "take the fence." It was clear that she was tired of him. How her face, as she listened to him coldly, had lighted at my approach, and she had beamed upon me more than one kind glance, more than one rare smile in the very shadow of his blackest frown.

It exhilarated me to remember the dark scowl of hate he turned upon me as she yielded her waist to my arm for the waltz, after a coolly courteous refusal of the dance to him.

What would come of it, I questioned of my heart; and for a while I lay back in the deep chair by the window, and dreamed dreams. I knew I was dazzled, but the chains of my enchantress had a subtle charm for me. I was in love rather with the emotion than the creature. The spell might be fatal, but it was delight while the intoxication lasted.

Would she never come down? I wandered to Winnie's piano-forte, standing open, with vases of fresh flowers upon it, and I played the soft sweet notes of Beethoven's Agathe, infusing into its plaint a prayer of my own to her dreaming heart. With the last notes, Winnie entered, brightening all the dull room with her presence and her smile. What a fresh charm she diffused as she moved about the room in noiseless grace, clad in her dainty garments. It had been one of my sweetest pastimes to watch Winnie until I had half forgotten her under the spell of Agatha Amadroy.

Now, over the book I had taken up, I watched her, and thought of her once more. Wherever her little pair of hands went, they left traces of her; here a bit of poetic tenderness, as a slender crystal vase, with only a spray of sweet white clover in it, placed on a carved bracket under the picture from whence shone the soft eyes of her best loved poet; there a wandering spray of ivy twined to bind the marble brow of a hero god. In the restfulness of her presence, I forgot my dullness, my impatience, and, oh! shame to the false heart so lately seething in its madness and folly! I forgot my queen—the sleepy goddess up stairs—in my pleasant study. It was like the old soft quiet of the days before she came; the long summer days, never too long, when the roses bloomed and shook their fragrance on the languid air, and the long slow sunsets waned into purple twilights thrilled by the faint, far songs of nightingales; days when I read to her from her pure-hearted friends, the poets, under the slow waving of the elms on the lawn, I lying on the soft, cool grass; she, sitting in a rustic garden chair, with the light and shade rippling over her, making a sweet picture for me whenever I looked up. Once or twice I had looked almost too long, deep into her eyes, and a little rosy flush had trembled up her cheeks. The days—I had almost forgotten them; and those twilights—how far away, now, seemed that one perfect evening—when a vision of life's delicious possibilities had stirred the deeps of my heart; the night when, together, we stood upon the verge of Paradise, when I had dared to press my lips to her soft, white hand. And with the morning, Agatha came, and now a great chasm lay between us and those June days. Presently, a little above her breath, Winnie began to sing, as she moved in and out, a ballad of a "Rainy Day." What a sweet, low voice she had; just the voice to soothe tender dream-songs over sweet little birdlings cradled in her arms, some day. What a tender picture of her beautiful future, arose in my mind, and stirred my heart, as it had not been stirred before, since that perfect night when our lives had almost blended into one. I forgot that I had dropped the book and was watching her with the hunger of my heart in my eyes while I followed the words of her song—

"My life is cold, and dark, and dreary."

As she came slowly nearer to where I was sitting,

"Into each life some rain drops fall."

She sang, and ceased abruptly, having caught my gaze, of which she had been hitherto all unconscious.

"Not into your sunny little life, Winnie, surely," I said, returning her smile.

"At worst, they have been but summer showers—a sprinkle and a rainbow," she answered, lightly, hesitating, and adding, with reluctant truthfulness, "most of them."

"Oh! this dull, this 'long, long, weary day!'" I sighed. She took no offence at the seeming discourtesy, but answered:—

"Do you find it so, too? Aggie grumbled about it up stairs, and declared she would sleep herself stupid, since stupidity was the sure result of such a day. She says the champagne of society has become an absolute necessity of her existence, and a day like this, which cuts off her stimulant, gives her the horrors. Isn't that like one of her brilliant sayings? I laughed at her for implying the possibility of stupidity on her part, and then she waxed wrathful, and forbade me her presence until the sun should shine again."

"And by what magic arts do you preserve your serenity, Winnie, in such weather?"

"Circumstance is my fairy godmother on such occasions," she answered, seating herself in a low willow chair by the long window, and taking a goodly piece of sewing from her work-basket. "You must bear in mind, Mr. Fairlie, that I am country bred, and all unaccustomed to the charms of city life. My enjoyments and dissipations are almost wholly among books and flowers. I cannot even talk learnedly of art, since my pictures consist of sunsets and such bits of rural scenery as I chance upon in my lonely walks and drives. You know I can't pine for that which I never had," all with the prettiest air of apology for us who avowed our repinings.

"Then such a revel as that of last night is rare with you?"

"Oh, very; a half-yearly occurrence. As it is, I don't care much for it, but no doubt if it was a part of my daily life, I should regret it, as you and Agatha do. I wish I could provide something in-doors to make you forget the weather's shortcomings."

"I am doing very well," I answered, with a look that pointed my remark, and made my hostess glance down quickly upon her work, a slow faint pink stealing over her cheeks.

She sewed briskly on in silence, but it suited me better to make her talk. I could listen and mark at the same time the lovely picture she made there, with the background of wet vine leaves, her golden head drooping over her work enough to half hide her deep eyes, yet not enough to conceal the play of smiles around her sweet mouth, the white sleeve falling away from the graceful wrist, and revealing the soft curve of her arm as she sewed.

"Did you not express a wish just now to provide me with a temporary oblivion of the rain? Come, I will test your sincerity on the spot. Tell me your charm against it; it may suit my case."

She gave a little amused smile as she glanced at me, and shook her head with a positive air.

"It would be of no service to you."

"Try, and see."

"But you know my housekeeperly cares absorb all my mornings. It can't interest you to hear them in detail; to know that I found my last year's peaches need to be scalded over; that I superintended the making of a fruit pudding for dessert; that I counted out the linen from the washing, and repaired certain thin places in my brother's table-cloths; that I cut out a basketful of work for the village school children to make up into clothes for Ned's pensioners; and that I made myself water-proof, and called upon certain pet hens in the poultry yard to inspect their newly hatched broods."

"Have you done all this since breakfast?"

"Oh, yes, but then I breakfasted two hours before you came down."

"And you really find enjoyment in such a life?"

"Yes, indeed. Now don't laugh at me, Mr. Fairlie." (I laugh at her!) "You know one must enjoy something, or one could not live at all; but, I dare say, it all seems very worthless and trivial to you, who have a larger life and higher aims."

Before I could speak the words that came rushing to my lips—words that had trembled there, unuttered once before—the door opened and Agatha came in. She dragged herself with languid steps across to the window, and gazed loweringly out at the sky. She was looking sallow from her long sleep; the sparkle was gone from her eyes, the melting sweetness from her smile. To my "Good-morrow," she replied:—

"I warn you, don't approach me. I'm in a savage frame of mind. Look at that lawn, and think of what this detestable rain has done."

I followed her pointing finger, and saw in the little hollows about the wickets of the croquet ground, standing pools dimpled all over by the falling drops, and I remembered that a croquet party was to have come off at the parsonage that very afternoon, a full dress match, in which the guests at the hall were to have taken part.

"I had forgotten about the party," I said, quite truthfully.

She deigned no reply, but drummed on the window, and looked darkly up and down the drive. The room had been all brightness before, with a pleasant sense of coziness, but now her coming supplied the artistic effect of shadow, and made me aware of the sun. A chill of reserve fell upon us, for Winnie bent in silent thoughtfulness over her work, as if following out what had been her frequent habit, of late, the leaving us to entertain each other.

But the crisis of feverish impatience was past with me. I seemed to have outgrown the spell; to have thrown off the influence that had led me beyond my own control. I had lost the power and the wish to render homage to Agatha, or to be enthralled by her. With the glitter of gratified desire in her eyes, dead; the flush of proud triumph on her cheek, faded, she seemed unlovely; a large, almost coarse, almost repulsive type of womanhood. Here was Winnie's counterpart.

I looked at her in something like amazement. Was this the majestic woman who had trailed her velvet robes with such a superb, almost regal air, the night before, accepting the incense of man's admiration as if it were her right? this woman, garbed carelessly, almost to slovenliness, who stood with the cross face of a spoilt child, frowning at the rain? Was that the voice whose music had thrilled me in the low breathed "good-night" when we parted a few hours before, the sweetness all strangled now in that fretful, half angry tone of complaint?

By and by Winnie quietly left the room. Agatha flung herself into the vacant willow chair. Oh, unwise, unwise! She twirled her listless fingers around the cord of her girdle, and commanded me to be entertaining.

"Ask not impossibilities of your slaves, O queen!" I answered. "It is not in me, of myself, to do your bidding. I can shine but by reflected light. Whose farthing candle shall I borrow?"

"Have you no letters from town, with the latest gossip of who is married and who is dead?"

"None. Shall I read to you?"

"Why, yes, if you won't talk."

"Come, then, here is Winnie's shelf of favorites. Choose, and I will rifle it of sweets at your bidding. Here is a Tennyson, opening of itself at the Idyl of the Lily Maid of Astolat. Will you have it?"

"No, thank you. I hate spiritless women."

"Then you won't like Enid any better. Here is Jean Ingelow. What say you to the poem named 'Divided?' No, again? I thought its rhythm would blend well with the melancholy cadences of the rain."

I read aloud the names of many a poet, names that are living music in many hearts and homes; I turned many a well-read page, culled from Winnie's shelves; but my queen was hard to please, and at last she was fain to confess that poetry bored her.

Luckily Winnie came to the rescue, and saved us from ourselves with the diversion of lunch.

In the little breakfast parlor Ned joined us, and he had some little chat of people and events wherewith to enliven Agatha.

Winnie, with the serenest face, presided over the great glass bowl of glowing strawberries fringed with dewy leaves. I could divine whose hands had heaped the vivid red above the cool dark green. She was studious of our comforts in a quiet, unobtrusive way, always conscious of where the crystal jug of thick, sweet cream was wanted, always quick to forestall any possible need—a gay, bright, charming little hostess, on whom her brother Ned's eyes dwelt often with tender, loving regard.

Lunch over, we dispersed. I, book in hand, and cigar alight, strolled into the little conservatory, and stretched myself on a low ottoman in a nook hidden by the broad thick leaves of camellias and orange-trees. There, indolently reading, the rain plashing on the glass lulled me into a deep, delicious, dreamless sleep. When I awoke, or how long I listened to the sound of voices, unconscious of the part I was playing, I do not know. But, when fairly awake, there was no escape, for the words that startled me into a full consciousness of the situation rendered it impossible for me to appear upon the scene.

"I am so vexed!" said Agatha, sharply. "I had fully depended upon that new dress that came down yesterday to do such execution. It is really exquisite and ravishly becoming. I ordered the trimming of the colors Sir Ralston admires, and it was to have been my grand coup; for you know he goes to-morrow, and it was now or never."

"But you surely don't mind about him, Aggie?"

"Indeed, I do. I was determined to have the matter settled to-day, and croquet is so admirably adapted for 'coming to understandings.' And now, when I have got my mine ready to explode, this detestable rain comes, and puts out my slow match."

"Why, I thought—I thought"—Winnie began, then faltered, and ceased.

"What did you think?" asked Miss Amadroy, moodily.

"That you had accepted Mr. Fairlie's attentions."

"Pooh!"

"What does that mean, Agatha?"

"What a darling little simpleton you are, my dear! It means nothing in particular. Mr. Fairlie's attentions are not worth talking about. You say I accepted them. I admit it, but only pour passer le temps, you know, or, at most, it was only strategy on my part."

"I don't comprehend you, Aggie. I thought it looked like serious earnest."

Agatha laughed, with a touch of scorn in her voice. "Did you? Well, so it may have been on his part, but not on mine, I assure you. I have had a good many men in 'serious earnest' with me, Winnie, but they always have happened to be men whom I could not encourage."

"But you certainly have encouraged Mr. Fairlie," persisted Winnie.

"Perhaps so, my dear, but don't I tell you it was strategy? Of course, I can't help his admiring me; and, if he chooses to make a public exhibition of it, why should I not turn it to account? Didn't you see how savage Sir Ralston looked last night, and how jealously he watched me every time I waltzed with Mr. Fairlie? I gave him plenty of opportunity, too," she laughed. "Did not I play off Mr.

Fairlie very cleverly against my knight of the rueful countenance? I meant he should chew the cud of sweet and bitter fancies, and to see what intentions on his part such a diet might develop. I think I should have had him well in hand to-day, but for the rain, and now he goes away, and I lose my last chance with him."

"Miss Winnie," cried a third voice, and I heard the opening of the door, "a boy has just brought this note down from the hall, and he says, if you please, miss, as how he is to wait for an answer."

"Very well, Janet. Oh! it is for Miss Amadroy."

"From Sir Ralston," said Agatha, in a changed voice, after a pause. "Hear this, Winnie, and congratulate me, my dear!"—

MISS AMADROY: You must have been long aware of the admiration I have felt for you, and which I have striven by months of silent devotion to express. That feeling has deepened into one which makes it impossible for me to meet you again without first having obtained from you some decided expression of your own sentiments towards me. I have long loved you. On the eve of departure, I find that the pain of leaving you is greater than I can willingly bear. My heart is already yours; my name and all that I possess I lay at your feet. If you send me your acceptance, I shall not leave to-morrow for the Continent, as was my intention yesterday; if you reject me, I will go at once, and this will be instead of au revoir, adieu. Yours, as you will,

RALESTON RALESTON.

P. S. If you answer as my heart wishes, may I not come to-night?

"There! what do you think of that, Winnie?"

"Am I really to give you joy?" asked Winnie, in undisguised wonderment.

"Of course. Why not?"

"Are you really going to resign Herbert Fairlie for such a man as Sir Ralston?"

"He is a baronet, my dear."

"Mr. Fairlie is a gentleman."

"True for you, and in every way Sir Ralston's superior, except in length of purse—a very important item, too, my love. I don't attempt to disguise matters, or to play off any trashy sentiment upon you, Winnie. I tell you plainly I can't afford to marry for love; I can't afford to listen to the dictates of my heart and all that, lest, perhaps, my heart should tell me to accept a briefless barrister, and I must not allow myself to think that I am capable of such a mad act. Indeed, I have not much romance about me, and lucky for me, too. Imagine me living in chambers, like Tommy Traddle's Sophy! No, it is ridiculously impossible. Besides, Winnie, I have a little of the Indian in my nature; I must have my revenge on Sir Ralston. How he has dangled about me for two whole seasons, keeping others away, and leading me on, yet all the time taking good care never to commit himself, how ever much he might compromise me! Here he is at my feet at last—thanks to your Mr. Fairlie—and I shall keep him there. Yes, Winnie, I will marry him, and you may pray for him. The prayers of a good little creature like you can't harm him, and may do him a vast deal of good. Addio, carissima! I'll go to the library and write my answer, and a fig for the rain!" She left the room, with a gay, heartless laugh, which had no ring of mirth in it, and soon after Winnie followed, as I could tell by the soft closing of the door.

In the evening a close carriage brought Sir Ralston to the side of his radiant affianced, who looked ravishingly in the exquisite robe she had destined to figure on the croquet lawn, artfully trimmed for the occasion in the colors he approved. And truth to tell its becomingness, under the soft glimmer of wax lights, fully justified all her expectations.

Winnie looked very sorry for me, as she followed me with her soft eyes to see how I would bear the blow. Her tender heart had a separate ache for every one of those seductive ribbons donned for the baronet.

I did not intrude upon the lovers long. I had neither the intention nor the desire to defraud the baronet of any portion of those golden moments which Agatha had given him the exclusive right to appropriate. But, when she dropped her handkerchief, and I approached to restore it to her, a ribbon fluttering from her shoulder trailed across my sleeve, and a wicked desire to teach her how all uncrushed I was, by my fall from favor, possessed me. I smiled into her face, touched the ribbon with my finger, and half-whispered: "These, then, are the 'winning colors?'"

She understood me, and drooped her eyes, flushing; and her lover, who stood turning over some loose sheets of music, and had not heard, saw her crimsoning to the brow, and frowned.

I went to Winnie, who was delicately fluttering just out of range of the drawing-room, pretending to busy herself with the flowers in the conservatory.

"Don't I bear it well?" I asked, gravely, meeting her soft glance of pity.

"What?" she asked, with a half-startled air. "The vision of our queen of hearts being borne away by—by the knave of diamonds," I answered.

"Yes, very well," said Winnie, evidently uncertain how to take me.

"But then you must not give me too much credit, Winnie. You know she wasn't my queen, after all."

Winnie seemed quite distressed at the turn of the conversation. Evidently she thought I was merely braving it out. She glanced at me deprecatingly, but I had a smile ready for her, and it puzzled her.

"Winnie," I said, following her down the flowery paths, "do you know that this day—this reviled rainy day—has, indeed, been one of the happiest days of my life?"

"Why—I thought"—began Winnie, in undisguised amazement, and then stopped short.

"Ah, yes! You thought me blind, and a trifler, and a fool, I dare say, Winnie, and I cannot wonder at your uncomplimentary opinion of me under the circumstances. But, Winnie, you have been mistaken once to-day—why not, perhaps, twice?"

She looked quickly up; but my eyes spoke to her own things she dared not read, for she turned away in a little tremor of—was it joy?

The thought, the hope set me on fire with ecstasy. "Winnie," I said, hardly knowing that, grown bold in my delight, I had dared to take her in my arms, that I was interrupting my every word with the mad kisses I rained all over her sweet face, "darling! you are my queen, you, only you—my rainy day fairy! Will you not make every day of my life a Godsend, as this has been? Darling Winnie, will you not be the rainbow to every storm that shall henceforth beat upon my life?"

I think she gave me some fairy-like intimation, then and there, that she would. I know that, if she did, she has kept her promise faithfully, a true little sunbeam, shining through every tear, in these years that have followed.

There, among the flowers, forgetful of the hour, the baronet found us when he came to make his late adieux. Agatha, following wearily, shot a quick, comprehensive glance at us.

While Winnie spoke her pretty congratulations, which Sir Ralston received with pride, I passed to the side of Miss Amadroy, who stood stripping with ruthless fingers an orange-tree of its bloom.

"I hope I am not too late with my good wishes," I said.

"It would be early to be 'too late' so soon," she said, with a cold smile. "As it is, I will agree to imagine all the pretty things you are in duty bound to say."

"But have you no word for me?"

"What is appropriate to the occasion?" she asked, feigning ignorance, I well knew.

"Do you ask? Look at her," I answered; "she is MINE!"

"Then what need of words? What could anything I could say add to your joy? Still, be it as you will. Sir Ralston," she added, turning to him, "we have to congratulate Miss Grey and Mr. Fairlie."

I wished I had foreborne to speak, when Sir Ralston, hat in hand, paused, and stiffly went through some tedious phrase of compliment.

To-night—a rainy night, too—Winnie has told me that she has had news from abroad that Sir and Lady Ralston are in Paris. Lady Ralston is much admired for the splendor of her beauty and her diamonds.

We, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Fairlie, are at home; and Winnie, the well-beloved, is fairly idolized here, not only for her own loveliness, but for the priceless beauty of the crown jewels of the heart which she has brought me in these happy years.

Two are above, sleeping softly in their little white beds; and she, sitting there where I can see her as I write, coos her low lullaby over the large-eyed, very wide-awake baby cradled in her arms, who coos responsive—like dove to dove—instead of dropping off into an enchanted slumber, as a baby so nestled should.

As I watch that fair mother-face, the down-cast, brooding eyes, so serenely tender and full of love, I feel pleasantly confident that my wife does not envy Lady Ralston her diamonds.

PONDROUS PAPERS—NO. 1.

DEAR GODEY: I have been thinkin' for quite a spell that I'd write you a letter about the tower Mr. Pondrous and I took threw Californy more 'n a year ago. But I was so tuckered out when I got home that I thought I never should git rested. Things about the house was all out of kilter, and had to be straiten'd; then I had so many footins to knit up for Mr. Pondrous that it kept me bizzy every evenin'. But finally, thinks I, if I write a little ev'ry day, I'll git my travels writ after a while.

You see, Mr. Pondrous and I came to this State pretty nigh sixteen year ago, and settled down close to what was goin' to be Plumbolt city; but the city is all gone now exceptin' two South Carliny chimneys, which are standin' lonely nigh a small flowin' stream, which also was goin' to be the waterwork of Plumbolt city.

But first, the mines failed, and then the biggest tavern took fire (some said the landlord set it afire to git the insurance), and what a fire there was; these cloth and paper houses go very quick when they once git started, and about ev'ry house on what they called Main Street was burnt before they could stop it; and after that there was precious little of Plumbolt city left. For, law! it wasn't a big town, no such thing; they jest named it city to sound large, I s'pose, for when we was takin' our tower, we found plenty more little places named that way: Paradise City, Napa City, Redwood City, and so on.

Well, as I was sayin', the other tavern and all the rest of the houses that wasn't burnt (exceptin' a little pen for a pig made of five boards, which Mr. Sears gave to my husband), was moved away two year after we settled down on our farm. Nobody came up our way after the city died out, except the thrashers once a year, or somebody that had lost the road, and somehow I never got started to go even to the nearest town, which was about twenty miles away. When John went, it seemed as though I ought to stay and take care of things at home. So for thirteen years I never went into society, an' knew nothin' about the fasherns no more 'n Rip Van Winkle did when he was asleep all that time. We had two naybors about a mile from us, but they wasn't fash'n'able, so, of course, I lost the run of things, and, I do believe, when we started out into the world, I was half the time as surprised as that same old Rip. And this is the way we happened to start. You see, year ago this spring, Mr. Pondrous begun to take the Independent, and he was readin' to me about the road to the Big trees and Yo Semite, when all of a sudden says I:—

"Mr. Pondrous, less go and see them places and some of the towns. It's time we should take a little journey if ever we 're agoin' to."

"Why, Jane, what 'n creation set you to thinkin' of that?" said Mr. Pondrous; though his name aint really Pondrous, but I thought if I called him John Smith right out, he'd know who wrote this, and, perhaps, wouldn't like it, my writin' for the papers, you know.

"There's Mr. Denmak's uncle and aunt," says I, "jest come out here; I'll warrent you they'd like to take care of our place a month or two, till they decide where they'll go to settle; so less make up our minds right off strait, to go. Now do, John."

"Wal," says he, "if you can patch up the cover to the market wagon, I guess we'll make a start, though I'm pretty certain you'll want to come back the first night."

"Market wagon! Now, John Pondrous, if you can't afford to get a new buggy with a shay top to it, when I've worked so hard fifteen year, I think it's a pity."

"Well, we might buy that north lot of Denmak's with the money a buggy would cost."

"We've got land enough already, John; eight hundred akres is enough for anybody, and I'd rather you'd sell than to be gittin' any more, way off in such a place as this is, too. And jest think, you've never asked me to ride any where with you all these years, or bought me a new gownd or anything unless I asked—"

"Taint every woman that gits what she asks even, I spose you know that."

"Of course I do, John; but if husbands would take pains to bring their wives some little notion, if it didn't cost fifty cents, it would show that they thought of them, and often kinde sparks of love in hearts that were dying for want of a little kindness; but pleasant words are better than presents, and I don't know as I ought to tell you, now I've got over it, but I used to feel very bitter towards you because you never said I had done well, or pleased you, in all those hard, homesick times. Don't let us go on so, John, don't. Do less try to feel kindly towards each other before we die."

"I do feel kindly towards you, Janey, so don't you fret, old woman. We'll have the buggy, and go a pleasuring, and see if we can't grow young again."

And John gave me such an affectionate little pat on the shoulder that I had to ketch myself up, as you may say, and tug myself out of the room for fear I would cry right before him. I was determined not to cry, any way; so I run and got the trav'ling dress I wore out here so long ago, and showed it to John, and we larfed over it like little children; for I had fleshed up so it wouldn't begin to reach round me, and I couldn't git my arms half way into the little sleeves.

"How I have growd! It beats all," says I. "I'll have to take the sack like it, and make new waist and sleeves 'fore I can wear it."

"You are fat and fairly fifty," said John, larfing more than ever.

That night we went over to Mr. Denmak's, and found Uncle and Aunt Spencer quite willin' to take care of our place while we should be gone. So in about two weeks we started one sunshiny mornin' in a new buggy so nice and comfortable.

When we got about five miles from home, we come to a house where John said Mr. Fanham's folks lived, and fore we could git by Mrs. Fanham run out all in a flutter callin' to us. I'd never seen her before, and she did look so queer to me; her dress spreadin' wore all round her, and her hair hangin' down her back in a large net covered with beads.

"O Mrs. Pondrous!" says she, "Mrs. Denmak told me you was goin' to the city and round, and I would be so much obleeged if you would git me a new hoop while you are gone."

"Cheese hoop?" says I. "What size?"

"La! no, indeed," says she, larfing, and givin' her shoulders a hitch. "Hoop skirt, of course. I sent by Mr. Fanham last summer, tellin' him to git the biggest he could find, and he did; but he said they told him small hoops was more fash'nable now, and it has troubled me ever since to think mine was so big and all out of fashern," and she gave her dress a shake.

It looked monstrous to me, but then I wasn't used to seein' them, as they hadn't begun to ware them when Plumbolt was in being. "Beg your pardon, Mrs. Fanham. I remember now Mrs. Denmak told me you wore a hoop, but I'd forgot it. I'll git you one with pleasure, but won't it be bad to kerry?"

"Oh, no! They twist 'em all up in a little flat parcel, that you can put right in the bottom of your trunk. Here's the money, and I wish you'd bring me the LADY'S BOOK, for I don't know how to do my hair; my sister wrote me that they wore it in a new style waterfall, with rats at the sides."

"The Lunnun!" says I, so surprised that John began to shake with larfter. But she didn't seem to notice, she was talkin' so fast.

VOL. LXXXII.—6

"Mine's done old-fasherned waterfall now, and it nearly kills me to think I'm so out of date. Just think, it is most a year since I've been to a dance of any kind! I hate to live in such an out-of-the-way place, don't you?"

"'Tis often lonesome, but I've got pretty well used to it, now."

"Why haven't you been to see me since I come here?" she demanded, with a sudden widening of her black eyes.

"I did come one day with Mrs. Denmak, but you was gone away somewheres."

"Dare say I was over to Mr. Crosby's, or out behind the hill huntin' my turkeys. Come again when you git back and tell me all about the fasherns. Good-by!" and away she fluttered, in such a nervous, elbowy manner that it was a real relief to see her git safe into the house.

We drove on down the hill and across a little bridge, where we met an old lady takin' her morning walk. She was dressed in black, and wore such a funny bonnit, coming up as much as four inches above her forehead, I should think, and was filled in with bright flowers, her little shrunken face looked so meek beneath them.

"That is Mrs. Fanham's mother," said John, after we had passed.

"Poor old lady!" says I. "How much more comfort she would take in a sunbonnit like mine! I don't mean to git a new bonnit, John, if I have got to have one like that." For I was wearing my sunbonnit to Stockton, intendin' to git a new one there.

"Oh! you won't find any like that in the city. That was in fashion five years ago, when Mr. Fanham's folks moved up here. They have 'em very different now," said John, with a sly larf coming round his mouth and in his eyes.

"What are they like now? Do tell, for I declare I never thought about fasherns changin' so all these years."

"You had best wait and see; I ai'nt no hand to describe such things, you know. Do you see how dusty the road is? We are in the main road, now, where the stages and big teams pass up and down."

This made me sit up strate and alert, thinkin' what I might see first, now I was in the great world again. What did happen I must tell you in another letter, for this is quite long enough, at least so thinks

Your friend, JANE PONDROUS.

WORK DEPARTMENT.

TOWEL HOLDER.

THIS is an article of German manipulation. We give the pattern, as it may possibly answer some other purpose in a bedroom or nursery, and the stitch used for the crochet is so very novel and effective, that we strongly recommend our crochet workers to try it in wool or cotton for quilts, sofa covers, carriage rugs, etc. The directions are given for the towel holder as engraved; but, if wished for any of the things named instead, the crochet should be worked in stripes, making a chain of any number of stitches that will divide by three, adding one extra for the edge on the left side the stripe.

For the towel holder you require a quarter of a pound of coarse knitting cotton, a steel crochet hook No. 10 or 12, some red worsted braid. Make a chain 12 inches long, work two rows in double crochet, working throughout in ribbed or Russian crochet; this is worked from the back of the loop.

3d row, or the first pattern row. 1 dc on each of the first three stitches, * work 1 treble in the 5th dc of the first row of double crochet, working the stitch at the front of the other rows, and taking up the front half of the stitch in that row, 1 treble in the 6th stitch of the first row, then 1 treble in the 4th stitch, so crossing over the other two stitches. Miss 3 dc stitches in the 3d row, work 1 dc in each of the next 3 dc; repeat from *, taking up the 5th stitch in the first row from the last used. At the end of the row make 1 ch, turn. 4th. Work 1 dc on each stitch of last row, taking up the back of the loop at the end, 1 ch, turn. 5th. * Work 1 treble in the 2d dc of the 3d row, 1 treble in the 3d dc, then 1 treble in the 1st dc, miss 3 dc of last row, 1 dc in each of the three next; repeat from *, taking care to work the treble stitches on the dc stitches in the 3d row, therefore between the treble stitches worked in that row. Repeat from the 4th row until you have worked 80 rows in all, and fasten off. You now bind the work round with worsted braid, and make a ruching of the same, which you put round the edge. The handles are crocheted, and sewn on firmly, and ornamented at the top with a bow of braid. For the handles make a chain of nine stitches, unite; on this work 9 dc, then work round and round in dc until you have made them 12 inches in length.

GIRL'S KNITTED COLLAR AND MUFF.

Materials.—Scarlet fleecy, white Shetland wool.

THIS collar and muff are knitted in a stitch which imitates fur. For the collar (Fig. 1), begin at the back edge; cast on 3 stitches with red fleecy, and knit plain in rows backwards and forwards, always increasing and decreasing ing at the edges, according to a good-shaped paper pattern; work in also 3 rows of loops with white Shetland wool, which must have been wound 20 times double. Fasten this wool on the wrong side, * work 2 stitches, place the wool on the right side, knit 2 more, make a loop two-fifths of an inch long with the skein of wool, and draw it back to the wrong side of the work. The loops must be alternated in the following rows. When the knitting is finished, sew the loops down on the wrong side, so that they are not drawn out on the right side; then line the collar with scarlet silk, and bind it with red ribbon two-fifths of an inch wide. Sew on in front 3 lappets of red silk ribbon four-fifths of an inch wide, which are tied into bows. For the muff (Fig. 2), work in the same manner as for the cape a piece of knitting about twelve and four-fifths inches long, eight and four-fifths inches wide; sew the ends together on the wrong side; then quilt and line the muff, and ornament it with bows from illustration.

BLACK SILK WATCH-CHAIN.

Materials.—Black silk, lyre or luteal.

THIS mode of working watch-chains, and, indeed, of producing a thick braid, is an old style of work revived. It is exceedingly easy to do. The lyre or luteal, as it is called by some, is of wood or ivory. A slip-knot of silk is placed over one end of the lyre, as shown in Fig. 2; the end is wound round a; the loop first formed is slipped over this thread of silk; the thread is passed over b, and the slipping repeated until a sufficient length of chain is completed, which is kept in place by being passed through a hole in the lyre.

BOY'S CROCHET CHEST PROTECTOR.

THIS chest protector is crocheted in Tunisian cross crochet stitch with violet and reddish-brown zephyr wool, in a square design imitating plaid. Join the back and fronts on the sides by means of a narrow belt, which is crocheted in connection with the backs, and is buckled over on the fronts. Cut a pattern of the requisite size of thin lining, then begin on the under edge of one of the fronts with the requisite number of stitches, with the darker wool, and crochet the first pattern row in Tunisian stitch, alternately four stitches with the darker and four with the lighter wool; the thread of each color is run along on the wrong side of the work; in the second round of the first pattern row these four stitches are worked off with the same colors. The second and all the remaining pattern rows are worked in Tunisian cross crochet stitch, but in the second pattern row the order of the wools must be changed. Continue in this manner so as to work alternating squares. Begin the back on fine silk braid. This bow consists of 4 gros grain loops bound with satin one-tenth of an inch wide; the sewing-on of the loops is covered under an ornament of silk braid of different sizes, on to which 4 silk tassels are joined.

Fig. 2.—Bow with crochet ornament. The bow consists of 5 loops of gros grain one inch wide, bound with a strip of satin one-tenth of the under edge, and crochet it in the same manner. Join the shoulders on the wrong side with slip stitches, and crochet a neck binding an inch wide in the same manner. Edge the front of the left front, in the manner shown by the illustration, with two rounds of slip stitches of red wool, in working which the threads must lie under the work, as in tambour-work. This imitates a hem. Face the fronts with twilled muslin, set ornamental buttons on the left front, and sew button-hole loops on the under side. To correspond to these, sew little pearl buttons on the edge of the right front. Line the neck binding, and the upper edge of the back, and the belt parts, with drilling.

ORNAMENTS FOR MANTLES AND JACKETS.

FIG. 1.—Bow with ornament of thick and an inch wide, sewn on a round piece of stiff net. The sewing-on of the loops is covered under the following ornament worked in crochet with black purse silk. Make a foundation chain of 40 stitches, join them into a circle, and work 4 rounds of slip stitches, increasing so as to keep the circle flat. Then work on the foundation chain stitches, as well as on the stitch of the last round, always alternately 1 slip stitch, 1 purl (3 chain stitch 1 double in the 1st), at the outer edge miss 1 stitch under every purl, at the inner edge miss 3 stitches. The small circle fastened below the larger one consists of 2 rounds of slip stitches worked round a circle of 12 chain stitches, working 5 purl in the 2d round, as can be seen in illustration. This small circle is sewn on to 2 purl of the larger one. Then ornament the purl of both circles with jet beads, and fasten 5 small silk tassels on the purl of the small circle.

BOX PINCUSHION.

EITHER a soap or a cigar box would be suitable for this cushion; the box is convenient for holding jewelry and pocket handkerchiefs. It is covered with blue satin, and the lid is edged makers. The petals are slipped over the wire and tied with a piece of green silk. The buds are formed of the small circles rolled tightly together, and finished with a strip of green tissue cut in four points at the top; this is conwith a box-plaiting of blue satin ribbon; the sides are decorated with white lace and a ruching. The top may be either embroidered or decorated with gimpure d'art.

tinued over the stalks. Little knots of the yellow floss silks are fastened over the wire in the centre of the flower.

BAG FOR SKATES.

Materials.—Toile cirée, or American cloth, a piece measuring two yards and four inches in length, and a yard and nine inches in width; six yards of crimson worsted braid, one inch wide; narrow braid to match;

PAPER FLOWERS.—DOUBLE VIOLET.

Materials.—Leaves from a florist's; two shades of violet-colored tissue paper; green paper; yellow floss silk; fine flower-wire.

THE circles for the flowers are cut to the diagrams 2 and 3; the smaller are of the darker, the larger of the lighter shade of mauve paper. Each little scallop of the petals is rounded with a small wooden instrument used by flower-chalk-white beads, crimson sewing silk; four brass rings, one inch and a half in diameter.

THIS bag, which is a German invention, is made of strong useful materials. As skating is now a favorite exercise with ladies, we trust the model will be acceptable. Our model is of toile cirée, and is lined with canvas. The entire length of the bag is cut both front and back, being in one piece; the latter turns over with a flap. This is now covered with a trelliswork of crimson braid, each diamond being fastened down with fine chalk-white beads. When this is completed, proceed to cut the sides, which are made of the same material. Before joining them to the front and back, cut a round hole at the top and three parts down, as shown in the illustration, put a ring into hole, and work it over with button-hole stitches and a few beads. These rings are for the handle, so that when the bag is filled, the metal rings prevent the cloth breaking. Both sides are alike, and both are bound with braid, and ornamented with beads. The handle, which is forty inches long, is made of braid, plaited according to the details, Figs. 2, 3, and 4. Commence with four pieces, and loop them together according to detail Fig. 2; make these loops firm by stitching, according to detail Fig. 3 (this is only done to start with); fasten off the thread, and continue working as in detail Fig. 4. Fig. 5 shows a portion of the completed handle full working size. It is lastly stitched to the bottom of the side of the bag, the fastening being concealed with beads. It passes through the ring, and is again brought to the outside at the top. The same proceeding is observed on the opposite side, working downwards instead of upwards.

EMBROIDERED CLOTHES-RACK.

This rack is to hang up on the wall, and is wool and knit with both threads 1 row plain; before knitting each stitch, the wool must be wound round a mesh measuring two-fifths of an inch round. Then knit 1 row with the gray thread only, without forming loops; after this draw the mesh out of the row of loops; repeat these 2 rows constantly till the strip is sufficiently long. Before working each row of loops, the wool must be begun afresh. When the strip is sufficiently long, cast off, cut the loops open, comb them out, and clip them. The strips are fastened on the muff as seen in illustration.

MUFF OF VELVET AND KNITTED STRIPS.

This muff is eight and four-fifth inches long, and measures nineteen inches round. It is made of black velvet, with a quilted blue silk lining, and trimmed with 3 knitted strips, which imitate fur, as can be seen in illustration. The latter are worked with gray thread and gray fleecy, with fine steel knitting needles, in the following manner: Cast on 20 stitches with the gray thread, then take up the gray sewn on to a thick piece of felt, six and two-fifths inches long, three and three-fifths inches wide, rounded off at one end, and pointed at the other. At the edge, the felt part is covered with even stitches of red wool taken double; on the top sew a piece of red cloth, which covers the stitches with which the flannel strips have been sewn on. Another piece of cloth, forming a sort of bag, is sewn on the top of the brush; it is ornamented with point russe embroidery of black silk. Into this bag the hand is inserted while brushing.

of which you work, and with the 2 others of which you work the plait. The 2 pieces over which you work must be as long as you wish the bell-rope to be; they are knotted together at one end, and form a loop, which is fastened on a lead cushion. The 2 other pieces of cord (taken double likewise) must be 6 times as long as the others, and are wound in a ball.

Fasten these cords on the lead cushion, and work the plait from Fig. 2. When it is sufficiently long, draw the cords over which you have worked through a wooden handle covered with thread, and fasten them round a circle from Fig. 1. This circle, which completes the handle, is also covered with thread. The other cords are also drawn through the handle, and fastened on the circle.

ECONOMY IN COOKING WELL, ETC.

ECONOMY in cooking does not consist in the use of very little of what are called the necessities, but rather in always getting up, even the most common dishes, in such a manner as not only to relish, but also to present, at table, a good appearance. Some housekeepers who have come within the range of the writer's observation appear, in a remarkable degree, to possess this faculty. A poor meal is never seen on their table, or ever a time known when friends happening in at meal time put them out of sorts. The plainly-furnished table is always neat, the cloth white, and carefully spread, the knives and forks bright as brick-dust can make them, and the silver looking its very best; while the clean floor, well-dusted furniture, cheerful fire in winter, or pleasant breeze and vases of flowers in summer, wonderfully assist the appetite, and add greatly to the enjoyment of the plain but excellent fare. Cheerful faces, too, add to table enjoyment more than is generally supposed. What husband and father, coming from the drudgery of business, would not rather find at the head of his table a cheerful, happy-looking wife, neatly dressed, and pleasant children, with a plain, well-cooked, but simple dinner, than be seated at a sumptuous feast spread on an untidy table; the room in confusion, and everything betokening ill-humor; the wife heated, full of complaints of the fatigue of cooking; the children's faces and hair in anything but tidy order, reflecting, as children generally will, the unhappy state of their mother? It will, indeed, be a wonder if one or two are not sent from the table, or punished in some other manner, before the meal is over.

No matter with how much care the meal has been prepared, every article on the table may be perfect in itself, and perfectly cooked, and the only motive in getting it up may have been to give pleasure to the family, still, after all, we find the principal relish wanting; the only seasoning which gives enjoyment to viands, however costly, absent; the outlay worse than wasted, and the fatigue endured for naught. Many housekeepers fall here in making their table attractive, but do not realize the cause. No doubt often there are little trials, known only to themselves, which cloud the brow, but they should always make it the rule never to let such troubles be the cause of ill-humor in the family, especially at meal time. When the dress is changed for dinner, let it be the rule to clear the brow from all its clouds. If necessary, put on a cheerful air, and soon the spirit itself will pervade the soul, repaying fully the effort to subdue the evil by filling the bosom with joy and peace, and the next effort will be found much more easy. Perhaps this may be called digression, but the writer thinks not; her object is to benefit the young, whose habits as housekeepers are not fixed, but who have an idea of making home pleasant, they hardly know how, unless by cooking fine meals, etc. She wishes housekeepers with limited means to understand the economy of cheerfulness; it will cover the many defects of cooking, or mistakes of judgment, to which the young housekeeper is daily exposed; and we think, too, a cheerful-tempered lady will, in the end, make a more finished housekeeper than one who habitually gives way to gloom. Hope is everything in the family, and no member needs it more than the wife and mother. Be particularly mindful to cultivate this habit of mind if you find your husband inclining to despondency. Wives, even by silent influence, often uphold a sinking husband; many times all a man wants is courage, and a hopeful wife can impart all that he needs.

Be careful that every bit left is put to the best advantage; many times have we seen sufficient bread in the swill-pail to give a small family a meal. "Wifeful waste makes woful want." Not that, under any circumstances, we would advise the use of unhealthy food, such as sour bread or biscuit. When this accident occurs, which ought not to be oftener than once to any housekeeper, and for which there is no excuse, throw it away; better by far bake again than allow a family to eat sour bread. One of the rules given to servants should be, that if the bread is sour another baking must take its place immediately. We have found this to work well. Servants don't like to do work twice when a little care will save them the trouble. Dry and heavy bread can be used. Much waste is also experienced in the boiling, etc., of meats. Unless watched, the cook will throw out the water without letting it cool to take off the fat, or scrape the dripping-pan into the swill-pail. This grease is useful in many ways. Again, bits of meat are thrown out which would make good hashed meat or hash. The flour is sifted in a wasteful manner, or the bread-pan left with dough sticking to it. Pie crust is left and laid by to sour, instead of making a few tarts for tea, etc. Cake batter is thrown out because but little is left. Cold puddings are considered good for nothing, when often they can be steamed for the next day, or, as in case of rice, made over in other forms. Vegetables are thrown away that would warm for breakfast nicely. Dish towels are thrown down where mice can destroy them. Soap is left in water to dissolve, or more used than is necessary. If Bath brick is used, whitening, rotten stone, etc., much is wasted uselessly. The scrub brush is left in water, palls scorched by the stove, tubs and barrels left in the sun to dry and fall apart, chamber palls allowed to rust, tins not dried, and iron-ware rusted; nice knives used for cooking in the kitchen, silver spoons are used to scrape kettles, or forks to toast bread. Rinsings from sweetmeats, and skimmings of syrup, which make good vinegar, are thrown out; cream is allowed to mould and spoil; mustard to dry in the pot, and vinegar to corrode the castor; tea, roasted coffee, pepper, and spices to stand open and lose their strength. The molasses jug loses the cork, and the flies take possession. Sweetmeats are opened and forgotten. Vinegar is drawn in a basin, and allowed to stand, until both basin and vinegar are spoiled. Sugar is spilled from the barrel, coffee from the sack, and tea from the chest. Different sauces are made too sweet, and both sauce and sugar wasted. Dried fruit has not been taken care of in season, and becomes wormy. The vinegar on pickles loses strength, or leaks out, and the pickles become soft. Potatoes in the cellar grow, and the sprouts are not removed until they become worthless. Apples decay for want of looking over. Pork spoils for want of salt, and beef because the brine wants scalding. Hams become tainted, or filled with vermin, for want of the right protection. Dried beef becomes so hard it can't be cut. Cheese moulds, and is eaten by mice or vermin. Lard is not well tried in the fall, and becomes tainted. Butter spoils for want of being well made at first. Bones are burned that will make soup. Ashes are thrown out carelessly, endangering the premises, and wasting them. Servants leave a light and fire burning in the kitchen, when they are out all the evening. Clothes are whipped to pieces in the wind; fine cambrics rubbed on the board, and laces torn in starching. Brooms are never hung up, and soon are spoiled. Carpets are swept with stubs, hardly fit to scrub the kitchen, and good new brooms used for scrubbing. Towels are used in place of holders, and good sheets to iron on, taking a fresh one every week, thus scorching at last nearly all in the house. Fluid, if used, is left uncorked, endangering the house, and wasting the alcohol. Caps are left from the lamps, rendering the fluid worthless by evaporation. Table linen is thrown carelessly down, and is eaten by mice, or put away damp, and is mildewed; or the fruit stains are forgotten, and the stains washed in. Tablecloths and napkins used as dish-wipers; mats forgotten to be put under hot dishes; teapots melted by the stove; water forgotten in pitchers, and allowed to freeze in winter; slops for cow and pigs never saved; China used to feed cats and dogs on; and in many other ways a careless or inexperienced housekeeper will waste, without heeding, the hard-earned wages of her husband; when she really thinks, because she buys no fine clothes, makes the old ones last, and cooks plainly, she is a most superior housekeeper. The old saying of our grandmothers is only too true, which says, "A woman can throw out with a spoon faster than a man can throw in with a shovel."

We are thus particular, in noting the little things in which housekeepers fail, because we know, from early experience, how necessary it is to know and feel the importance of economy in small matters. It is seldom that a lady can assist in any other manner in lightening the load of her husband, and, indeed, this should not be neglected, let her talents be what they may. The first duty of a wife is to make the home pleasant; if this can be done, and other labor accomplished, all is well; but that is an absolute necessity, never to be thought lightly of, or classed among the secondary duties of woman. "A word to the wise is sufficient." The duties of woman are everyday duties; we cannot let go awhile and pick up where we left off; it is like a stitch dropped in intricate knitting, it goes down and down, until the whole work is spoiled. Sometimes ladies go into the kitchen ill prepared, in dress, for the work to be done; it certainly is better economy to buy common dresses for such purposes, than to spoil one that would buy a dozen such. Large aprons, with sleeves, will be found convenient to put on for a few moments, when company is in the parlor, to assist in taking up tea. A novice in kitchen work will soil her clothes more in a half-hour than an adept in a week. Rings with stones must always be removed before putting hands in dough. This may seem superfluous advice, but the writer well remembers seeing, many years since, dough in the ring of a young housekeeper. When a lady first becomes a housekeeper, she is very anxious to do her best. She asks of this and that friend the advice she needs. Some are good advisers, and some not; and thus often mistakes occur. It is well to keep a record of all the mistakes you make, they will be less apt to happen again. When you make a good batch of bread, etc., write immediately in your journal the whole process; it will enable you to do the same again. Memory is not a safe guide for housekeepers more than others; it often fails, and this is one reason why there is such a difference in the everyday cooking in a family. If you possess a cook-book, mark every receipt you try; those you like with one, and those which do not suit with another mark. Always, in trying receipts, be attentive to copy the rule not only, but the directions. There is as much in putting cakes together as in getting the proportions. Many do not consider that the cake must be baked as directed to insure success; but that this is highly important experienced housekeepers are well aware, and a stove with a poor oven is pronounced a worthless appendage to the kitchen.

MISCELLANEOUS COOKING.

Coquilles, or Scalloped Meat.—In the English way of scalloping, the cold meat is chopped up, seasoned, and mixed with bread crumbs; rightly, the bread crumbs should only be placed upon the top. Take any kind of cold roast meat, cut it into exceedingly thin slices of about an inch across, season it well, pour over it enough wine, gravy, and melted butter to moisten, place it in buttered scallop shells, sprinkle bread crumbs pretty thickly on the top, and place them in a hot oven till well browned. Some sliced mushrooms are a great improvement. Cold rabbit, sweetbreads, poultry, calves' brains, veal, and different kinds of fish, are specially adapted for coquilles. Serve in the shells.

Dolpettes of Cold Meat.—Prepare the meat as for a hash—or some hashed meat that has become cold will answer the purpose—add to it some bread crumbs, enough to stiffen the consistency, mix it together with the yolk of eggs, shape it into small balls, dip them into egg, roll them in bread crumbs and grated cheese, and fry them brown. Glaze them, or serve them with tomato sauce.

Suits or Potato Soup.—Boil two or three pounds of potatoes, well mash them, add slowly good broth, sufficient for your tureen; let this well boil, and then add some spinach, sorrel, a little parsley, lemon, thyme, mint, and sage, all chopped fine. Boil all five minutes; pepper and salt to taste; just before taking it off the fire, add two well-beaten eggs.

Ham Toast.—Scrape or pound some cold ham, mix it with beaten egg, season with pepper, lay it upon buttered toast, and place it in a hot oven for three or four minutes. Dried salmon, smoked tongue, potted meats, or any other relishing viands, answer equally well upon toast.

Savory Sandwiches.—Boil some eggs hard, leave them to get quite cold, then cut them across into slices of moderate thickness; add a few slips of anchovies or some anchovy paste, and put them between slices of roll cut thin and buttered.

Scalloped Chicken.—Mince chicken with lean ham and a little pepper mixed, in scallop shells or a flat dish, add two large spoonfuls of cream, cover with crumbs, and set before the fire to brown, with a little butter on the top.

Scotch Woodcock.—Make some buttered toast, put it on a flat dish, boil two eggs hard, put a spoonful of essence of anchovy on the toast, cut the eggs (white and yolks), and lay them over the anchovy. Serve hot.

Oyster Sausages.—Chop a pint of oysters with a quarter of a pound of veal and a quarter of a pound of suet, some bread crumbs; season with salt and pepper; pound them in a mortar; make them into little cakes with an egg; flour, and fry them dry. Serve hot.

Breakfast Dish.—One pound of rich gravy beef cut up into small pieces, put them into a basin with a small lump of fresh butter; cover over with a plate, and place in an oven for about an hour; take out and bruise in a mortar, add salt and pepper to taste, and press all into a potting pot; pour over melted butter.

Rabbits.—Truss your rabbits short, lay them in a basin of warm water for ten minutes, then put them into plenty of water, and boil them about half an hour; if large ones, three quarters; if very old, an hour; smother them with plenty of white onion sauce, mince the liver, and lay it round the dish, or make liver sauce, and send it up in a boat. It will save much trouble to the carver if the rabbits be cut up in the kitchen into pieces fit to help at table, and the head divided, one-half laid at each end, and slices of lemon and the liver, chopped very finely, laid on the sides of the dish.

Sweetbreads Full-Dressed.—Parboil them, and let them get cold; then cut them in pieces, about three-quarters of an inch thick; dip them in the yolk of an egg, then in fine bread-crumbs (some add spice, lemon-peel, and sweet herbs); put some clean dripping into a frying-pan; when it boils, put in the sweetbreads, and fry them a fine brown. For garnish, crisp parsley; and for sauce, mushroom catchup and melted butter, or anchovy sauce.

Kidneys.—Cut them through the long way, score them, sprinkle a little pepper and salt on them, and run a wire skewer through them to keep them from curling on the gridiron, so that they may be evenly broiled. Broil them over a very clear fire, turning them often till they are done; they will take about ten or twelve minutes, if the fire is brisk; or fry them in butter, and make gravy for them in the pan (after you have taken out the kidneys), by putting in a teaspoonful of flour; as soon as it looks brown, put in as much water as will make gravy; they will take five minutes more to fry than to broil. Some cooks chop a few parsley-leaves very fine, and mix them with a bit of fresh butter and a little pepper and salt, and put a little of this mixture on each kidney.

CAKES, PUDDINGS, ETC.

Soda Scones.—Take two pounds of flour, and rub into it four ounces of butter and a pinch of salt, then take a sufficient quantity of sour buttermilk (in a jug) to mix the flour into a paste, not too stiff. Mix with cold water in a teacup, until dissolved, a good-sized teaspoonful of carbonate of soda. When properly mixed, toss it into the buttermilk, which must be sour; stir it up quickly until it effervesces; mix the flour with the milk, in its effervescent state, roll the paste to about a quarter of an inch thick, stamp it out in small round cakes, and bake on a gridle over a nice clear fire. For "flour scones," the flour is merely mixed with water, rolled out very thin, and slightly browned on the gridle. They should be quite limp, almost like leather, and sent to table in a folded napkin to keep them hot.

Girdle Cake.—Rub six ounces of sugar into two pounds of flour, add a little salt, and make the whole into a paste with a sufficient quantity of milk, roll it out, cut into round cakes, and bake on a gridle.

Baked Apple Pudding.—This, when carefully made and well baked, is a very nice, wholesome pudding, the crust being remarkably light and crisp, though containing no butter. First, weigh six ounces crum of a light stale loaf, and grate it down small; then add and mix thoroughly with it three and a half ounces powdered sugar, and a very slight pinch of salt. Next, take from one pound to a pound and a quarter of russets, or any other good baking apples; pare and take off the core in quarters, without dividing the fruit; arrange them in compact layers in a deep tart dish, which holds about a pound and a half, and strew amongst them four ounces of sugar and the grated rind of a fine fresh lemon; add the strained juice of the lemon, and pour the bread-crumbs gently in the centre, then with a spoon spread them into a layer of equal thickness over the apples, making it very smooth. Sift powdered sugar over, wipe the edge of the dish, and send the pudding to a rather brisk oven for something more than three-quarters of an hour. Very pale brown sugar will answer for it almost as well as powdered.

New Year's Cookies.—Four fresh eggs beat with a pound of sugar one hour, the juice and rind of one lemon, one pound of flour, and one half-teaspoon of hartshorn. These cakes must be made in a cold room, or they will be too soft; roll thin, cut them in squares, and impress them with any fancy mould; lay on the pans anise or caraway seed, instead of buttering; let the cakes dry from twenty-four to forty-eight hours, and afterwards bake in a very slow oven without browning. They will keep a year.

Pound Cake.—One pound of pulverized loaf-sugar, the same of sweet butter worked free from salt; beat the sugar and butter to a cream with the hand; separate and beat ten eggs as light as possible; mix the yolks with the sugar and butter, and afterwards the whites alternately, with one pound of sifted flour; beat well and bake without burning in round basins. It used to be thought vulgar to use pound cake when fresh; it ought to be three days old before cutting to serve with fruit cake at parties. A glass of wine improves it. Pound cakes should never be flavored; it is generally mixed with other cake, and if spiced, there is too little difference in the cakes.

Corn Starch Cup Cake.—One cup of butter, two of sugar, one of milk, one of corn starch, two of flour, the whites of seven eggs beaten stiff; mix in the flour and starch two-thirds of a teaspoon of cream of tartar, and half a teaspoon of soda; put together like bride's cake; bake quickly.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Varnishing Leather.—We always found common spirit varnish has the best effect on rubbed leather, as it lasts much longer than any other preparation, and is quite inexpensive. It is to be procured at any chemist's.

Worms in Flower-Pots.—Stir some freshly-burned lime in water. When quite clear, use the water for the plants, and the worms will be expelled.

Prevention of Moth.—The best way of preventing moths is to wrap each article in stiff brown paper, secured all round, either with gum, paste, or close stitching; in fact, to make it as air-tight as possible. Put the packages in a box, and keep them tightly closed.

Cleaning Ivory.—Take a piece of common white chalk, scrape it to a powder, add as much water as will produce a paste, and apply this paste to the surface of the ivory. If the stains are very bad, two or three, or even more, applications may be requisite.

Starching Collars and Cuffs.—Let the collars be washed, blueed, and dried; then take two large table-spoonfuls of ordinary starch, and blend in cold water till there is about a breakfastcupful on it; dip your collars through it without going to the sediment; wring dry, and lay them in a clean towel for two or three hours; then draw them, and iron, and they will be stiff and glazed.

Camphor Ice for Chapped Hands.—Take of spermaceti four ounces, white wax (pure) eight ounces, oil of sweet almonds one pint. Mix together by a gentle heat, add of camphor (in small pieces) four ounces; when dissolved stir until partly cold, and add essential oil of bitter almonds and expressed oil of mace two fluid drachms, and pour into moulds.

Another.—Take of hard clarified mutton suet eight ounces, spermaceti, wax, of each half an ounce, camphor one ounce. Proceed as before.

How to Clean Oil-Cloths.—To ruin them, clean them with hot water or soap suds, and leave them half wiped, and they will look very bright while wet, and very dingy and dirty when dry, and soon crack and peel off. But if you wish to preserve them, and have them to look new and nice, wash them with soft flannel and lukewarm water, and wipe thoroughly dry. If you want them to look extra nice after they are dry, drop a few spoonfuls of milk over them, and rub them with a small cloth.

THOUGHTS IN SEASON.

BEFORE we welcome the new year with that pleasing hope which always "springs eternal," it is natural to cast a glance over the history of the past year, in which so many hopes lie buried. The first subject on which our thoughts dwell must needs be the fearful war, in which two of the foremost nations of Christendom have been wasting the lives of their dearest sons, and carrying desolation to thousands of homes. Every one has felt that such a war, whatever its pretexts, was a disgrace to the civilization of the age. Yet, amid all its blackness and misery, some gleams of light have appeared, which inspire better hopes for the future. One of these is the merciful and truly Christian treatment which prisoners of war have experienced. Another, even more notable and encouraging, is found in the efforts which have been made by the people of other nations to mitigate the distress caused by the war. For the first time in the history of Europe, societies have been organized for this purpose, contributions have been raised, and medicines, provisions, and other needful supplies purchased and sent under the charge of surgeons and skilled attendants for the relief of the sufferers on both sides. The women of Paris, headed by the Empress Eugénie, devoted themselves to mitigate the sufferings of war. English, Americans, Belgians, Swiss, and Italians have combined in this benevolent work. In England alone, half a million of dollars had been contributed during the first three months of the war. The "International Society for the Relief of the Sick and Wounded in War" has its branches in almost every country of Europe; and on almost every battle-field its ambulances and surgeons, with their aids, bearing the "red cross" as their badge and protection, have been found on their mission of mercy. From Paris an expedition was organized by this society in conjunction with the American Aid Society; and we are told that "this friendly partnership between the surgeons of the two great branches of the English-speaking nation has excited warm appreciation in France." Surely, in view of these facts, we may feel that the world moves, and that the heaven of Christianity is steadily doing its appointed work.

In our own land, the history of the past year is mainly a history of peaceful progress. In particular, the efforts on behalf of education, and more especially for improving the education of women, have been noteworthy. The noble bequest of Mr. Simmons, and the admission of young ladies as students into several of our principal colleges, are among the signs which show how great is the advance already made in this direction. The large increase in the number of women employed as teachers in our public schools proves that their true mission as the instructresses of the young is becoming more generally appreciated. This must be regarded as a most cheering indication for the future of our country. Whatever evils may exist in our society—and, no doubt, they are many and great—we may reasonably hope that they will gradually disappear under the transforming effect of a system of education which places all the youthful minds of the community in the charge of teachers who, by precept and example, will inculcate lessons of purity, order, gentleness, and piety. In this well-founded hope, we may confidently wish to every reader of the LADY'S BOOK "a happy New-Year," and many pleasant returns of the day. Let us add the experience of our trust that in the coming time, as in the past, the connection between the Book and its ever-widening circle of subscribers will be one of mutual satisfaction, and (if we may venture to use such terms in regard to so impersonal a subject as a magazine) of cordial friendship and good-will.

MICROSCOPY.

Who would have supposed, a few years ago, that a periodical entirely devoted to microscopic science would have a large circulation in this country? Yet this, we are assured, is the case with the American Journal of Microscopy, now published monthly at Chicago. It is right to add that such a circulation is well merited by its contents, which, though confined to the results of this special study, are of a nature to be interesting to readers of all classes, and particularly to housekeepers. Some persons, we are aware, have an idea that the revelations of the microscope in regard to the food we eat and the air we breathe will merely tend to excite unavailing dislikes and alarms. But it must be considered that the microscope not only brings to view the minute animal and vegetable existences about us, but also shows us how we may get rid of those which are found or believed to be noxious. As a striking example, it may be remembered that those fearful pests, the trichinae in pork, were not only made known in this way (after they had probably destroyed numberless lives), but it was at the same time shown that thorough cooking of the meat destroyed them, and prevented all injurious effects. The animalculæ, which startle us in examining a drop of water through the instrument, can, it is found, be expelled or destroyed by filtering, or distillation, or boiling. There are said to be at least a thousand fearful-looking little insects (the "acarus sacchari"), visible through the lens, in every teaspoonful of raw brown sugar; but refined sugar, it is found, has none of them, and is, we may add, not only the most wholesome, but really the cheapest for ordinary use. Thus, too, in a well-written paper in the first number of the journal just mentioned, Prof. E. M. Hale shows that while many of those vegetable substances which are in common use medicinally may be made worthless by the destructive effects of animalculæ or fungi on them, the microscope will readily discover these parasites, and thus enable us to avoid the use of such inert medicines.

This invaluable instrument has long been one of the principal aids of the druggist and physician, and is essential to the student of many sciences, such as chemistry, geology, botany, and physiology. Perhaps the time is not distant when every good housekeeper will think it necessary to be armed with one of these detectors, which will show at a glance whether the hams, spices, sugar, tea, milk, and other articles of food procured for the family are what they ought to be. A knowledge that these examinations were going on in many households would have a wholesome influence on all dealers in such articles, and might thus prove of much advantage to the health and wealth of their customers.

WORK IS HEALTH.

It is well known that few women have more laborious lives than those which the wives of missionaries commonly lead. The mere care of a household among a heathen and barbarous or half-civilized people is no ordinary charge. To this, however, most of these ladies add the duties of teaching the young, visiting, and explaining the Scriptures in families, attending the sick, and much other mission work. To some who have heard of it, this amount of labor naturally seems excessive and exhausting. They are struck with a few instances, like that of the Rev. Mr. Judson, of Burmah, and his three admirable wives, and their commiseration is excited. A recent writer declares that "probably not one out of twenty of the missionaries to-day in the field, that are of middle age, but has his second or third wife." In view of such an appalling state of things, this compassionate observer exclaims: "Women may well ask, 'To what purpose is this waste of noble woman's life?'"

This startling inquiry has aroused the different mission societies to investigation, and the result shows that the tender-hearted writer was far astray from the truth, and that the excellent ladies in question are rather to be imitated than to be pitied. The Presbyterian Board of Missions find that out of the one hundred and fifteen married missionaries on their list, who might be considered to have reached "middle age"—that is, who had been ten years and upwards engaged in the work—only twenty-five had been widowers. Furthermore, it was found that during forty-seven years there had been connected with the missions in Western Asia, where the women's mission work is very onerous, two hundred and forty-seven individuals. Of these, one hundred and twelve were men, and one hundred and thirty-five were women. Of the men, twenty-nine are deceased, or rather more than twenty-five per cent.; of the women, only twenty-five, or not quite nineteen per cent. The "American Board," who have more missions under their charge than any other American Society, declare that their experience is the same. In the missions of the Pacific Islands, for example, the total number of married men, from the beginning, has been eighty, of whom twenty-eight have died; and of women, eighty-nine, among whom the deaths have been only twenty-three. The statistics of the Indian missions yield similar results, showing that more men have died than women, and that very few of the missionaries (only five out of twenty-seven) had been married more than once.

But it may be thought that the work is, at all events, excessive for both men and women. Even this supposition proves to be incorrect. The American Board, after careful inquiry, are able to give the gratifying assurance that, according to their experience, "the average of life in the ministry at home does not much, if at all, exceed that of missionaries abroad and in this country." Considering that many of the missionaries reside in unhealthy climates, like those of Africa, India, and Southern China, this fact is indeed remarkable. It is a new evidence of the truth that our bodies and minds are both designed for useful work; and those who conform to this ordinance of creative wisdom find their natural recompense in health and cheerfulness, and in the "length of days" which these blessings bring with them.

LADY CANDIDATES FOR DEGREES.

WHILE some of our own colleges have been hesitating as to the propriety of granting degrees to women, the great English Universities of Cambridge and Oxford have settled the question for their country by admitting young women equally with young men to the examinations which persons not members of the University have to pass in order to obtain degrees. The report of the "syndicate" appointed by the Senate of Cambridge University, last year, to examine such candidates, has been published, and from this it seems that the ladies came off, on the whole, very fairly. Thirty-six presented themselves for examination in the English branches, the classics, modern languages, mathematics, and other studies. The examiner reports that, in English history and composition, nearly all the candidates "acquitted themselves extremely well." In the papers written, "there was hardly a touch of fine writing," and "there were not four words wrongly spelt." In arithmetic, six of the candidates did "very well," eleven others "creditably," and the others failed. As the examination in this study is said to be specially rigorous, this proportion of successful candidates must be deemed respectable. Twenty-four candidates in French presented themselves; two obtained marks of distinction, and only five failed to pass. There were three candidates in political economy, all of whom passed with some credit. In German, Italian, and drawing, about half the candidates passed.

GREAT MEN.

"How old art thou?" the sage began;
—The boy, aroused from play,
Tossing his fresh-plucked flowers aside,
Sprang to his feet and gayly cried,
"I'm ten years old to-day;
What long, long days! Oh, how I wish
The years would go away!"

2.

A blush of conscious eagerness
Athwart his bright face ran;
"Thou'lt find it," the sage went on to say,
"When manhood comes, a shorter day,
When age, that life's a span,
What dost thou wish for now, my boy?"
"I wish to be a man."

3.

"What wouldst thou do, wert thou a man?"
"I would a traveller be;
And every curious thing I'd know,
And through all foreign lands I'd go,
And sail on every sea;
And I would visit mighty kings,
And they might visit me."

4.

"But kings spurn common men." The boy Looked up with flashing eye:
"I thought that kings were good great men;
But I will be a monarch then,
And have a Palace high;
And none I see in all the world
Shall greater be than I."

5.

"But greatness is not happiness;
My son, an emblem see—
How lovely grow these lowly flowers
How peacefully they pass their hours,—
While yonder lofty tree,
That soared so high to reach the sky,
Was scathed most fearfully."

6.

The boy upon the blasted pine
 Gazed long in sober thought.
 "I'll pluck these flowers," at length he cried,
 "And they will die as that has died,
 And sooner, will they not?
 Nor bud, nor flower, nor leaf, nor stem Remain to mark the spot."

7.

"'Tis true," the old man said, "'tis true;"—
 His voice was low and mild;
 "The hand of man or Heaven's decree
 Alone can bow the great strong tree;
 The finger of a child,
 Or foot of senseless brute comes nigh,
 The flower is plucked or spoiled."

8.

"We prate of peace in lowly place
 —'Tis not in place it lies,
 Evil, whose shadow darkens earth,
 Must perish in its place of birth!
 But hope may seek the skies,
 The good must tend to the All-good,
 The soul that strives will rise."

9.

"Press on, my royal boy, press on!
 As brooklets form the flood,
 The thoughts that swell thy simple heart
 May guide thee to a glorious part,—
 But self must be withstood;
 And hold thou fast thy boyhood's faith,
 THE GREAT MEN ARE THE GOOD!"

NOTE.—This poem has never been published in the LADY'S BOOK. It may be found in Mrs. Hale's new volume "Love, or Woman's Destiny; and Other Poems," just published by Duffield Ashmead, Philadelphia.

NOTES AND NOTICES.

FREE RUSSIA.—In Russia, as everywhere else, liberty shows among its first fruits a desire for the elevation of woman. In Warsaw public lectures are to be provided for the Polish ladies. The subjects mentioned are natural science, technology, and political economy. It is further stated that, in order to assist in providing employment for women, the Directors of the Black Sea Navigation Company propose to employ them in future as bookkeepers, telegraph clerks, and accountants. If the experience of other employers is a test, the Directors will find their reward in the care and fidelity of the ladies whom they trust with these responsible duties.

WOMEN IN INDIA.—A movement, which is full of promise, is taking place in India in regard to the education of women. A normal school for native ladies and girls has already been opened at Poona. At the University of Calcutta two Hindoo ladies were going up for the entrance examination. In the same city a native gentleman has established a class, and given scholarships, for the education of native women as medical attendants of their own sex; and a similar class is to be established at Lucknow. It is pleasing to see such evidences that a beautiful land and an interesting people are rising into the light of civilization.

FROM "Companions of My Solitude." See Literary Notices, page 99.

"You labor under a retiring disposition, you are married, and you wish to retrieve the family fortunes. First, you must at once abandon all those pursuits which depend for success upon refined appreciation. You must seek to do something which many people demand. Emigrate, if you like, and cultivate the ground. Cattle are always in some demand, if only for tallow. It is better to provide the fuel for the lamp than those productions which are said to smell most of it.

"Get, if you can, into one or other of the main grooves of human affairs. It is all the difference of going by railway, and walking over a ploughed field, whether you adopt common courses, or set up one for yourself. You will see most inferior persons highly placed in the army, in the church, in office, at the bar. They have somehow got upon the line, and have moved on well with very little original motive power of their own.

"DOMESTIC SERVANTS.—Their education is wretchedly defective. But, besides that, they are particularly liable to the slavery of conventionality: in fact, there are few people more subdued by weak notions of what is correct for them to have, and to be, and to do. They undergo, in an especial degree, the temptation of being brought near to a class superior to their own in breeding and niceness, and consequently they are very likely to be discontented with their own. Their efforts to save money should be aided and directed. Then masters and mistresses should recognize the fact that men and women love one another in all ranks; that Mary, if a pretty or comely girl, is pretty nearly sure at some time to have a lover. Let the master and mistress be aware of that fact, and treat it as an open question, which may be discussed sometimes with advantage. Instead of such conduct, one hears sometimes that such maxims are laid down as that "no followers are allowed." What does a lady mean who lays down such a law in her household? I could not bear to live with servants who were to see none of their friends or relations; I should feel as if I were keeping a prison."

COPYRIGHT.—It may be important to remind authors, publishers, and others interested, of the exceedingly favorable provision of the revised copyright law, which secures the exclusive liberty of publishing the work or article copyrighted for the term of twenty-eight years, with the privilege of a renewal for the further term of fourteen years, making forty-two years in all.

AMMONIA baths are becoming popular, particularly among those invalids who need, but cannot procure, the natural mineral-water baths. The ammonia bath is easily arranged. To one quart of tepid, soft, or even hard water of grateful temperature, add from one-half to one tablespoonful of aqua ammonia, as sold by apothecaries. The water should feel oily on the fingers, and have a slight odor of ammonia. Use a soft, absorbent cloth of cotton or linen, and bathe every part of the surface of the body successively, using a towel, or not, afterwards. Invalids may use this bath daily with benefit. Persons in ordinary health should not employ it oftener than twice in one week.

Health Department.

BY DR. CHARLES P. UHLE.

HEARTBURN AND WATER-BRASH.

HEARTBURN, or cardialgia, as it is termed among physicians, consists of a painful sensation of heat running up in paroxysms from the pit of the stomach to the fauces. When this sensation is accompanied by the ejection of a watery-like fluid, it is called pyrosis, or water-brash. The two affections are the one and the same disease, the latter being the severer development of it.

Doctor Cullen, who saw a great deal of this complaint, gives the following description of it: "Its distinguishing characteristics are a burning heat in the epigastrium, with a sense of suffocation, as if a cloud of smoke was filling the passages in its journey from the stomach to the mouth, followed by the vomiting, or rather the eructation of a thin watery fluid, resembling saliva, but usually insipid and tasteless, and described by the patient as being cold. The paroxysms usually come on in the morning and forenoon, when the stomach is empty, and lasts for a considerable length of time. The first symptoms of their approach is a severe pain at the pit of the stomach, with a sense of constriction, as if the stomach were drawn towards the back. The pain is increased by raising the body to an erect posture, and therefore the body is bended forward. The pain is often very severe, but passes away with the discharge of the liquid."

It used to be represented that this liquid came from the stomach, and that it was from the excessive quantity of acid in this organ that it was discharged; but, with the increased knowledge that we have of these things at the present day, we have every reason to believe that it comes not from the stomach, but from the glands at the bottom of the oesophagus. For, in the first place, when thrown up without much effort, it is alkaline, and only when there is sufficient heaving to eject some of the contents of the stomach does it present an acid reaction; and, secondly, it presents under the microscope the same appearance as the secretion of the glands of the throat and oesophagus, gives the same chemical tests, and possesses the same power of turning starch into sugar. The attribution, then, of the fluid to the lower part of the gullet, is an obvious conclusion, and the probable rationale of its collection is this: "That from some preternatural irritation of the stomach—such as the persistence of food in it, the collection of mucus, or morbid sensitiveness of the nerves—the salivary secretion, which accompanies the food to this organ, and which continues afterwards, is prevented from entering it by an irritated constriction of the muscular tube only at these times. After the elapse of a certain number of hours, it is ejected, and the result is attained by that easy reversed action which is observed in the oesophagus, as distinguished from the severe strain of emptying the stomach from vomiting; and hence we have the easy eructation of mild fluid, constituting an attack of the symptoms in question." And this is just the long and short of water-brash. A spasm of the gullet detains the secretions of the salivary and oesophageal glands from entering the stomach except at meal times; these secretions are enabled during the absence of food to collect in considerable quantities as a consequence, and be thrown off when necessary by a simple reversed muscular action.

We have spoken of a sensation of heat or pain that accompanies the eructation of fluid; but it must not be supposed that it is from the acrid, alkaline, or acid qualities of the fluids ejected that this pain arises, for this is not the case. A simple evidence of this is exhibited by swallowing again the liquid which rises into the mouth. Of course, if it was capable of giving pain by its chemical constituents, it would do so in going down as well as in coming up. But nothing of the sort is experienced, and it excites as little discomfort as saliva in its downward course. Besides which the sensation, or heartburn, as it is called, occurs without the eructation of fluid; indeed, it is by far most commonly dry, consisting only of a sensation like hot smoke rising in the throat, but bringing nothing up. In these cases, the most familiar ones to us all, either the spasm is not complete enough to stay the secretions, or not strong enough to bring it up, or that it has been exhausted by the recent digestion of a meal.

The causes of heartburn and pyrosis, though they are diseases of the oesophagus, do not lie in the oesophagus. Cancer, ulceration, stricture, and the most extensive diseases of that organ do not originate them in the majority of cases, whereas a little chronic inflammation, or, more commonly still, simply atony of the stomach, seldom exists long without them. They are not, then, the accompaniments of dangerous or fatal disorders, and this may be a consolation to those who suffer from them.

As regards the treatment, these affections are well known to be capable of relief by a considerable variety of remedies, and those in many instances of a very discordant character. When the pain is not very great, alkalies—such as carbonate of soda, chalk, and magnesia—afford considerable temporary relief. They do not act by neutralizing acid, as people generally believe; but by blunting the sensitiveness of the oesophageal and gastric nerves, just as lime-water, soda, borax, etc., will allay the pain of the skin in cutaneous diseases or an irritable blister. There is no positive evidence that there ever is an over-secretion of acid in the stomach, or that the stomach is pained by the acidity of its contents; and, besides, these drugs, when in large doses, give relief even where alkaline and neutral matters are ejected. They are, in fact, anodynes; and, like all anodynes, they have the inconvenience of requiring the frequent augmentation of the dose to keep up the same degree of efficiency. Given merely as palliatives, alkalies contribute but little towards a cure. If intended to produce the latter result, their administration must be much more frequent than the paroxysms demand.

Of palliatives to excessive pain, the best is opium, because it is the best known and the most manageable. It relieves the immediate pain and spasm; and, when combined with an astringent, as kino or catechu, gives a tone to the stomach and oesophagus that certainly is a step towards a cure. The subnitrate of bismuth is also an excellent remedy, and it has only failed in acquiring a character equal to its merits because people content themselves with too small doses. It is true that the ordinary quantity of ten or twelve grains is often sufficient; but very often it is not, and then half a drachm, or even a drachm, may be given without danger, and frequently with the best of results. In cases of atony or sluggishness of the stomach, either from debility or mental causes—such as anxiety, overwork, etc.—it is best treated by such remedies as relieve the general condition of the alimentary canal. Hence iron, nuxvomica, etc., are enumerated among the many remedies for its removal. The latter should not be used, however, without directions from a physician, as it is a powerful medicine, and may do irretrievable injury in the hands of the uninitiated.

Literary Notices.

From CLAXTON, REMSEN, & HAFELFINGER, Philadelphia:—

TRAVELS OF AN AMERICAN OWL. A Satire. By Virginia W. Johnson. The vices and extravagances of Young America, together with the follies and absurdities of American parvenus abroad, are satirically delineated in this volume. It is entertainingly written, and illustrated by a number of silhouette pictures drawn by Augustus Hoppin, and engraved by Jasper Green.

A COMPLETE FRENCH CLASS BOOK. By Paul E. Girard, French Teacher at the Female Teachers' Institute, Philadelphia. Our thanks are due the author of this truly excellent class book for the copy now before us. From the examination we have made of it, we have no hesitation in giving it a hearty recommendation as a work which will meet every requirement of a book of its kind. In it are embraced four different books: An entirely new and complete treatise on French pronunciation; a progressive French reader, with explanatory notes; a French grammar, with exercises and dialogues; and a summary of French verbs.

THE ADVENTURES OF BIG-FOOT WALLACE, the Texas Ranger and Hunter. By John C. Duval, author of "Jack Dobell; or, a Boy's Adventures in Texas," etc. With portrait and engravings. "Big-Foot Wallace," says the author in his preface, "is better known throughout Texas as an Indian fighter, hunter, and ranger, than any one, perhaps, now living in the State. Few men now living have witnessed as many stirring incidents, had more 'hair-breadth escapes,' or gone through more of the hardships and perils of a border life." The book has been written out from notes furnished by himself, and told, as far as practicable, in his own language. It is a lively, stirring volume, full of all sorts of adventures and incidents of frontier life.

LITTLE MARY AND THE FAIRY. By Harriet B. McKeever, author of "The Pigeons' Wedding," etc. A pretty volume, with brightly painted pictures, which will catch the eyes of admiring little folks.

From PORTER & COATES, Philadelphia:—

MOTHER GOOSE IN HER NEW DRESS. The publishers present this volume as a fac-simile of the original drawings, which were not designed for the public eye, but as a birthday gift from a daughter to her father, who occupies a high position in government. It was only at the earnest solicitation of friends that she consented to their publication. As the work of an amateur, the illustrations of this volume are really something creditable. The book is beautifully printed and bound, and is admirably suited for a holiday gift. Price, $4 50.

From EVANS, STODDART, & Co., Philadelphia:—

CRUMBS SWEEP UP. By T. De Witt Talmage. A volume of brief pithy essays, written in a lively, pleasant style, and, without being profoundly wise, still containing enough of both wit and wisdom to give their common-sense views of men and things a more than common-place character.

THE GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK RECEIPTS AND HOUSEHOLD HINTS. Carefully Selected and Arranged. By S. Annie Frost. This is a work to which thousands of our subscribers will extend a hearty welcome. It will, we think, prove to be one of the best, most reliable, and most original cook-books before the public. Most of the receipts contained in it were contributed to the LADY'S BOOK only, and are not to be found in any other publications. They are all derived from the practical experience of old housekeepers, and were tested before they were brought before the public. The usefulness of the work has been greatly enhanced by the addition of a complete alphabetical index.

From PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

MRS. HALE'S RECEIPTS FOR THE MILLION. Containing four thousand five hundred and forty-five receipts, facts, directions, etc., in the useful, ornamental, and domestic arts, and in the conduct of life. By Mrs. Sarah Josepha Hale. This is a new edition of a book which should never be allowed to go out of print. Its information pertaining to domestic affairs is almost encyclopedical in character, and is complete and reliable. It is a book which should be in every family.

ADVENTURES OF CAPTAIN SIMON SUGGS, Late of the Tallapoosa Volunteers. By the author of "Widow Rugby's Husband." A humorous American book, containing a number of illustrations by Darley.

From MCKINNEY & MARTIN, Philadelphia:—

ALMOST A PRIEST. A Tale that Deals in Facts. By Mrs. Julia McNair Wright, author of "Priest and Nun," etc. A writer always labors under peculiar disadvantages when he or she attempts to give the form of a novel to a controversial work. There is always the danger of being one-sided in the representations of character, and of being led away by prejudice in the statements of facts. This volume is as interesting as novels of this class usually are, though its author is better in invention than in execution. If she had made a plain narrative, and omitted her comments and personal appeals to the reader, her work would have been much improved.

From HENRY C. LEA, Philadelphia:—

THE AMERICAN JOURNAL OF THE MEDICAL SCIENCES. Edited by Isaac Hays, M. D. Assisted by J. Minis Hays, M. D. October, 1870. Price $5 a year.

From J. P. SKEELLY & Co., Philadelphia:—

TWO WAYS OF DOING IT. By Miss L. Bates, author of "Beginning." This little volume is made the medium for repeating many of the worn-out arguments against a wider sphere of labor and education for women. Such books as these can have very little effect except as they show the weakness and fallaciousness of the reasoning of the conservatives. As well attempt to beat back the rising tide, as to check the tendency of public sentiment in the "question of the day."

From D. APPLETON & Co., New York, through J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

THE ORIGIN OF CIVILIZATION AND THE PRIMITIVE CONDITION OF MAN. Mental and Social Condition of Savages. By Sir John Lubbock, Bart., M. P., F. R. S. This volume, the production of a writer who ranks among the most eminent anthropologists of our day, is one that will deeply interest, not only the scientific student, but the general reader as well. The design of the author has been to describe the social and mental condition of savages, their arts, their systems of marriage, and of relationship, their religions, language, moral character, and laws. A spirit of original and philosophic inquiry gives life to the book, which is thereby prevented from being a mere rehash of the purely narrative accounts of travellers.

VALERIE AYLMEY. A Novel. By Christian

Reid. This is the production of a new aspirant for literary honors; a story well and pleasingly written, but possessing no striking features either in plot or execution. Its author is a Southerner, and the scenes of the novel are laid principally in the Southern States, the period dating immediately subsequent to the civil war.

LAY SERMONS, ADDRESSES, AND REVIEWS. By Thomas Henry Huxley, LL. D., F. R. S., author of "Origin of Species," etc. This is the latest and most popular of the works of an English philosopher and scientist, remarkable alike for his bold spirit of investigation, and for the candor with which he enunciates the results of his inquiries. The present volume contains his recent powerful address on "Spontaneous Generation," an address which has excited the attention of the learned throughout the civilized world. Whatever opinion may be held in regard to the theological tendencies of Prof. Huxley's writings, no one, we believe, can doubt his reverence for the truth, his learning, or his ability to utter the most profound thoughts in language at once clear and elegant.

CORNELL'S PHYSICAL GEOGRAPHY. By S. S. Cornell. This book contains nineteen pages of maps, and over one hundred diagrams and illustrations. Its system is in many respects entirely different from that usually adopted by compilers of geographies. Its information is far more varied and thorough. It is the last of a series of geographies; and is intended to convey knowledge to the student concerning the structure of the earth, the atmosphere, the mineral, vegetable, and animal kingdoms, volcanoes, ocean currents and river systems, wind zones and ocean routes, and much other matter that is entirely omitted, or only lightly touched upon, in other works.

APPLETON'S ILLUSTRATED ALMANAC for 1871. A beautiful pamphlet, with valuable and interesting reading matter and handsome illustrations.

From ROBERT CARTER & BROTHERS, New York, through ALFRED MARTIN, Philadelphia:—

"WHAT SHE COULD." By the author of "The Wide, Wide World." Notwithstanding the many books that have been given to the world during the last eighteen years, and the numberless ones that must have been read and forgotten, there are few readers who do not retain the remembrance of a novel noted for its beauty of style, purity of tone, and elevation of sentiment—a novel called "The Wide, Wide World." It was almost the first of a class which has since become numerous, and to which Mrs. Whitney and Miss Alcott have worthily contributed. "What She Could" is a story of the same type by the same author; not as interesting, we think, as her first production, but still well worth reading.

LIGHT AND TRUTH; or, Bible Thoughts and Themes. The Lesser Epistles. By Horatius Bonar, D. D. A series of brief sermons or essays, taking for their text some portion of the Epistles, beginning with Galatians.

CONANT FARM. By the author of "Squire Downing's Helrs," etc. A story of American life, pretending to no sensation, but quietly and naturally told. Though it is not likely to make a stir in the literary world, it should have plenty of readers.

HYACINTHE AND HER BROTHERS. By Joanna H. Mathews, author of the "Bessie Books." This is volume five of a series of stories on the commandments.

DOWN THE STEPS. By the author of "Squire Downing's Helrs," etc. This is the sixth and last volume of the "Ledgeside Series," of which "Squire Downing's Helrs" is the first. An excellent book.

THE YOUNG POTATO-ROASTERS and the Boy.

Guardian. By C. E. Bowen, author of "Jack, the Conqueror," etc.

FREDDIE FIGHTING HIS WAY. By Say Putnam, author of "Little Freddie Feeding His Soul."

Two pleasing little volumes suited for the family or Sunday-School library.

LAURENCE BRONSEN'S VICTORY. By the author of the "Golden Ladder Series," etc.

CHRISTY'S GRANDSON. By the author of "Laurence Bronsen's Victory."

ALLAN HAYWOOD. By the author of "Laurence Bronsen's Victory."

These three volumes belong to the "Drayton Hall Series," a series of stories illustrative of the Beatitudes. The first volume has for its motto, "Blessed are the poor in spirit;" the second, "Blessed are they that mourn;" the third, "Blessed are the meek."

From J. B. FORD, New York, through J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

OUR SEVEN CHURCHES. By Thomas K. Beecher, Elmira, N. Y. These lectures exhibit a truly Christian spirit, and, aside from their merely literary merits, are well worthy of being read and re-read for the sentiments of charity they present with so much earnestness and feeling. Starting out with the idea that "we must learn to love and respect our fellow-men and our sister churches," and that "every church can teach every other church something," Mr. Beecher proceeds to give an able and striking exposition of the best features of the seven great religious denominations in America—the Roman Catholic, Presbyterian, Protestant Episcopal, Methodist Episcopal, Baptist, Congregational, and Liberal Christian. The book is a remarkable one, and will attract much attention.

CHRISTIAN HEART-SONGS. By John Zundel, author of "Modern School for the Organ," etc. A valuable addition to our collections of church music for congregational singing. Most of the tunes are original with Prof. Zundel, for the last eighteen years organist in Plymouth (Henry Ward Beecher's) Church, and a worthy pupil of the celebrated Bink.

From SHELDON & Co., New York, through J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

THE CASTAWAYS. A Story of Adventure in the Wilds of Borneo. By Captain Mayne Reid. Interspersed in an exceedingly sensational narrative of adventure in the Indian Archipelago is much really valuable and reliable information concerning the inhabitants, beasts, birds, and fishes of that latitude. "The Castaways" is a book that will instruct as well as interest.

WORDS AND THEIR USES, Past and Present. A Study of the English Language. By Richard Grant White. The papers embraced in this volume originally appeared under their present title in The Galaxy, where they attracted merited attention, and drew upon their author a great deal of harsh criticism that was not at all deserved. We may fancy that Mr. White is just a little priggish at times, but he has carried out the main purpose of his book—"the consideration of the right use and the abuse of words and idioms"—with a keenness of logic, grasp of knowledge, and mastery of expression, of which no other American writer on philological subjects is capable. His book is one that every student of our language should have within reach.

From DODD & MEAD, New York, through CLAXTON, REMSEN, & HAPPELFINGER, Philadelphia:—

THE FIRST, SECOND, AND THIRD BOOKS OF ROLLO AND LUCY. Poetry. Original and selected. By Jacob Abbott, author of "The Rollo Books," etc.

With original engravings. The first of these beautiful little books is made up of poetical pieces of a character so simple as to be within the comprehension of children too young to read themselves. The second embraces a somewhat higher range of pieces, and is intended for children either just learning to read, or who are able to read for themselves. The third book of the series contains, in addition to pieces not before published, a considerable number of specimens selected from the works of the most distinguished English and American poets.

THE JUNO STORIES. By Jacob Abbott. Vols. III. and IV. Juno on a Journey and Hubert. With these two handsome volumes the interesting series to which they belong is completed. The entire set consists of four volumes. "The Juno Stories," it may be as well to state, are intended to meet in part the present urgent demand for a higher class of Sunday-School literature.

NELLY'S DARK DAYS. By the author of "Jessica's First Prayer," etc. A sweet and touching little temperance story, of a religious character, and well adapted for Sunday-School libraries.

GEOFFRY THE LOLLARD. By Frances Eastwood. A story of the early days of the English reformation, the main facts in which have been drawn from that museum of horrors, "Fox's Book of Martyrs."

From HARPER & BROTHERS, New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS and LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

WHICH IS THE HEROINE? A Novel.

THE VIVIAN ROMANCE. By Mortimer Collins.

Two interesting volumes belonging to "Harper's Library of Select Novels."

From NATIONAL TEMPERANCE SOCIETY and PUBLICATION HOUSE, New York, through J. C. GARRIGUES & Co., Philadelphia:—

ROY'S SEARCH; or, Lost in the Cars. By Helen C. Pearson.

HOPEDALE TAVERN, and What It Wrought. By J. William Van Namee.

Two temperance stories of moderate interest and unexceptionable morals.

THE PITCHER OF COOL WATER, and Other Stories. By T. S. Arthur, author of "Ten Nights in a Bar-Room," etc. This little volume contains eight temperance stories written in Mr. Arthur's best style. They were intended originally for children, but will interest older persons as well.

From CHARLES SCRIBNER & Co., New York, through J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

WONDERS OF ACOUSTICS; or, the Phenomena of Sound. From the French of Rodolphe Radare. The English revised by Robert Ball, M. A. With illustrations. This is a recent addition to "Scribner's Illustrated Library of Wonders." It will be found very entertaining and instructive, and is certainly the best available popular treatise on the science of sound.

From LEE & SHEPARD, Boston, through CLAXTON, REMSEN, & HAFELFINGER, and J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

PIANO AND MUSICAL MATTER. By G. de la Motte. This is the third edition of a work which has already met with unqualified success. The first four chapters are intended for beginners, and will, if proper attention is given them, last the first six months of their studies. The succeeding chapters may be used with advantage to the pianist for years. The book is thorough in its mode of instruction, and when its contents are mastered, the student may well claim a proficiency in the science of music.

LIGHT AT EVENTIDE. A Compilation of Choice Religious Hymns and Poems. By the editor of "Chimes for Childhood," etc. This is a most judicious collection of poems selected from volumes, from newspapers, and magazines, and containing in its list of authors the names of the best English and American writers. The volume is neat and plain, yet beautifully printed and bound, and one that should receive special attention during the holidays.

WHY AND HOW. Why the Chinese Emigrate, and the Means they Adopt for the Purpose of Reaching America. By Russell H. Conwell. This is a very readable book, containing, in a comparatively small space, much interesting and useful information with regard to the natives of China, and their manners, customs, and national peculiarities.

THE SOCIAL STAGE. Original Dramas, Comedies, Burlesques, and Entertainments, for Home Recreation and Public Exhibitions. By George M. Baker, author of "The Mimic Stage," etc. These plays are especially adapted to the wants of home and social circles, where they can be produced with very little expense and trouble.

LETTERS EVERYWHERE. Stories and Rhymes for Children. With twenty-eight illustrations by Theophile Schuler. A charming little book, odd and fanciful, both in its letter-press and illustrations, and certain to become popular with the little folks.

THE HOUSE ON WHEELS; or, The Stolen Child. By Madame de Stolz. Translated from the French by Miss E. F. Adams. A lively story, illustrating the evils resulting from disobedience.

FIELD AND FOREST; or, The Fortunes of a Farmer. By Oliver Optic. Oliver Optic is so prolific a writer that we could hardly expect him to be uniformly excellent. However, his youthful readers seem to find no lack of interest in this volume, which belongs to the "Onward and Upward" series.

THE SPRINGDALE STORIES. By Mrs. S. B. C. Samuels. These stories, six in number, are entitled "Adele," "Nettle's Trial," "Herbert," "Eric," "Ennistellen," and "Johnstone's Farm." We asked a young critic, not yet in her teens, what these stories were like, and her answer was an unqualified "Splendid!" And we dare say her judgment is quite as good as ours in regard to what will please children.

THE BECKONING SERIES. By Paul Cobden. Two volumes of this series are now ready for the public—"Who Will Win?" and "Going on a Mission." They will prove pleasant and profitable reading for the young folks.

LITTLE FOLKS ASTRAY. By Sophie May, author of "Little Prudy Stories." The "Little Prudy Stories" were so popular among the children that they will not be at all sorry to see the same characters brought into another series.

From LORING, Boston:—

DAFFY DOWN DILLY AND HER FRIENDS. By the author of "The Fairy Egg." The opening volume of "The Fairy Folk Series," a series which promises to become popular among its juvenile readers.

From NICHOLS & HALL, Boston:—

Godey's Arm-Chair.

JANUARY, 1871.

ANOTHER new year, and another new volume! And, to keep pace with the times, we have adorned our book with a new dress. A beautiful one it is, too, furnished by the North American Type Foundry of Messrs. Collins & M'Leester, whose reputation for casting beautiful-faced type is first class. Our readers will perceive by this that we are still progressing, and taking advantage of everything new to improve the magazine. The Book for the year just closed has been pronounced superior to any former years, and we feel that this improvement in its appearance will be recognized as another step towards perfection for the year 1871!

We will now speak of our illustrations for the month. Two steel plates—one, a handsome title-page, with five tableaux, illustrating the sports and pleasures of the holiday season; the other, "Looking for an Eclipse," which will be recognized as a truthful design of what is witnessed every time an eclipse comes round. Two beautiful wood-cuts—companion pictures—"New-Year's Reception" and "Where is the Key?" The scene, in the first one, is the old-time fashion of receiving our friends, now happily dying out. We have never recommended the custom of handing out the wine; coffee or good chocolate would be much better. Then there would be no missing night-keys on going home, as seen in the other picture. A splendid colored fashion-plate for January is also given, which can be compared with the best of the French plates, and will not suffer by the comparison, as it is executed by an artist of the French school. Besides the colored plate, there is the large extension sheet containing designs of a later date. We never take the trouble of having anything engraved for this sheet but what will be found really useful. The same can be said of the engravings in our work-department.

Our lady friends who take a delight in knitting or netting will find, accompanying this number, a presentation sheet, giving instructions in the art of guipure netting. We have been at great expense in having this sheet engraved and printed, and know that it will be appreciated.

The reading matter in this number we do not intend to eulogize. If such writers as Marlon Harland, Miss Dorr, Ino Churchill, Miss Frost, and others can be brought together in one number of a magazine, the publisher may well leave it to his readers to praise without his doing it.

CLUB RATES WITH OTHER MAGAZINES.—Godey's Lady's Book and Harper's Magazine, one year, $5.50. Godey's Lady's Book and Arthur's Home Magazine, one year, $4.00. Godey's Lady's Book, Arthur's Home Magazine, and Children's Hour, one year, $5.00. Godey's Lady's Book and the Children's Hour, one year, $3.50.

We ask your attention to our advertisement for 1871, published on page 110. It is but an outline of our intention. Our resources are ample, and we shall continue our efforts to make the LADY'S BOOK—what for forty years it has been—the leading Book in America.

CLUBS! CLUBS!—In organizing your clubs, bear always in mind that the LADY'S BOOK is the cheapest magazine in the country—for the simple reason that you get more, and better for your money. Examine for yourselves. It has become a universal saying that it is "an evidence of the good taste of a family when the LADY'S BOOK is seen upon the centre-table." Any person with very little trouble can get up a club. The terms are low—within the reach of all who wish to subscribe. We firmly believe that there are many persons who would like to unite with one or more in procuring the Book, but require some one to ask them. Our old subscribers would oblige us very much if they would endeavor to increase their club lists this year.

In addition to our other specialties—such as cottage designs, drawing lessons, new music, etc.—we shall have a department for making children's clothes with diagram patterns.

A most delightful dessert may be found in the new article of food, Sea Moss Farine, which can be purchased for twenty-five cents a package, that will produce sixteen quarts of most excellent blanc mange, or a proportionate quantity of custards, light puddings, farina, creams, sauces, gruels, Charlotte Russe, etc. This seems almost incredible, but it is vouched for by ladies of the highest respectability, who append their names to their statements. The Company state at least fifty delicious dishes can be made from the Sea Moss Farine, and give, in their circular, the receipts for many of them. We consider Mr. Rand's discovery a highly important one for the millions, and, indeed, for all classes of society, in these stringent times.

COLUMBIA.

L. A. GODEY, Esq., Sir: Having been a subscriber to your excellent Magazine for many years, I feel and know its worth, and hail the time of its coming with great joy. To have GODEY fail to come, would be as much of a loss as a near and dear friend. L.

FREIGHT ON LETTERS AND PREMIUM ON DRAFTS.—Subscribers will please understand that when they send their letters by an express company they must pay the freight, and those who send drafts must pay the premium. We advise subscribers to remit a post-office order or a draft payable to the order of L. A. GODEY. The rates for postal money orders as established by law are as follows:—

"The postal money order system established by law provides that no money order shall be issued for any sum less than $1 nor more than $50. All persons who receive money orders are required to pay therefor the following charges or fees, viz: For an order for $1 or for any larger sum, but not exceeding $20, the sum of 10 cents shall be charged and exacted by the postmaster giving such order; for an order of $20 and up to $30, the charge will be 15 cents; more than $30 and up to $40, the charge shall be 20 cents; over $40 and up to $50, the charge shall be 25 cents."

In this number will be found an advertisement of the Toledo Blade, edited by the inimitable "Nasby." It is an excellent paper, and has an extensive circulation. As an advertising medium it will be found invaluable.

OUR MUSICAL COLUMN.

HOLLOWAY'S MUSICAL MONTHLY for January.—The new year opens with a very attractive holiday number. It contains a liberal quantity and an excellent quality of new and fashionable sheet music, to suit every taste of singer and performer. The brilliant player, as well as the young pupil in first lessons, will find something adapted to his capacity in every number of the Monthly. Our friends should not confound Holloway's Musical Monthly with the multitude of musical newspapers before the public. Ours is a monthly publication of real sheet music, furnishing elegantly printed music at a less price than any dime or half-dime music published. This is a fact which should be remembered by music-buyers who want elegance with cheapness. With the January number the Monthly enters upon its ninth year, and it is now the oldest and best periodical of its kind published. Let every one of our friends give it a trial for one year. We have reduced our club terms for 1871 as follows: Single copy for one year, $4. Two copies, $3.50 each. Four copies, or over, $3 each. Single numbers, 40 cents. To insure a large subscription list for 1871, we offer the following unprecedented premiums:—

Music given away.—For every subscription, new or old, at $4, we will send by return mail $1 worth of music from our catalogue. Subscribers will state the kind of music wanted, whether easy or difficult, or songs or waltzes, &c. For every two subscriptions, at $4 each, we will send five dollars' worth, the persons forming the club to select the music to suit themselves from our catalogue, which we will send on receipt of the money for the subscriptions. For every club of three, at $4 each, we will send ten dollars' worth of music on the same terms. For every club of four, at $4 each, we will make the unparalleled offer of sixteen dollars' worth of music free, thus giving two dollars for one—the amount of the premium equalling the principal. We make this offer for a short time only. Get up your clubs at once.

Holloway's Musical Monthly Free.—Any one ordering direct from us six dollars' worth of sheet music, will receive as a premium the Monthly for the entire year free. A fine opportunity to get the best musical periodical in the world for nothing.

Christmas and New Year Music.—Just published: While Shepherds watched their Flocks, beautiful anthem by W. H. W. Darley, 60 cents. Christmas Bells, duet and chorus, by Stewart, 30. Under the Mistletoe, by Glover, 20. Around the Fire, song and chorus, 30. Over the Ice we Fly, lively and pretty, 20. Skating on the Pond, charming song and chorus, by Mrs. Hackelton, 30. Now the Days are all Gone Over, song for the close of the year, 25. Another Year, New Year Song, 20.

Also, Kriss Kringle March, with portrait of the jolly old fellow himself, 50. Christmas Chimes, beautiful transcription by Brinley Richards, 50. Snow-flakes, by same, elegantly illustrated, 50. Holiday Hours, lively bagatelle, with beautiful title-page, 40. Snow Castles, by Ascher, 20. Kriss Kringle, divertimento, by Oesten, 20. Merry Yule Mazourka, by McNaughton, 30. Winter Waltz, easy and pretty, with handsome picture title, 40. Party Polka, 20. Frozen Rill Polka-schottische, 30. A selection from the above would make a choice holiday present from one friend to another. We will send by return mail, free of postage, any pieces ordered. Address all orders for sheet music, or the Musical Monthly, to J. Starr Holloway, Publisher, Box Post-Office, Philadelphia.

We shall be pleased to receive some spicy short articles, poetry or prose, for our "Arm-Chair." We do not want any anecdotes of precocious children.

HUMORS OF ADVERTISING.—In the Philadelphia Ledger we have found the following:—

"A lady wants washing and ironing." Any one may want washing, but we think that all would object to being ironed.

"A woman wants a wash." This time it is a woman. Are we to infer that it is only the fair sex that want washing.

"A girl wants cooking." This sounds cannibalish. "A situation is wanted as saleslady." Formerly it would have been saleswoman, but since we have changed Fanny into Fannie, Sally into Sallie, and Molly into Mollie, all women have changed to ladies.

"A cook wishes a situation back of 211—St." Why so particular? Would not back of any other number and street do as well?

"A handsome gentleman's drag for sale." Here we have only the gentleman's taste on his personal beauty.

"Wanted, two men on ladies' gaiters." Goodness gracious—what for?

"Shoemakers wanted on lasters and heelers." This is technical, we suppose.

As the holiday will soon be here, perhaps we shall again hear of the palatial marble front, religious society, on Chestnut St., wanting a lady cashier at $5 a week, she to be responsible for all counterfeit money taken.

"THE WREATH OF IMMORTELLS."—We are pleased to announce that we have made arrangements with the publishers of this splendid steel engraving, to furnish it to our subscribers at the same price we are able to send them "THE ANGEL OF PEACE," and "BED-TIME," viz: $1 a copy.

It represents two children bearing a wreath of immortelles to lay upon their mother's grave; and is very sweet, and tender, and beautiful. All who have seen it are charmed with its beauty. As a work of art, it is of high excellence, being one of the choicest pictures of the season. The English print sells for $6, and an artist would scarcely find any difference between the copy and the original.

We continue to have large orders for "THE ANGEL OF PEACE," and "BED-TIME," at $1 each. They are elegant pictures, and all are delighted who get them at so trifling a cost.

In an obituary notice of a little Kansas baby, seven months old, we find the following grief-provoking stanza:—

"Our cottage, aye, is lonesome now,
We see the dress and bib,
But not the eye and noble brow
That filled her empty crib."

Now, if the eye of the deceased baby was so large, and her brow so expansive as to fill the empty crib, what an infant Hercules it must have been.

THOSE MISERABLE MURATS.—It appears by the intercepted documents of the Emperor Napoleon the III. that he spent millions upon millions of francs in paying the debts of this family, the head of which had not credit enough to get a breakfast in the neighborhood of Bordentown, N. J., where he resided. Set a beggar on horseback, etc.

DEAR GODEY: May our ever kind Providence spare to you a long-continued prosperity and happiness in sending forth to woman that true helper and blessing, the germ of American literature—our excellent LADY'S BOOK.
M. K. F., Illinois.

WHY is a watch-dog bigger by night than by day? "Because he is let out at night and taken in in the morning."

DREER'S GARDEN CALENDAR FOR 1871.

WE are again reminded of the approach of "seed time" by the appearance of this little annual which contains full descriptive lists of vegetable and flower seeds, plants, bulbs, and every requisite for the garden or green-house, with practical directions for the preparation of the soil, sowing, and cultivation, illustrated with a large number of engravings.

As usual, many new varieties are offered. Among vegetables, we particularly notice the Trophy Tomato. This is the celebrated variety which sold last year at $5.00 for twenty seeds; it is now sold at 25 cents for about one hundred seeds. This is undoubtedly the finest tomato for size, solidity, flavor, and earliness ever offered. Mr. Waring, who introduced it, states that it is "the result of twenty-four years' crossing and careful selection." Several new peas from Europe. The Cook's Favorite (or Hundredfold) and Saxton's Alpha are superior varieties. A new lettuce of special merit, called the Hanson Nonpareil Lettuce, being the largest and finest head lettuce ever cultivated, is offered for the first time. The heads are solid, crisp, tender, of delicate flavor, and immense size—one head being sufficient for an ordinary family. Price per packet 25 cents. Bastian's Perfection Turnip Beet. This is also a great acquisition. "Extra early beets," of which the Bassano is the type, are all inclined to boll white. This variety has, by careful selection and hybridization, been so improved as to possess all the earliness of the Bassano, with a much better shape, and clear blood-color when boiled. Price 20 cents per oz. packet. The above are only a few of the many choice varieties found in Mr. Dreer's Garden Calendar.

Of Flower Seeds Mr. Dreer has an unusually large and fine collection; a specialty having been made of this department. The many visitors at his seed-farm at Riverton, N. J., during the past summer, were not only delighted but astonished at the perfection and cultivation of the immense beds of German Asters, Balsams, Carnations, Petunias, Double Portulaca, Zinnias, Verbenas, &c., cultivated for seeds. Also the acres of Dahlias, Roses, Gladioli, Lilies, and Tuberoses; and other plants in full bloom. But all who have a love and taste for flowers, and who has not? especially among the hundreds of thousand readers of the LADY'S BOOK, should send at once for a copy of DREER'S GARDEN CALENDAR for 1871, which will be mailed by sending a postage stamp to his address,

HENRY A. DREER,
714 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

TRUE KINDNESS.—A Kansas lady, on retiring to her room one night, found it literally filled with martins, which had flown in during her absence. Instead of harshly turning them out into the cold, the kind-hearted lady captured nearly all the little creatures and had them served up the next day in a pot-pie.

SPLENDID CHROMOS at less than half the price asked in the stores. By a wholesale purchase we are enabled to offer the following superb pictures, which cannot be distinguished from very superior oil-paintings, at the following low prices:—

"Asking a Blessing." Painted by Professor Jordan. Size 20½ by 15½. Price $3.00.

"Isn't She Pretty." Painted by the celebrated Lilly M. Spencer. Size 12¾ by 16½. Price $2.50.

"Mount Merino"—Sunset on the Hudson. Painted by Arthur Ponton. Size 19¾ by 10¾. Price $2.50.

We will pay the postage on all the pictures. These beautiful parlor ornaments must be seen to be appreciated. They far exceed any chromos yet published. Address L. A. Godey, Philadelphia.

GODEY in the very front rank:—

As a ladies' magazine, GODEY's has long stood in the very front rank. Its plates, colored and plain, are very numerous and extremely fine. The amount of reading matter is unusually large, and very interesting and valuable.—Courier, Newark, N. Y.

The reading matter is excellent, and the receipts are invaluable to housekeepers. GODEY has always stood at the head of all similar publications. He cannot rise any higher, but his position he is determined to maintain.—Journal, Morrisania, N. Y.

We mean to try if we can't rise a little higher.

"GOOD EYE TO BUSINESS.—A Meadville (Pa.) paper keeps this advertisement standing: 'Cupid and Hymen—the little brown cottage at Cambridge, Pa., is the place to call to have the marriage knot promptly and strongly tied. Inquire of Rev. S. S. Whitcomb.'"

We would ask whether his knots are so strongly tied that an Indiana divorce court can't untie them.

THE model parlor magazine of America:—

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK.—This beautiful magazine, though forty years of age, does not grow dim, but on the contrary increases in beauty with the years, until it is now universally admitted to be "the model parlor magazine of America."—Southerner, Darlington, S. C.

NORTH, South, East, and West pronounce GODEY the best ladies' magazine in the world.

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK.—This great favorite with our fair ones is on our table. Of course, it is a splendid number, for it is always so. The press and people, North, South, East, and West, pronounce GODEY's the best ladies' magazine in the world.—Times, Calhoun, Geo.

"BRIDGET, in reply to a remark of her mistress, who said she had put too much garlic in the omelet, replied that she did it so that it would not taste so strongly of the eggs, which were bad."

Poor eggs! they have to answer for many bad jokes. Here is one of them, and not new, either. A man at a hotel asked for eggs. Waiter told him they had none. Presently he saw an omelet brought to another customer. "Halloa, waiter, I thought you said you had no eggs." "We have eggs, sir, good enough for omelets, but won't do to bile."

THE only legitimate fashion book:—

THE LADY'S BOOK.—L. A. Godey, proprietor, Philadelphia, Pa. The only legitimate ladies' magazine in America.—Journal, Newark, N. J.

THE mosquitoes were so plenty in the Adirondacks that they could not all get on a stranger at once, so they stood around in reliefs, and waited for their turns, like customers in a barber shop.

A WORD about fashion plates and the lady of the house:—

The fashion plates are, of course, the very best, for GODEY never has any other. Thousands of homes owe much of their beauty and attractiveness to suggestions drawn by the lady of the house from GODEY's.—Free Press, Lebanon, N. H.

CELEBRATION OF A WOODEN WEDDING.—The Charleston Courier says that a young widow of that place has just celebrated her wooden wedding by marrying a blockhead.

GENTLEMEN, listen to these appeals:—

Its plates are very fine, and the reading matter is extremely interesting. No husband who loves his wife will fail to supply her with this indispensable publication.—Observer, Erie, Pa.

A MODEL RESIDENCE.

Drawn expressly for Godey's Lady's Book, by ISAAC H. HOBBS & SON, Architects, 809 and 811 Chestnut Street, formerly 436 Walnut Street, Philadelphia.

THE above is a design of a cheap building. Almost square in front, yet broken in such manner that will add to its size with trifling expense over a square house. The exterior has but little ornament, yet is made pretty by the use of proper proportion of its straight lines, showing that beauty is not dependent entirely on ornament, but on the relation of sizes, one to the other.

The plan contains four fine rooms on each floor, and without the loss of space in forming irregular shapes, as all of the rooms are square and provided dining all together, the house could be built for between $3000 and $4000. We are anxious for the public good to abolish the miserable system of building and designing both being done by the carpenter, as their principle generally is to cling to the old and discard the new, and by this means adapt the same ornament to the cottage and mansion, stable or church, and use the same size cornice for the towering spire as the low porch of the cottager's home. This is all wrong, and it is about time the people of our enlightened age had discovered and discarded it.

FIRST STORY.

with the same requirements for comfort as larger and more expensive houses. The rooms are all well lighted by large French sash, and can be thoroughly heated and ventilated.

The porch across the front, and bay at the side, are indispensable for comfort and convenience, and give an effect to the building that is not obtained by any more expensive adornment which can be used. Ad-

SECOND STORY.

First Floor.—A front porch; B hall, 6 feet; C parlor, 12 by 16 feet 7 inches; D sitting-room, 12 by 12 feet; E dining-room 12 by 13 feet; F kitchen, 12 by 12 feet.

Second Floor.—H chamber, 12 by 11 feet 7 inches; I chamber, 12 by 11 feet 7 inches; K chamber, 12 by 11 feet 7 inches; L chamber, 13 by 12 feet 9 inches; N hall, 6 feet; O roof.

It is an old saying that the worth of a thing is what it will fetch. If that be the case, then Mlle. Nilsson's taking away from the city $30,000, the proceeds of five concerts, is perfectly right; and yet we think it a great deal of money for a few songs. It is $5000 more than the President of the United States gets for a whole year's worrying service, and six times as much as the Governor receives for one year. We are told that it is only once in a great while that such a singer is produced. Would nature stand still if one never appeared? When Dr. Johnson heard that the music sung by a celebrated singer "was very difficult," "I wish it were impossible," said he. We are told that a life-time is spent in cultivating such a voice. The largest part of her stock in trade was given to her—the voice—and it did not take long to get the cultivation. We are congratulated upon the fact that we did not act as foolish as the people in New York. We did not take the horses from her carriage and make asses of ourselves by dragging it. That feat was not necessary here, as all our papers took good care to proclaim that it was done in New York, and that answered for the whole country. Again, were it possible for an American lady to sing much better than Nilsson—and we are told that this is possible—she would have to use a foreign name to insure a $5000 house. One of Mlle. Nilsson's advocates says there was "no Barnum and Lind humbug—no mention of a charity concert, in which she would sing for the benefit of various benevolent institutions of Philadelphia." There might have been humbug in this, but the charitable institutions benefited by it. Perhaps there is no use in an article like the above. The people will be humbugged, and there is an end of it.

HALL's Journal says:—

"If a man can sleep soundly, has a good appetite, with no unpleasant reminders after meals, the bodily habits being regular every day, he had better let himself alone, whether he is as big as a hoghead or as thin and dry as a fence rail."

This is a decided opposition to Banting's system. We agree with Hall.

A FEW Sundays ago, as Mr. Beecher was about commencing his sermon, a stout, fatherly-looking man was endeavoring to make his way through the crowd, to get within a better hearing distance of the distinguished orator. At that moment Mr. Beecher's voice rang out the words of the text: "Who art thou?" "Who art thou?" again cried out the dramatic preacher. The stout party, thinking himself in the wrong, perhaps, by pressing forward, and believing himself to be personally addressed, started the brethren and nonplussed their reverend chief, tain by sedately replying: "I'm a pig merchant from Chicago, sir. I hope you ain't mad. There ain't nary chair, or else I'd a sot down." Plymouth church didn't recover its serenity for ten minutes.

THAT prince of scoundrels, Major Yelverton, is now Earl of Avonmore. It is this same person who was twice married to Miss Longworth, and by a decree of an English court—sticking to family—pronounced not even married once. Bad as he was, what must we think of the woman, Mrs. Forbes, who married him, knowing all these facts. In a future number we may give all the particulars of this affair.

Coat sleeves, trimmed to correspond. Maroon-colored velvet bonnet, trimmed with feathers and lace.

Fig. 5.—Walking dress of purple Cashmere, made with two skirts. The lower one trimmed with three narrow ruffles, and a plaiting of the same; the upper one trimmed with a fringe and plaiting. Short jacket, with deep basque in back, trimmed to correspond. Coat sleeves, with ruffles at the hand. Purple velvet hat, trimmed with jet ornament and feathers.

Fig. 6.—Visiting dress of green silk, made with two skirts. The lower one is trimmed with one plaited ruffle, headed by a band of velvet with white lace on each side of it. The upper skirt is trimmed to correspond. Short paletôt to fit the figure, cut en revers in front, and trimmed to match the skirt. Open sleeves, with coat sleeves underneath. Green velvet bonnet, trimmed with feather, aigrette, and lace.

Fig. 7.—Black Cashmere dress. The lower skirt is trimmed with two scalloped ruffles, headed by a heavy fringe. The upper skirt is trimmed with fringe and velvet. Plain corsage, with bretelles, and sash of velvet. Black velvet hat, trimmed with feathers and a small bird at one side.

Fig. 8.—Visiting dress of plum-colored gros grain silk. The skirt is made plain, with a long train. Metternich mantle of the same, trimmed with lace and lined with fur. Hat of plum-colored velvet, trimmed with gros grain ribbon and feather with small bird.

Fig. 9.—Little girl's dress of blue serge, made with two skirts, trimmed with a puffing and quilling of the same. Plaited waist, trimmed square with a puff. Blue velvet hat, trimmed with velvet and small plume.

SECOND SIDE.

Fig. 1.—Blue Cashmere dress. The trimming, which is somewhat novel in effect, consists principally of velvet ribbons of a rather darker tint than the dress. This ribbon is placed round the skirt in four rows, crossed at intervals by bows of satin ribbon of the tint of the dress. The trimming of the open tunic corresponds with that of the skirt. The bodice is high, and cut waistcoat-fashion. The sleeves, which become more open towards the wrist, have, like the bodice, trimming corresponding with that of the skirt. The undersleeves are of net and narrow Valenciennes, a fluted edging of which serves as a finish round the throat. With this Cashmere dress no collar is worn. The toque is of blue satin, with richly-polished steel ornaments; the veil is carried round the head, and falls behind; it is adorned with blue silk fringe. We have given a pattern of this jacket, body and waistcoat, on page 32. It is worn out of doors without anything else; it is trimmed the same as the skirt; the sleeves are loose, caught up at the elbow with a bow of satin ribbon.

Fig. 2.—Dress for young girl of green Cashmere, made with two skirts; the lower one trimmed with three plaitings, headed by bands of velvet; the upper one is cut in points, and trimmed to correspond. Short sacque, with trimming to match skirt.

Figs. 3 and 4.—Front and back view of hood for lady; it is made of blue Cashmere, ornamented with a braiding pattern in the back. The hood is edged all around with a narrow fringe.

Fig. 5.—Cloak of navy blue cloth, cut open at the seams, and trimmed with bands of velvet and fringe; open sleeves, trimmed to correspond.

Fig. 6 shows the petticoat worn over the crinoline and tournure. It is gathered just under the tournure, and tied up with strings. Our pattern is of long cloth; it is trimmed with a scalloped-out border, edged with embroidery, and finished round the bottom with a fluted flounce.

Fig. 7.—Costume for little girl of six years, of gray Cashmere, made with two skirts; the lower one is trimmed with three rows of blue velvet; the upper one and waist trimmed with ruffles, bound and headed with velvet.

Fig. 8.—Jacket bodice for in-door dress, made of Cashmere, and trimmed with the same.

Figs. 9 and 10.—Black and white lace collarette and sleeve. This collarette is for wearing over a high silk dress that is cut out at the throat, or it serves to make a low bodice into a high one. The foundation is double white Brussels net; it is trimmed with two rows of black lace insertion, and edged with black and white lace. It is crossed with bars of black velvet.

Fig. 11.—Hood for girl of six years, made of scarlet cashmere bound with black velvet.

Fig. 23.—Gypsy bonnet of maroon-colored velvet, trimmed with gros grain ribbon and velvet flowers of the same color.

Fig. 24.—Bonnet of lavender-colored silk, trimmed with a darker shade of velvet and white flowers; the strings and tab in back are of velvet, edged with fringe.

Fig. 25.—Bonnet of black velvet of the gypsy shape, trimmed with ribbon and a half wreath of shaded green velvet leaves; strings of gros grain ribbon.

Fig. 26.—Bonnet of purple velvet, with a network of silk and fringe at the back; the trimming consists of feathers, flowers, and ribbon.

Fig. 27.—Hat of brown, turned up in the back, trimmed with brown velvet and ribbon, and crimson berries and brown leaves.

Figs. 28 and 29 (p. 28).—Front and back view of black velvet jacket, with open sleeves; it is braided with gilt braid, the edge being finished with a satin ruche and gilt fringe.

WALKING COSTUMES, ETC.

Figs. 1 and 3.—Front and back of walking costume of navy blue serge, made with two skirts; the lower one is trimmed with a side plaiting, headed by a band of velvet and fringe, put on in scallops; the upper skirt and waist are in one, and are trimmed to correspond. Velvet sash.

FANCY COSTUMES FOR CHILDREN.

Fig. 1. Marquis of Carabas.—Crimson velvet coat, trimmed with gold braid and velvet buttons. Short blue velvet trowsers, fastened at the knee; they are trimmed with gold braid and buttons. A striped satin sash is fastened at the left side. Velvet cap, trimmed with gold band.

Fig. 2. The White Cat.—White satin skirt, bordered with a two-inch band of swansdown; tunic cut out in four square openings, and trimmed with a similar band; low square bodice, with basques, edged with a crossband of white satin and a one-inch band of swansdown; small white toque, ornamented with a cat's head. White velvet round the throat, supporting a pearl locket. White gloves. White satin boots, terminating with swansdown.

The child has a small wand with three mice hanging from it.

Fig. 3. Spring.—Sky-blue satin skirt, ornamented with swallows cut out of black velvet. Blue gauze skirt, looped up at the sides with a bouquet of roses made of blue gauze, and studded with butterflies. Low square bodice, with basques, made of pink satin, and laced up the front with black velvet. This bodice is bordered with a cordon of daisies.

Fig. 4. Peasant's Costume.—Short skirt of striped Scotch cambric; second skirt of maroon foulard, looped up at the sides. Brown Holland apron, with bib, bound and trimmed with maroon velvet. Bodice to match the second skirt, with short tight sleeves of the same, and full white sleeves beneath. Muslin fichu. Black velvet, with gold cross round the throat. Gold ear-rings. Small lace headdress, with a can of milk at the top. Willow basket, filled with eggs. Scarlet stockings. Patent leather shoes, with gold buckles.

Fig. 5. Tyrolean Sportsman, Boy from Ten to Twelve.—Violet Cashmere jacket, without sleeves, and edged with velvet. It is open in front, and discovers the waistcoat, striped horizontally with three bands of velvet. Cambric shirt, with turned-down collar. Short black velvet trowsers, fastened below the knee, and ornamented on the outside of each leg with a band of velvet, edged at both sides with gold. Two small square ends terminate this band, and fall upon the stockings. Black boots and violet stockings. Black velvet Tyrolean hat, ornamented with a tuft of cock's feathers, fastened down in front with a gold buckle. These fancy costumes can be made in less costly materials than those described above, and still be very effective.

ON FASHIONS FOR JANUARY.

It was predicted early in the season that furs would not be as extensively worn as on previous winters, but the rumor was only a rumor, for furs are far too comfortable to be easily discarded by the whims of fashion. Sable is the most popular fur for those who can afford it, but these are but few, for a set cannot be purchased for less than a thousand dollars. Bands of fur are used for trimming velvet and cloth costumes, and a very beautiful and effective trimming it makes. A costume of garnet-colored velvet, trimmed with a band of chinchilla fur, and an underskirt of garnet-colored silk was, we think, one of the handsomest costumes seen. Black monkey and martin furs are new furs, which, in a measure, take the place of mink sable, although the latter is still preferred by many. Sealskin retains its popularity for jackets and muffs; complete suits of it can be purchased, consisting of jacket or sacque, muff, hat, travelling satchel, and pocket book. Ermine is more used for evening wear than street costumes, as the tendency this winter is for all dark dressing. Children's furs are of plain white cony fur, which is made up into sacques and muffs particularly cunning for the little folks. Ermine, grebe, the useful gray squirrel, and gray Astrachan. We forgot the useful and serviceable black Astrachan cloak, muff, and collar for ladies in speaking of their furs; they can be purchased in real or imitation, and form a comfortable and useful fur for common wear.

It was predicted but few cloaks would be worn, but the cold weather made the costume much too cool for many, so cloaks have gradually appeared; the newest velvet cloaks are heavily braided with fine soutache in palm leaf designs. The leaf is not merely outlined by braid in the old-fashioned way, but is filled in with curled, fancifully arranged braid as closely as if embroidered, making a rich and elegant garniture. Passementeries, made in imitation of this braiding, consist of small cords fastened together to show thick leaves and vines. These are very effective on velvet, silk, or cashmere. In lace there is nothing so pretty for velvet as Chantilly thread lace. The pointed leaf figure still prevails in guilpüre. It is the custom this season to sew on the lace above the edge of the garment, and without fulness. Passementerie is the usual heading. Guilpüre capes are also worn on velvet cloak; also lace sashes. The handsomest velvet Polonaise casaque seen this season has a row of Chantilly lace placed an inch or two above the edge of the garment. The lace is straight around the lower edge and pointed on top. Lace sash, with passementerie tassel. White point Duchesse lace underneath a black lace frill outlines a vest. For cloth garments, bias velvet, heavy gros grain, and gros de Londres, with fringes, are the trimmings. A cloth mantle for old ladies is invisible green beaver, made with square back and short rounded front. The trimming is alternate pipings of velvet and gros grain. German guilpüres, hand made and pure silk, but silk of inferior quality, are far cheaper than those of French manufacture. These are the most fashionable trimming for Cashmere. Velvet does not trim Cashmere effectively; we do not know why, but it is nevertheless so.

Sashes are greatly diminished in size. The lace sash before spoken of is the only novelty, held in loops by ornaments of passementerie. There is also a scarf sash made of gros grain sewed in below the seams under the arms and falling loosely to a point in the centre, where it is tied in a slip-knot and the ends left hanging. A large sash bow attached to the belt is already passée. The substitute is a small bow of loops and short ends, made of doubled gros grain sewed together on the wrong side and turned; the ends are ravelled to form fringe an inch wide.

Next in value after velvet cloaks are those of faille and heavy gros grain. These are made into casques or paletots, are warmly lined with gray and white cony fur (rabbit skin) or wadded. They are positively ornate with passementerie (as all gimp is now called) jet, and fringe. Silk and satin paletots exquisitely quilted in small diamonds, are especially admired by old ladies. One of black satin is covered with half-inch diamond quilting, stitched by machine. The trimming is a band of ostrich feathers, with a fringe of chenille, crimped silk and plain twist. By omitting the feather trimming, and using less expensive fringe or black marten fur, any lady, expert with her sewing machine, could make this garment at small expense.

We seem to be coming back once more to the long costumes, or at least many are made for the winter for riding. They are composed of a round skirt, and of an upper skirt, looped up a little on each side, so as to show the under part of the underskirt, but falling at the back into a long train. This is quite in the moyenage style, and extremely graceful. The train may be looped in back if desired for walking in. The underskirt will be of another color, and may even be of a different material than the dress. The latter will have none but plain trimmings, while the underskirt will be trimmed with one or more flounces. Velvet, satin, moire, and silk are employed for these costumes. This fashion will permit many ladies to make use of dresses a little out of date; we mean long gored dresses.

Suppose, for example, you possess a silk dress of this kind; trim it with a wide velvet border, placed a short distance from the edge, and trimmed on each side with a ruche of lace or ribbon. The dress must then be looped up on each side of the front part, which is rounded off like an apron, then a little more towards the back. This looping up gives a little fullness to the dress, but still it will be too plain in the upper part for the present fashion. To obviate this defect, a jacket bodice must be worn, with plaited basques. This had better be of the material of the upper dress but may be of that of the under one. It should be observed that black materials should not be used for the underskirt of this kind of costume. There is only one exception to this rule; it is when the complete costume is black of two different materials, such as velvet and satin, or faille and glacé silk. In all other cases the underskirt should be colored, and of the brighter color of the two; black, gray, and other neutral tints being used for the upper dress. This style of dress always being very dressy, on account of the train, it will rarely be made of any but silk materials. Fine Cashmere for the upper dress will, however, be quite handsome enough with a silk skirt.

In these days of reform and economy in dress, it is quite possible for a lady to be stylishly dressed at a little expense. A number of walking-costumes may be arranged with a single black silk skirt, in combination with a variety of Polonaises. Almost any color looks well with black, and it takes but a small quantity to make an elegant tunic. The favorite materials for this purpose are Cashmere and satin de Chine, which should be trimmed with rich fringe with a heading, or broad bands of the material, edged with narrow guilpüre lace.

The most elegant morning wrappers are of a light quality of Cashmere, of pale color, lined throughout with silk of a darker shade. The shape is either gored or Watteau. A white Cashmere wrapper is lined with violet silk. The skirt has a deep flounce, headed and finished also at the lower edge with three narrow folds of violet Cashmere. Small hood, with violet lining. A drawing-string behind, with purple strings to tie in front, and a violet Cashmere bow behind. A second, also of white Cashmere, has broad revers of pink silk quilted, and edged with elderdown.

Round hats are so convenient and becoming that they will not be relinquished willingly, although fashion decrees the gypsy bonnet. The most dressy round hat is called the Vespetro. It is much like the Pompador of last season, with a narrow brim turned down over the front frizzes, and turned up behind above the chatelaine. This shades the face prettily, and combines the best features of the gypsy and round hat. A model in two shades of purple, pale violet, and deep purple has the dark purple velvet covering the hat plainly, with a cord of pale violet silk around it. A twist of the two colors combined surrounds the crown; and the principal beauty is two long slender ostrich feathers, of the two shades, fastened near the middle of the front, curling over the crown, and hanging down over the braids of hair. A frill of narrow black lace edges the front of the brim in a way which is universally becoming.

The newest shape gypsy bonnets have large square crowns, with broad flaring brims, and are called La Republique. One of black velvet has a band of finely-curved ostrich feathers for trimming, an agrette at the side, and strings of black and green ribbon reversed to show the facing. A second one is of plum-colored velvet, put plainly over the large frame, the edges corded with gros grain of the same shade; heavy corded ribbon is twined around the crown; a torsade of velvet for face trimming. A cluster of fine dwarfed dahlias, with brown foliage, is on the right side, near the front, and four small tips of bright canary-colored ostrich feathers are back of these. A small square veil of finest Chantilly lace is box-plaited across the back, to fall over the chatelaine. This is handsome for tall and matronly ladies.

The Cheapest of Ladies' Magazines, Because it is the Best!

EDITED BY

MRS. SARAH J. HALE, AND L. A. GODEY.

FORTY-ONE YEARS' experience in catering for the tastes of the ladies of this country has enabled the publisher to place his magazine far above his contemporaries. In fact, the magazine has

NO EQUAL IN EUROPE OR AMERICA!

It has always been the care of the publisher to combine in its pages whatever is useful, whatever is elevating, whatever is pure, dignified, and virtuous in sentiment, with whatever may afford rational and innocent amusement. For its Literary Department, in past years,

THE BEST WRITERS IN THE LITERARY WORLD

Have contributed, and will continue to furnish articles for the year 1871. The names of such authors as MARION HARLAND, LOUISE S. DORR, INO CHURCHILL, MRS. C. A. HOPKINSON, METTA VICTORIA VICTOR, S. ANNIE FROST, MRS. DENNISON, and Others, Cannot be found on the Prospectus of any other magazine. They have a reputation in the literary world unsurpassed!

ARTISTIC AND BEAUTIFUL STEEL PLATES

Form another prominent feature of the Book. Executed by one of the best steel engravers in the world, they have won the praises of the best judges of the art. We give fourteen of them every year.

OUR FASHION PLATES

Have a reputation for correctness the world over. If we receive anything new from our European correspondent after the preparation of our colored plate, in order to furnish everything up to the latest dates, we always give it in a wood engraving in the same number.

Original Music, Drawing Lessons, Model Cottages, Embroidery Sheet, Tinted Engravings, and a Juvenile Department.

Another useful department, and one that we were the first to make an object of interest to the public, is the publication of Invaluable Receipts upon every Subject. These receipts are of great value to the Boudoir, Nursery, Kitchen, House, and Laundry.

Ladies' Fancy Work Department.

The illustrations in this department consist of EVENING, WALKING, MORNING, AND BRIDES' DRESSES, HEADRESSES, HAIR-DRESSING, CAPS, BONNETS, CLOAKS, MANTILLAS, RIDING HABITS, ROBES-DE-CHAMERE, UNDERSLEEVES, SLIPPERS, WREATHS, COLLARS, CHEMISETTES, EMBROIDERY, KNITTING, NETTING, TATTLING, CROCHET, and FANCY ARTICLES of all kinds.

And everything new, as soon as it appears in Europe, is at once transferred to GODEY. Some of these designs are printed in colors, in a style unequalled.

No discovery of the present age has equalled that of CARBOLIC ACID, and it is doubtful whether the full measure of its usefulness has even yet been fully ascertained. The farmer uses it in his fields and garden; surgeons use it in hospitals, not only as a disinfectant and purifying agent, but as a valuable assistant in the healing of wounds and sores; physicians prescribe it daily; the careful housewife uses it to exterminate insects, etc.; and, finally, the Great Public use it in the preparation so widely and favorably known as

CARBOLIC SALVE.

The Proprietor is daily in receipt of the most gratifying attestations to its worth, as will appear by the following extracts from letters:—

From COL. H. S. OLCOTT, former Agricultural Editor of the Tribune:—

MR. JOHN F. HENRY:—

DEAR SIR: I applied the Carbolic Salve in one case to a very bad and deep burn, where PROUD FLESH had formed, and the wound was healed with extraordinary rapidity. In every case where I have used it, it was thoroughly efficacious in effecting a cure. Yours truly,

H. S. OLCOTT,

Late Col. and Special Com'r of the War Dp't.

25th Edition. This work is now too well known to need full description: it contains 120 pages, BEAUTIFULLY ILLUSTRATED, with over two hundred engravings of flowers and vegetables. Also two SPLENDID COLORED LITHOGRAPHS, which have been prepared at great expense. Over 2000 varieties of Flowers and Vegetables, embracing novelties both foreign and American, fully described, to which is added a descriptive list of new and rare Gladiolus, Lillies, etc. This work has been published regardless of expense, and as Mr. Bartlett, the well-known Agriculturist of New Hampshire, expresses, "is far ahead of anything of the kind ever before issued from the American press." Our custom has been to charge for this work to all but our customers, but we find that nearly all receiving it become so, and we have concluded to send it free to applicants upon receipt of two stamps. MEDICAL research has been so extended and so deep that there seems to be little that has not been already found out, so that any new discovery that arrests the attention of the ablest physicians the world over is an event of no ordinary moment.

Such a discovery was that of Carbolic Acid, and its wonderful HEALING PROPERTIES. Combined with soothing emollients, as in the CARBOLIC SALVE, it forms the GREATEST HEALING COMPOUND EVER KNOWN. There is no exaggeration in this statement, as the hundreds of letters received from those who have used it will amply attest. It has also the indorsement of some of the highest authorities in this part of the country.

Space permits me to give but two brief extracts here, one from the well-known President of the New York and Brooklyn Board of Health, and the other from Mr. H. S. Olcott, formerly connected with the New York Sun and afterwards with the New York Tribune.

NEW YORK, December 22, 1869.
JOHN F. HENRY, Esq.—DEAR SIR: I believe that Carbolic Acid is destined to work a marvellous good to the human family. I am equally sanguine that, as an emollient, combined with other substances, no known material compares with it. I have tested the salve made of this acid, by you, chemically, and the result I have submitted to several eminent physicians, who concur in saying that the Carbolic Salve is a most efficacious and safe remedy for all skin diseases. You are therefore justified in giving it as wide a circulation as your ample mercantile facilities will admit. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
GEO. B. LINCOLN, President Board of Health.

Testimonial from Col. H. S. Olcott, late Colonel and Special Commissioner of the War Department, and former Agricultural Editor of the New York Tribune:—

NEW YORK, July 30, 1870.
MR. JOHN F. HENRY—DEAR SIR: I have had favorable opportunities during the past year to become acquainted with the properties of your Carbolic Salve. I have used it myself, and have seen it used by members of my family, and among my acquaintances, and in every case it was thoroughly efficacious in effecting a cure. I applied it, in one case, to a very bad and deep burn, in which proud flesh had formed, and the wound was healed with extraordinary rapidity. Prof. Calvert, F.R.S., of England, the greatest authority in the world on Carbolic Acid, informed me recently in Manchester that the Surgeons in the principal European Hospitals were using the CARBOLIC ACID in various forms and combinations for the cure of obstinate ulcers and sores, with the most surprising results. Yours truly,
H. S. OLCOTT.

TO MOTHERS.

The unsightly sores which appear upon the faces of your children, and which defy all the usual applications for their removal, will speedily vanish at the touch of CARBOLIC SALVE.

CAUTION.

A spurious compound is offered to the public under the name of CARBOLIC OINTMENT. The genuine CARBOLIC SALVE is put up in TIN BOXES, the covers of which are stamped with the name and trade mark. The label bears the fac-simile signature of the proprietor, JOHN F. HENRY, and the box is stamped, under the wrapper, with the proprietor's private revenue stamp.

JOHN F. HENRY,

PARK'S BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY AND TAR, FOR COUGHS, COLDS, AND ALL PECTORAL DISORDERS.

THIS is an old and standard Remedy, and one of the few medicines for pulmonary, lung, and throat diseases that possesses intrinsic merit. One of the most remarkable cures effected by the Balsam was that of Mr. Fancher, now, and for many years a leading salesman in the wholesale dry goods store of A. T. Stewart & Co., New York. He told the proprietor personally that he considered it the best medicine for the throat and lungs that had ever been compounded. He felt deeply grateful for the benefits he had received from its use, having previously almost lost his voice, and believing himself a victim of that fatal disease—CONSUMPTION.

CONSUMPTION CURABLE.

Read the following remarkable case of recent cure in the City of New York, in which tubercles had already actually formed:—

66 CARMINE STREET, NEW YORK, September 10, 1869.
MR. JOHN F. HENRY—DEAR SIR: My daughter, aged 17 years, has been sick for the past two years with that terrible disease—Consumption, and we thought her beyond the reach of medical skill, only hoping to relieve her from the pains she was continually suffering, as Tubercles had actually formed on her lungs; she has taken Cod Liver Oil, Pectorals, etc., without experiencing relief, until I was induced to try Park's Balsam of Wild Cherry and Tar; on commencing to take Balsam her respiration was very difficult and painful, which is now natural and easy; she had great difficulty in expectorating, which is entirely cured, and, as before stated, Tubercles had formed on her lungs, which have entirely disappeared, and I consider her now out of danger. Yours truly, STEPHEN FISK.

TRY THE MEDICINE AND BECOME YOUR OWN JUDGE OF ITS GREAT MERIT.

The Balsam, as originally prepared by BARNES & PARK, is now put up exclusively at the laboratory of

GETTING ON IN THE WORLD.

BY MARION HARLAND.

PART I.

BEGINNING.

"Now, Peter!"

"Now Ellie!"

"You know I am perfectly satisfied—that I think we are delightfully settled. Why, there isn't another girl of my acquaintance who is better fixed, or so well. Of course"—and as she said it, the pretty wife established herself upon her husband's knee, and pulled his hair by way of emphasis. "Of course, I knew all along that none of them had got as nice a husband. I couldn't help thinking this morning, as we were walking to church, how splendid you were in your Sunday clothes."

"You'd like, maybe, to have me wear them all the time?"

"Nonsense! Do you know that is one advantage people like us have over rich ones? We enjoy our holidays and holiday rig. Theirs get to be an old story. One day is just like another, and they're tired to death all the time. I'd rather, by half, go back to the factory. If I did feel sometimes that it was kind of hard to be obliged to go, day in and day out, whether I felt like it or not, it was pleasant enough in some things. Our work was all planned and put into our hands. Our fingers were kept busy, but our heads and, if we did not idle, our tongues, might play as much as we liked. There was no responsibility: no anxiety to bother us out of work-hours. When the six o'clock bell rang, we were free as birds until seven next morning. And on Saturday evening the pay came in, regular as clock-work, all the better worth having because we had earned it. That's a pleasure rich ladies can't have."

"You think, then, you wouldn't care to be a fine lady, with nothing to do but count her rings, and order the servants around?" asked

Peter Wells, highly entertained by his bride's talk.

He was not fluent of speech himself, and, like all slow-tongued men, greatly admired women. Ellie's blonde ringlets danced in the energy of her negative gesture.

"I wouldn't be! Upon my word, I consider a fashionable woman the most wretched, useless thing the Lord ever made. There's Mrs. Guy Stuyvesant, now! My cousin, Jane Sharpe, hires with her as nurse and seamstress, and she often tells me she wouldn't exchange places with her for all her money and aristocracy. They think everything of their family, those Stuyvesants do, though I guess they came from Adam as well as we common people did. Jane says there's no end to the vanity and vexation of spirit in that house. He is out all day until the six o'clock dinner (think of it! six o'clock! when sensible people eat supper), and oftener than not spends the evening in his library, busy with law papers, or out at some business meeting. It's study, study, work, work, and for what? For victuals and clothes; nothing else. That's the common sense way of looking at it, no matter how much money he has over and above what it costs him to live. They don't begin to be as happy and as independent as we are. Why, Jane says Mrs. Stuyvesant never has a moment's rest. It's driving to the dressmaker's, or milliner's, or dry goods stores all day; or receiving calls and paying them; dinner-parties and balls; concerts and operas; dress, folly, and worry, until she hasn't time to sleep, or to play with her own baby. I was in to see Jane a few evenings before we were married, and she sent for me to come up stairs. She has a great many privileges, Jane has. You see these rich people folks have to trust so much to their help; they do anything almost to keep a good girl, and you'd be surprised to hear what they have to submit to sometimes. So, while I was sitting in the nursery, with the baby in my lap—a sweet, pretty child, as any mother would like to have—and Jane was undressing the next youngest, who was about two-thirds sick with a cold, in comes Mrs. Stuyvesant, all decked out in a white silk dress, with a pink satin bodice and tunic, and such diamonds! They fairly made me wink. Her hair was dressed beautifully, with a white feather and a pink one, but she looked tired and worried enough. She is a tall woman, with black eyes, that go right through you when she speaks, and a thick, white skin, without a speck of color; not a bit handsome, to my eyes, but Jane says she is much admired in society. She frowned when she saw me.

“Who’s this?” says she to Jane.

“My cousin, Ellie Lane, ma’am,” says Jane, bold as brass, for she knew my lady daren’t run the risk of having her leave at a minute’s notice, and wasn’t scared at her high-strung ways.

“Oh!” and she went over to the sick child. ‘How is Guy to-night? More feverish, isn’t he? I wish I didn’t have to go out,’ and I really believe she was anxious, and wanted to stay with him. ‘But I must. Don’t touch my dress, dear!’ for the little fellow stopped fretting to stare at her, and began to play with the shiny silk. ‘You will soil it, darling! I will look in as soon as I come home, Jane, and see how he is getting on. If he shows any signs of croup, send Thomas for the doctor at once. Bathe his feet before he goes to bed, and give him two drops of nitre every hour in a teaspoonful of water until he is in a perspiration. Good-night, my son!’

“She stooped to kiss him, and patted the baby’s face, keeping her dress out of the way of both of them, and sailed off—to enjoy herself! She seemed to think she had done her duty by her child in telling a paid nurse what to do for him when he was sick. Oh, this fashionable life eats women’s hearts out and puts a stone in the place of them. Depend upon it, Peter, dear, I am happier this minute than she is. She is a slave to her riches and position, to society, and her own servants even. What other rich and stylish people do and say is the only law that governs her; the only one that any of her sort care for. Those who are content to live comfortable and plain, and do their own work, are the only real mistresses in the land. What would pay me, I wonder, to have two or three stuck-up women about my house, eating my victuals, and breaking my china, and ruining my nice clothes in the wash, and laying down the law to me as to what they would do, and what I shouldn’t do, and expecting the highest wages for plaguing the life out of me? I think I see myself at it!”

“You’re a spunky little woman, and a sensible one to-boot. I can’t put what I mean into words as smooth and pretty as you do, Ellie, but I do enjoy my home, and I wouldn’t give my wife for the richest high-flyer in the land; and I’m glad you’re satisfied. I don’t ask to be rich; only to be able to give you everything you want and would like to have. It would come nigh to breaking my heart, dear, to see you fretting of what I couldn’t get for you.”

Impulsive Ellie stopped his mouth with a sudden kiss.

“I believe you, my darling, every word of it. But I shall never be so unreasonable. I shouldn’t care to live in more style than we do now if you were ever so rich. Where’s the use? Big houses and handsome furniture don’t benefit the people that own them. They’re just intended for others to look at and envy. And we owe other people nothing; can have our own way in everything. I couldn’t but think ~~this morning~~”—with a reverent cadence in her voice—“while the preacher was talking about the emptiness of this world’s pleasures, how much better contentment was than wealth—and how full my cup was—and oh, Peter, I do hope my blessedness will make me a better woman. I do try to thank my Heavenly Father with my whole heart, and in my everyday life as well as on Sundays, for all He has done for me, in giving me you and this sweet, sweet home.”

“She’s hit it now!” cried the admiring Peter, slapping his knee. “That was what I was trying to get out when I commenced talking. It’s been in my mind, in a way, ever since we sat down together after supper. It came to me, all on a sudden like, while I was a-smoking of my pipe and watching you a-clearing off the table and singing to yourself, with that blue dress on, and looking so like a plecter, and the fire a-blazing, and the wind whistling outside, and everything so snug, and altogether—I can’t justly word it—but I felt sort o’ solemn, and says I to myself, ‘I’d ought to be a good man for to show I’m thankful for all o’ this.’”

“We’ll try together, dear!” Ellie laid her cheek to his. “We shouldn’t deserve to be happy if our blessings didn’t draw us closer to Him who sends them.”

They had been married one month, and a week before had taken possession of their home, three rooms in the second story of a modest frame dwelling, in a new street, fully a mile from the extensive machine-shop in which Peter was a workman. Most of his comrades were desirous of living nearer; content to occupy meaner and narrower quarters rather than walk so far night and morning.

“But we’ll be comfortable and healthy, Ellie,” said sensible Peter. “The exercise in the open air won’t harm me. The smell of the coal, the dust, and close air down town will hurt you.”

He was very tender of her, as he might have been of a delicate fragrant blossom he had found blooming in one of the close, ill-smelling streets in which she lived when he first knew her. Her mother was a widow, so poor and so lowly in her aspirations that she took in gentlemen's washing by the piece and dozen, and did not disdain to bear a helping-hand in the semi-annual house-cleaning of her richer acquaintances. She had a brave spirit in her small body, however, this American woman, and hard as she had to battle with want, kept her four children at school until her neighbors cried out upon her for her folly.

"The law gives 'em schooling free of cost to me," she would say, in reply; "and have it they shall, if I have to work my fingers to the bone for it. They'll pay me well for it some day."

At sixteen Fanny, the eldest, went into the establishment of a fashionable milliner as an apprentice, and a year later Ellie obtained a place in a hosiery factory—clean, easy, and comparatively profitable work. Jasper and James, at fourteen and a half, were bound, each in his turn, to a thriving machinist, the owner of the works aforesaid. The head man in the department to which the boys were assigned was Peter Wells, a good-looking, brawny six-footer, kind of heart as strong of arm. The boys became soon and warmly attached to him, and the friendly interest that repaid their affection led to his introduction to the widow Lane and her daughters. The whole family fell in love with him, and he in love with Ellie. She was twenty-two when they married, after an acquaintanceship of three years, and a betrothal of two. Mrs. Lane no longer took in washing, but kept her children's house, and was supported "quite like a lady," said her friends, by their earnings. They had half a house—two "flats"—to themselves now.

"But it wasn't such a home as this," Ellie had said to her husband, on this, their first evening in their own abode. "The house is dingier, and there is only water in the back-yard, and no drying-place except the roof, and no gas, and the neighborhood is odious! Factories all around, and only tenement-houses in the block; and what with the noise of the streets, and the steam whistles, and machinery, and the smell of the boiled oil, and leather, and soap-boiling—faugh! I wonder we could breathe. This is just Paradise in comparison. That was what mother said when she saw the water in the kitchen, and the gas, and the closets—three in the kitchen, and one in each of the other rooms!"

She drew a long, full breath of satisfaction, and surveyed her new surroundings and belongings with intensest complacency. They sat in their parlor all day on Sundays, and ate there as well. "We won't have a home that is too fine for us to use," was the wise resolve with which they set out.

The ceilings were of a good height; the three apartments of fair proportions, well-ventilated; the wood-work was painted white, and the walls of parlor and bed-chamber covered with a neat, tasteful paper. Peter had done this at his own cost, and Ellie chosen the pattern. These two rooms were also carpeted with a serviceable ingrain, the same on both floors.

"It is always economical to get a whole piece," argued the prudent housewife. "It comes cheaper, and, when it is badly worn, you can certainly get one whole carpet out of the best bits."

The ingrain—fast colors—green ferns, delicately-shaded, upon a tan-colored ground, dotted with red partridge-berries, and here and there a spray of trailing arbutus, showing pinkish-white flowers through the green—went down, and a long breadth was left over for future emergencies, besides a couple of yards for a rug to lie in front of the kitchen dresser. The floor of the third room was painted yellow. The cooking-stove was a bright black, the table and dresser of new deal, and there were buff Holland shades at the windows, not to mention Ellie's thrifty geraniums and canary's cage. It was a blithesome room, altogether, and Peter secretly preferred it to the so-called parlor, Ellie's pride. She had excellent natural taste, and she had showed it by selecting cottage furniture instead of the showy mahogany Fanny and her mother had advised her to buy. The set in the bed-room cost but forty-five dollars, that in the parlor a hundred. The footstools, the table-cover of green cloth, and one low sewing-chair in the latter were embroidered by Fanny and herself. The knitted counterpane—shell pattern—and the patchwork quilt under it were the mother's gift. Jasper and James had given her a tea-set of white China, whereas she had expected to use granite-ware for, at least, ten years. Her own wages had bought bed and table-linen, window-curtains and the lounge-cover of striped chintz; her own hands made them up, during the two years of waiting, in the summer twilights and long winter evenings, the faithful Peter observant of almost every stitch she set. The lounge was a closed sofa-bed that could be unfolded for the accommodation of guests.

"I don't see what we could do with more room," said the satisfied mistress. "It suits me to a T. I can't imagine anything prettier and cosier."

"If Fanny marries that rich widower, he may give her a house that will put you out of conceit with yours," suggested Peter, conscious the while that he was stating an absurdity.

Which preposterous observation elicited a pouting "Now, Peter!" and the animated disclaimer that followed.

Ellie came around to the starting point again by and by. "I wonder what Fan means by letting that old man hang around her so. I wouldn't be pestered by him."

"He isn't old, dear. He isn't over forty."

"What's that but old, I should like to know, when she was but twenty-four last month?"

And he bald already on the top of his head. Jim calls him 'Old Uncle Ned,' and Fanny laughs at him herself. I don't see what she is thinking about, tolerating his attentions."

"I think," said Peter, very slowly, staring at the fire, "I think she intends to marry him—that is, if he asks her, and I guess he will. Widowers ain't apt to waste their time when they're looking for a second wife?"

"Good gracious, Peter Wells! Why should she want to marry that fussy, bald-headed stupid—a young, pretty, lively girl like her, who is earning a living for herself?" ejaculated Ellie, in extreme disgust. "I've no patience with such ridiculous talk. I believe you men imagine that all women are crazy for husbands."

"No-o-o, my dear, I couldn't exactly think that. I had to serve my time for you. Not that I grudged it. And I believe you would have worked in the factory all your life, rather than marry anybody you didn't love. But Fanny isn't you. I think, sometimes, it's the kind of business she's in—the finery, and the high-flying customers, and all that, you know—that puts notions in her head. Anyhow, they're there. She would like to be a fine lady, and Mr. Clark can make her one. Money and show goes a long ways in this world."

"I'd jump into the river before I'd marry a man I wasn't fond of, and didn't respect with all my heart, and soul, and strength!" cried Ellie, vehemently. "And didn't I tell you that Fan makes all manner of fun of old Clark? I sha'n't believe but she feels as I do, until she tells me she is engaged. I declare you've made me real nervous and miserable. I shouldn't sleep a wink to-night if I put any faith in what you've said."

For all her doughty assertions, her fears came upon her with tremendous force the next day, when, having "done up" the week's washing, cleaned the kitchen of tubs, etc., attired herself in a blue merino, which was her best last winter, and put a checked bib apron before her, she was interrupted in the work of sprinkling and folding the clean clothes by Fanny's entrance.

"My, Fan! you made my heart jump into my throat," she laughed, to conceal her trepidation. "How did you get away in the middle of the afternoon? Is anything the matter at home?"

"Not just yet."

Fanny sat down, and threw off her bonnet, uninvited. She was a fine-looking girl, on a larger and more showy scale than Ellie, but with less refinement of manner and speech. The one looked intelligent, the other shrewd.

"Not just yet," she repeated. "But there will be before long. I am to be married the second week in February."

"There! Peter said so!" Ellie turned red, then white, and finally threw her apron over her face for a hearty cry. "I couldn't have believed it, Fan! How can you bear to?"

"Don't be a goose!" advised Fanny, philosophically cool. "It is a very nice thing to marry for love, I suppose, but it isn't every one who can afford it. I am tired of work and poverty. As the Biddies say, 'I want a change, mem!'"

"You are selling yourself;" Ellie was red-hot again.

"All right. I shall make a good bargain of it. Mr. Clark is well off, respectable, and disposed to do the liberal thing by me. He will be a millionaire before I am too old to enjoy life. When you see me riding in my carriage, you'll laugh, not cry, and come around to my way of thinking."

"Your carriage!" The idea was so novel it turned the tide of Ellie's reproaches.

"My carriage and my diamonds! You'll see them if you live five years longer. It is time, goodness knows, for some of the family to be getting on in the world. I don't mind a smart jolt to foolish, romantic prejudices, if it throws one out of the old rut in which we have been rolling since the days of Noah, for aught I know. I hope to see you follow my lead. Mr. Clark says Peter is an enterprising, steady fellow, who is bound to rise in his business. We may be able to help him in some way. Mr. C. feels most kindly towards my family."

Ellie's sensitive blood mounted again at the patronizing tone. "We are entirely satisfied with our condition in life, thank you. I was saying to Peter last night that I wouldn't alter it if I could. It is better to be happy than wealthy."

"Maybe so. I mean to try whether the money won't bring the happiness. I know poverty and misery go hand-in-hand. Mr. C. has as good as bought the new brown-stone front we were admiring the other day in Lawrence Square—the one with the bay-window. I am to go with him to look at it to-morrow to see if it suits us."

"To live in?" If he had meditated the purchase of Windsor Castle or Central Park, Ellie could not have been more astonished.

"Why not, chickadee? He lived plain in the lifetime of his first wife, and they worked hard. It is time he was getting some comfort out of his money. There are not many who know how much he's worth. He understands how to hold his tongue. We had a great laugh—he and I—last night, talking over what would be said and done when we made our big epiurys."

The affianced pair took tea with Mrs. Wells the next Sunday evening.

"I wish, for this once, we had a dining-room," said Ellie, while setting the table. "It is enough to take away visitors' appetites to sit so long before supper in sight of the cups, saucers, and plates, all ready for them."

"Is that so? 'Twould give 'em an appetite, seems to me. And a man couldn't have a nicer thing under his eyes than the one I'm a-looking at just now," rejoined Peter, gallantly.

Ellie smiled at the compliment to her and her board. The cloth was crimson; there were white crocheted mats for the dishes and plates, and the boys' China was on parade. She was serious again the next moment.

"I suppose Fanny will have real silver," she observed, polishing a plated teaspoon. "You have no idea what high notions she has. She wants me to go with her some day this week and get carpets. She fancies I have taste in such matters."

"I should rather think so," assented Peter, heartily. "A body has only got to look at this to be sure of that," staring at it, with his head on one side. "It's as good as a walk in the woods to step on and to see it. It always reminds me, somehow, of when I was a boy, and used to hunt wintergreen Sunday afternoons, when church was out, and we went 'cross lots home. I can a'most taste and smell 'em now."

"Oh, you dear old silly!" Ellie was not exactly petulant, but her mood was not in sympathy with his reminiscences. "Why, Fanny is to have Brussels in the bedrooms, and velvet in her parlors."

"Is she? She can't get anything handsomer than this. But I guess she's a better judge of velvet than you, seeing she's worked upon bonnets so long. And if Clark can afford to buy it for his floors, it's nobody's business. Though it does sound comical to me."

Ellie turned away in silence, and went into the kitchen. It was natural she should be slightly nervous the first time she had "invited company," but this need not make her dissatisfied, or cause her to eye the carpetless floor and deal furniture so sourly.

"Fanny knows we eat in here on week days," she thought. "That if the table wasn't set in the other room, her Mr. Clark would have to eat in the kitchen with his back close to the stove, the place is so small. When we move next time, I mean to have four rooms at the very least. I almost wish they weren't coming. They will have things so different."

She had the grace to blush at the remembrance of the complaint when she saw Peter look down at the thin, little man, who jerked his bald head back to meet the handsome giant's eye. There was something wholesome and refreshing, too, in Peter's round voice and deliberate articulation as compared with the shrill pipe and rapid speech of the sharp iron-monger. He was in high good-humor. His wooing had been energetic and eminently successful.

"I'm a business man, you see," he chuckled to his hosts, rubbing his lean calves, then his shins, with his restless hands. "And soon's I popped eyes 'pon her, one day, when I was passing the milliner's shop at my corner, says I to myself: 'They don't make 'em nicer'n that. But ain't she a trig, tidy-built one? That's Mrs. C. No. 2,' says I. And I walked right in and bought a cravat of her, and began right off to make up to her. I give you my word I was interduced to her before two days was over. Hang it! I may please myself, I hope. My kin never give me a red cent to bless myself with—no more did Mrs. C.'s. It would be a joke for them to take on airs about my marrying anybody I'd a mind to, now, wouldn't it, Mrs. W.? As I says to Fan last night, says I: 'I'm a business man, I am, and I don't hold to long credit when there's nothing to be got by it. We're of age—both of us,' says I—and, by George! we'll be married when we like.' "

Ellie's fried oysters, her coffee, biscuit, cake, and plum preserves were irreproachable, and the small rich man vouchsafed to partake so heartily of all that Ellie marvelled how he had remained so thin if his appetite were always as keen.

"Hope Mrs. C. No. 2 will be as good a cook as her sister," he tittered, helping himself to a fourth piece of cake. "Though, for that matter, I don't mean her to spoil her complexion or her hands with kitchen or housework. Mrs. C. No. 1 was a dabster in that 'ere line—one of the best workers I ever see. But when I looked out this time, 'twas for a fancier article, you know—something real ornamental. And I ruther think I've got it. You won't know her, Mrs. W., when I've rigged her out complete. She'll be a stunner as will open people's eyes. I'd like to ketch one on 'em a-saying 'milliner's 'prentice' to her in two years from now. Nothing shortens folks' memories like a liberal use of the almighty dollar—and she won't want for 'em.' "

"I wouldn't marry him if he was made of solid gold, and frosted with diamonds," said Ellie, when the happy couple had departed. "Ugh! it made my flesh crawl to hear him talking as if he had bought her, body and soul. It put me in mind of the picture in the geography of the Turk master and the Circassian slave."

Fanny did not comport herself like one who wore manacles. She went bravely and blithely through the six weeks of preparation for the marriage, gallantly through the ceremony, and set off upon her wedding tour, becomingly attired, with a high head and bright face.

She was absent nearly a month, and it so happened that Ellie did not see her for a week after her return. Peter's little wife had a bad sore throat, and the weather being stormy, he positively prohibited her from going out of the house. It was a fine morning when the interdict was removed, and Mrs. Lane and her second daughter got into an omnibus, and rode across the city to Lawrence Square. It was a fashionable locality, and the Clarks' house was not the least pretentious of the elegant dwellings that adorned it. The door was opened by a smart servant-girl, who stared superciliously at the visitors, when Mrs. Lane moved toward the stairs, with "We are Mrs. Clarke's kin, and we'll go right up."

Fanny met them at the top of the flight. Her Cashmere peignoir, the lace morning-cap set coquettishly above the puffs of dark hair, her supreme self-satisfaction—amounting to exultation—in her house and the other appurtenances of her new station, struck Ellie with a sensation of strangeness akin to awe. She could not talk, move, or look as usual; caught herself casting furtive glances about her at this and that; involuntarily accosted Fanny with the phraseology and accent she would have used to a superior; and was not surprised, while she was annoyed, that her mother more than once said, "Yes, ma'am," in reply to her first-born's queries.

Fanny smiled openly the second time this happened. "You make a mere acquaintance of me, mother," she said, in the patronizing way she had assumed immediately upon her engagement. "I am just the same Fanny I always was, and you must feel quite at home in my house. Mr. C. doesn't wish me to neglect my family, I assure you. He was willing I should bring you home anything I liked. This is what I selected; I thought it would be useful."

It was a black dress—a fine woollen fabric, suitable for the widow's wear, and she had also an "all-wool" delaine for her sister. The color was pretty, the quality good, but Ellie's treacherous cheeks heated into flame in accepting it.

"It is very nice. You were kind to think of me," was all she could trust herself to say.

"Oh, it is nothing, only a cheap trifle! But you'll find the lining and trimmings inside, and I'll pay for the making. I like to do things handsomely when I make a present. Now, let me show you some of mine. John never comes home without bringing me something. This was yesterday's surprise."

It was a camel's hair shawl—not a very expensive one, as such articles are valued, but Ellie's head reeled as Fanny named the price.

"Five hundred dollars!" she repeated, touching the fabric with the tip of her finger. "What makes it cost so much?"

"Because it is real, my dear little Mrs. Verdant Green. None of your low-priced shams. And this set of point lace was a hundred and twenty. And this pink coral breastpin and ear-rings a hundred and fifty. I often ask John if he is made of money. But he is doing a smashing, rushing business, and, as he says, 'most all these things were actual necessities.' I hadn't a decent article to wear."

Ellie sat in silent amazement. When Fanny's trousseau had cost three times as much as hers, and was not two months old!

"I mean nothing suitable to my position," explained Fanny. "I must dress well, and live in style, not only to please my husband, who likes to see me dash, but for the sake of his business credit. Now, you'll take off your hats, and stop to luncheon—positively! Although, if I had known you were coming, I would have had something a little extra prepared." Fanny could not adopt the lady's language as readily as she did her garb, but she was happily unconscious of her deficiencies.

For the first time in her life Ellie ate with a solid silver fork, and sipped chocolate poured from a pot of the same material. Every part of the service was new and dazzling—cut glass, silver, China, and napery. "Mrs. C. No. 1" would have stared in horrified bewilderment at the changes in the establishment. Even her hard-earned and long-hoarded tea and table-spoons had been melted over and re-moulded. Ellie partook of the repast like one in a dream. Fanny's voluble chatter was, at times, in an unknown tongue, and her complacent visage was seen through a fog. As she emerged from the house, observing, in stepping gingerly upon it, the tessellated pavement of the vestibule, she recalled a phrase she had seen somewhere, she did not remember in what connection, "drunken with magnificence."

"I think that's what I am," mused Mrs. Clark's sister.

"Fanny is a lucky girl, a very lucky girl!" Mrs. Lane was saying when the fresh air restored Ellie's wits. "I don't mind of another in her set who has ever done so well in marrying, not by a long ways. But," recollecting herself, "you must try not to be jealous, my dear; somebody must eat the crusts, you know."

This to her who had protested to Peter that she had borne off the matrimonial prize of the season!

"I don't begrudge Fanny her finery, I'm sure, mother, and you have no right to hint such a thing."

It was unlike Ellie to retort so coarsely, but she did not know herself just now.

"She's welcome to her house and her clothes, and I'm certain I don't want her jack-in-the-box of a husband. Mine is worth a thousand of him."

"That's the best way to look at it," responded the mother, soothingly. "To be satisfied with what we have is a duty. And"—vaguely pious—"to rejoice with them as do rejoice. And Fanny's got reason for rejoicing if ever a girl had."

Ellie swallowed hard and bit her lip. It seemed as if the crusts had stuck in her throat. She was no longer in Paradise, if she had water in the kitchen and gas in every room, not to mention her fine capacious closets. She had not raised herself a single step in the world by her marriage. Her mother talked to her as she had always done, with a touch of compassion in her accent just now. Fanny had not offered to send her bundles home, so each carried her own, Ellie longing to drop hers in the dirtiest gutters she crossed and leave it there.

"Just a cheap trifle!" she kept saying to herself. "But she knew it suited me. I have no position to support. What use have I for jewelry and laces?"

"I guess you've been a-treating yourself to a holiday, Miss Wells," said the social tenant of the lower "flat," meeting Ellie just inside the front door. "But you look clean beat out."

"I am."

Ellie mounted the narrow stairs, with their strip of gay carpeting down the middle, noting, as she went, the plain white walls and homely carpentry, marvelling she had never remarked until now how mean the whole building was, within and without. She unlocked her door.

"Exactly what I expected! the fire out and the rooms as cold as a barn; and I'm so tired I can hardly stand. It would be a comfort to be able to keep one girl to look after things a little. What I don't do goes undone."

She flung her bundle under the lounge, her shawl upon it, and fell to work with vicious energy, breaking a plate and upsetting the tea-kettle in the course of her operations.

"I wish it had scalded me to death," she muttered, while mopping up the hot water.

When all was ready, she sat down sullenly to wait until Peter came in to supper; did not stir from her chair even when she heard his step and cheery whistle in the hall. He always whistled the same tune, "Old Dog Tray," and to Ellie's nerves the roundabout melody was to-night simply exasperating.

"Ah, little woman! didn't know as you was in, being as how you didn't meet me at the door. How goes it?"

He laughed into her gloomy eyes in stooping to kiss her. What was it to him that Fanny trod upon velvet while her feet were chilled by the bare boards?

"You've been nodding, I guess," was his comment upon her sulky face and lagging step. "'Tis kinder tiresome waiting for a fellow, isn't it? What have you been doing with yourself all day? Did you get to see Fan?"

"Yes."

"Didn't make your throat worse, I hope, talking and walking?"

"No."

Ellie was setting supper on the table, and her laconics passed unremarked.

"Found Fan pretty well and bright, did you?"

"Very."

Peter mistook the meaning of the emphasis.

"I'm glad to hear it."

He was washing off the day's dust and grime in the basin under the kitchen roller, and turned his sunshiny face toward her, the water dripping from his bushy whiskers. He looked like a great, good-natured Newfoundland, fresh from a plunge.

"Real glad," he reiterated. "You see you borrowed trouble. I was in hopes she'd be better contented than what you was afraid she'd be."

"She'd be hard to please if she wasn't satisfied," said Ellie, aside.

Fortunately, Peter's head was buried in the crash towel, and he did not catch the murmur. Before supper was over, he was forced to acknowledge to himself that his wife was out of sorts. Not cross! He would not have admitted that had she brained him with a rolling-pin. But a trifle "dumpish," as he called it.

"You will be lonesome if I go out to-night," he said, "but Mr. Mansard wants to see me about some alterations he is going to make in the shop; some new plans for machinery, and the like. He asked me would I come to his house for an hour or so and I said yes."

"I thought your evenings belonged to yourself," replied Ellie, ungraciously. "That's the way the rich grind the faces of the poor."

"Mr. Mansard isn't one of that sort," Peter rejoined, mildly. "He's always been very friendly with me. But, as I started to say, s'pose you go with me as far as Mr. Stuyvesant's and sit with Jane till I come back. We can go in an omnibus, and the talk with your cousin will do you good."

It was, at any rate, a more agreeable prospect than moping in solitude, and they were soon on their way.

"A little down-hearted, or is it tired, eh?" queried Peter, when the stage set them down at the corner of the block on which was Mr. Stuyvesant's house, and he bent his head to peep under his wife's bonnet.

"Nothing is the matter," pettishly. "I do wish you wouldn't watch me so, Peter. Everybody feels sober now and then, I suppose."

"I watch you because I love you, Ellie."

She knew it, but sorely as her conscience smote her, she was too proud or sulky to apologize. At the servants' entrance to the Stuyvesant's mansion they parted.

"I'll be back as soon as I can, dear," said Peter, then, gravely and kindly, and Ellie carried a swelling heart, and eyes that ached from the pressure of unshed tears, up to the nursery.

Mrs. Stuyvesant had company to dinner; the baby was awake, and Jane unable to leave him. This was a crooked day, altogether, with our heroine. Her talk with her cousin was broken by the fretful infant, who insisted upon being carried in the arms up and down the floor until the nurse declared her feet were blistered and her ankles swollen.

"I wonder you will let yourself be so imposed upon. It is her duty to take care of her child when he's so troublesome," said Ellie, crossly. "I thought you had more spirit."

The words were upon her lips when Mrs. Stuyvesant entered, leading Master Guy, a fine boy of six.

"His father would keep him down stairs to dessert," the mother observed to Jane. "But he should have been in bed an hour ago. Undress him without delay. He is intolerably sleepy and cross."

"Can Katy come up and hold the baby, ma'am?" asked Jane, respectfully. "He will cry if I lay him down."

Mrs. Stuyvesant paused on her way to the door.

"Katy is helping Thomas pass the coffee, and cannot be spared. Cannot this person assist you?" glancing loftily at Ellie.

She was a woman of commanding presence, and before Ellie knew what she was about, she obeyed mechanically the behest of the authoritative look; held out her arms meekly for the baby, and began pacing the floor with him as Jane had done. But her blood boiled and surged within her heart until she seemed ready to suffocate.

"The most hateful woman that ever breathed!" she burst forth, in relinquishing the unwelcome charge to Jane, when Guy was in bed. "I wouldn't live with her for a hundred dollars a month!"

Jane laughed in malicious amusement.

"Oh, she isn't a bad one at heart. She only knows her own place, and wants other people to keep theirs."

Ellie was waiting down stairs for Peter when he called for her.

"Jane is busy, so you needn't come in," she said, tartly, interrupting the waiting-maid's cordial invitation to him. "I've been ready to go home this hour and more."

She rehearsed the history of her wrongs at the hands of mistress and maid by the time they were in the street.

"I'll never set my foot in the house again!" she protested, stormily. "'Person,' indeed! The haughty, horrid creature! As if I was the dust under her feet! And Jane enjoyed seeing me insulted! That was the meanest part of it all. She is no better than I am, if rich people do trample upon me!"

"Don't cry, my darling." Big Peter put his arm tenderly about her. "Nobody wants to trample upon you. I don't believe they meant to be unkind. I wouldn't think any more about it if I was in your place. I've got some good news to tell you that will, maybe, take the bad taste out of your mouth. Mr. Mansard has made me foreman in the shop, at double the wages I am drawing now, and next year it will be more. That's something like getting on in the world, isn't it, little girl?"

THE WIDOWER.

BY MRS. MARY E. NEALY.

FOR years and years of a lingering hope,

A single year of wedded bliss;

A long, long walk on an upward slope,

At the end a single kiss.

And this is all of life at the best—

The morning opes with a promise fair,

And, behold! the sun sinks down in the west

Before we are aware.

Before we know it the shadows come,

And the light sinks down in the gaping sea;

The blight has fallen upon a home,

And the bloom from the fragrant tree.

The hopes, and visions, and rainbows bright

Are hidden behind the blackened cloud;

The day is swallowed up in night,

And the heart's high hopes are bowed.

Patient and loving, for weary years

She watched and waited for life's dear crown;

And who could number the bitter tears

She shed as the suns went down—

As the suns went down on her lonely days,

While she watched and waited for love to come?

And who could know what a golden haze

He brought, at last, to her home?

And how he was prized so much the more

For the patient years of expectancy;

And how all who entered within her door

Saw his light burn full and free:

How the earth to her was a Paradise—

A garden of Eden, fresh and fair,

And the light that shone from her husband's eyes

Made her star of evening there.

How the dream still lingered—the days flew on,

And the bright flowers bloomed, and the sweet birds sang,

And ever, ever, from dawn to dawn,

Life's softest chime-bells rang:

Till a dearer hope than she ever had known

Had gently stolen within her breast,

Had sung to her in its sweetest tone,

And built in her heart its nest.

When, dark, and bitter, and cold, and dim,

With thunderous mutterings, stern and low,

The black cloud gathered with frown so grim,

And with winds as cold as snow—

Gathered and fell on that mother's heart,

And fell on the little baby form,

Which now can never be torn apart

By the wildest earthly storm.

But for him who wanders on earth alone,

With his manhood's hope and love all crushed,

With as deep a sorrow as ever was known,

All his sweet home-music hushed,

May God, who tempers the winds and waves,

Bring to his spirit her peace and calm,

Till he passes beyond his loved one's graves,

And rests by their sheltering palm.

SOME relaxation is necessary to people of every degree; the head that thinks and the hand that labors must have some little time to recruit their diminished powers.—Gilpin.

He that does good to another man does also good to himself—not only in the consequence, but in the very act of doing it, for the conscience of well-doing is an ample reward.—Seneca.

ADELE WORLIE.

BY AGNES SERLE.

"THERE, Minnie, read that, and prepare yourself accordingly." And, as he spoke, my husband handed to me across the breakfast-table a daintily penned, delicately scented letter; adding, as I looked up in astonishment from its perusal, "but good-by; don't get jealous;" and before I could frame a question, scarcely a thought, his customary good-by kiss was given, and I was alone, looking wonderingly at the missive in my hand, and foolishly allowing my mind to dwell upon Harry's parting words.

Not that the letter was so peculiar in itself; harmless enough, it would have seemed, and Harry's teasing speech was but an effervescence of his fun-loving nature, and I knew it. Still knowing, also, so well all the circumstances of his former connection with the writer of the epistle, it served as a link between his past and present life that I had hoped were severed forever, and a path leading to the possibilities of the future. But, before going any further, I may as well acquaint the reader with the few lines that had raised so unusual a tumult in my feelings; addressed to my husband, it began:—

MY DEAR OLD FRIEND: Do not be surprised (as I know you will not fail to be) at hearing from me, but remembering who it is, and how I am given to doing outré things, I know you and your sweet wife will excuse the liberty I take, viz: of inviting myself to your house for an indefinite length of time. You will, I trust, welcome me for the sake of "the days that are no more;" she, because it is to her that I particularly design my visit. For ever since your marriage, I have ardently wished to have more than an acquaintance with the woman to whom your love is given—to make a dear friend of her, perhaps. My present visit to M——, albeit one of business, will be the only opportunity I shall have for years, it may be, of accomplishing my wishes; therefore, I come to you. Look for me by the evening train of the 15th, and believe me, as ever, your true friend, May 10th.

ADELE WORLIE.

And now that you have the letter, you must know more of us, who are so nearly concerned in it, the recipients of the proposed visit. Three years before this, Harry Sandford and I were married. He was young and gay in his disposition, nay, even boyish in many things, although nearly ten years my senior. The eight years he had passed in fashionable society had made of him, as far as was possible to his fresh and frank nature, a thorough man of the world. Unable to mar the honest upright heart within, the world had yet offered to him its wealth of both vices and pleasures; but while he grasped the latter with eager hand, vice could gain no foothold with him, and when its gayety ceased to attract him, as he expressed it, when we were married, "he was ready to settle down into a most loving, exemplary Benedict." And so he proved to be; his ample means provided every desired pleasure for him and "the quiet little girl" he had so astonished his old friends by marrying, and he and I had just fallen fairly from their wondering attentions and settled to housekeeping and happiness, when this letter, that brought with it, to my mind, at least, so much of the past, and suggested so much of the future, ruffled the fair surface of our domestic life.

Loving my husband as I did, and perfectly free from jealousy as I believed myself to be of his past life and loves, of which he had freely made me the confidante, I could not account for the feeling of distrust I began to experience for our coming guest. She had been the last and best loved of his list; indeed, with her it had been real love, and an engagement of over a year's standing; broken by her at last through that love of coquetry, which fast developed itself after their engagement, and then the wild, passionate adoration he had given her burned itself out in a year's travel, and another passed in her "set" that he might prove himself; before the third was over, he had found, outside the whirl of society, "the quiet little girl" who believed him when he told her "that, after all, she had the better part—the love that would abide, outliving passion and personal attractions only."

Reassuring as had been that sentence when it was uttered, and firmly as I believed it still, it was with anything but an unclouded countenance with which I rose and went about preparing for Miss Worlie's reception. Her letter had been delayed, and it was already the 15th. So, really ashamed of my feelings, and, above all, of letting Harry know that I entertained them, I tried to work them down, and flew about the house in a most industrious manner; but never before did my little year old Harry seem so fretful, servants so neglectful, or I, to my own eyes, appear so utterly forlorn as upon this day. As at lunch we arranged that Harry should meet and escort our guest home for six o'clock dinner, I found myself more than once, as evening drew near, before the glass, mentally contrasting the appearance of my rather plain face and quiet dress with the brilliant beauty and fashionable woman I was momentarily expecting. A nursing baby, deep in the troubles of teething, is not conducive to any excess of beauty in the mother; and when I glanced from the thin plain cheeks to the undeniably too slender figure, clad in simple muslin, I almost sympathized with what I imagined would be Harry's mortification at my lack of style and good looks when compared to his old love. Altogether, I had worked myself into such a state of nervous excitement that I fairly counted the minutes until they should come, fearful of losing the little self-control I had managed to keep by me for her reception. Truly glad was I to see, at last, the carriage drive to the door, and I watched, unobserved, the tall, elegant figure of Adele as she alighted, and, turning, looked at the house, remarking in her low, musical voice, "What a lovely home you have, Harry; how happy you ought to be!" Harry's reply I did not hear as they came in together, and I went forward to meet her, my poor heart bounding with that undefined feeling called up again at her familiar use of Harry's name.

My unwonted agitation must have added to my good looks, for with all the empressment she was capable of exerting, Adele proceeded to assure me "that I was looking better even than when a bride;" and when my baby came and was caressed and admired, and her manner was so devoid of anything that could foster my unkind feelings, I began to experience the fascination with which she was so fatally invested. The feeling of aversion, I might almost call it, with which all day I had looked forward to her coming, wore gradually away under the softening influence of her sweet voice and smile, now asking me "if ever in my life before I had been treated so unceremoniously;" and again telling Harry, laughingly, that "seeing him so happy a married man so impressed her with the emptiness of her present pleasures, that she was almost ready 'to go and do likewise.'" And when presently I took her up to her room, the spell had so deepened upon me that I looked in on Harry a moment on my way to have dinner served, and exclaimed, "O Harry, how beautiful she is! I'm sure, as you once told me, I shall like her in spite of myself."

Smiling at my unusual warmth of manner, and the open avowal of my sentiments towards Adele, he answered, just as she rejoined us, "Who knows but that I shall, too?"

If I had admired so much her beauty before, my admiration must have boundlessly increased in proportion to its enhancement by the change she had made in her dress. She had exchanged her short travelling dress for a sweeping white organdie, strewn with rose-buds, its purity adding fresh beauty to her dazzling face, and its flowing amplitude a more queenly dignity to her faultless figure; the golden brown hair that waved back from her forehead seemed a fitting crown above the dark-brown eyes and perfect features. To see her you would have imagined she had spent the afternoon in a reviving siesta, instead of a warm railway journey.

In my own admiration of her beauty, I ceased to think of the effect it might have upon Harry, and the evening passed in the enjoyment of her brilliant conversational powers, and found me at its close without misgivings, at Adele's coming to our house; nay, I only wondered that I had ever had them.

The witching power she held over me, lasted for some days; long enough, I suppose she thought, to blind me to the real object of her visit, and then, though her manner to me was still the same, the knowledge came that it was assumed only to hide her steadily increasing demands upon the attention Harry had first shown her. I could see that he felt the difference; that sometimes his eyes sought my face to find if I had penetrated some little piece of her acting. But too proud to acknowledge to him then that I feared her, I gave no sign, and he thinking it "all right as long as I took no notice, and he saw through it," yielded more and more to the memories of "the olden time," brought constantly before him by the siren who had come here with the one purpose of bringing him to her feet again.

About this time I was relieved of the necessity of showing her any particular attentions; for little Harry, entering upon his second summer, and daily, by reason of his delicate health, requiring more of my time, kept me almost constantly with him. But as my husband's family lived very near us, I turned her over to his sisters for company on her shopping expeditions, and to them and him for her various amusements. I determined that neither she nor any one should imagine I feared her power. I said to myself that she should have full sway; and by secluding myself with my babe almost entirely, I left her free to exercise those wiles, which were destined to bring such bitter sorrow to me.

I think it was about the third week of her visit that she discovered that I had not been blinded by her attentions to me, but, instead of the revelation proving a stumbling-block in her march, she calmly left off her caressing ways and pretty speeches when with me, and, setting me aside with the utmost indifference, continued her sport with unabated zeal.

Dressed in the most charming of morning negligés, she followed Harry to the door in the morning to remind him of some one of her numerous commissions, or, perhaps, in the sweetly modulated tone she knew the use of so well, she would say "Good-by; will your business take you out to-day towards eleven? we may be down to-day," knowing full well I was not going with her, and that Harry would be out, as a matter of course.

Bitterly as all this stung me in my love and pride, it was as little compared to the remorse I began to feel at having let it come to pass. I felt that my husband loved me, and dearly, too, and had I spoken at first those words which would have forewarned him of his danger, he would have guarded against it. All these regrets I suffered when it was too late; when I feared nothing I could say would convince Harry now that he was wronging me, and in my long and quiet days, when attended by Harry, Adele was away upon some picnic or other excursion; or my night watches, with my sick child, when I could hear her magnificent voice from the parlor, giving pleasure to my husband as it was giving pain to me, my only thought was, "Will she never leave me in peace?" I felt that her absence was, perhaps, the only thing that could bring Harry once more to himself, and I prayed for it fervently. Every day that passed but rendered more impassable the barrier reared between him and me, and, in addition, the constant demand upon my feelings was wearing upon me; my looks told first upon me, and daily their tale was confirmed by my failing strength.

One afternoon, when Adele was entering upon the fifth week of her visit, having carried a brave face until she had gone out for her afternoon promenade, I broke down completely, and with a severe headache and fierce heartache, I lay in my darkened room, too miserable even to think. I heard the ring of the door bell, and knowing the servant had orders to admit no one, I was startled by the unceremonious entrance of my husband's youngest married sister, my dearest friend, and in a state, I saw at once, of most unusual excitement. She did not leave me long to conjecture its cause, for, seating herself by my couch, and caressing my hand, she began:—

"I'm sorry, Minnie, I came in just now, because you don't look strong enough to bear anything, and what I have come to say will, I know, pain you, and perhaps offend you; but, now that I am here, I must say it, if it does both. It can't be possible, Min, when we at home are so annoyed by it, that you are blind to what I am going to speak to you about, but your quiet way of taking it would lead one to imagine that you were. I know that it is because you love Harry that you are silent, and just because I do know this I take the liberty of coming to talk to you about his infatuation with that abominable woman, and your infatuation in letting it go so far."

I knew all that was coming now; and, too weak and miserable to attempt an answer, I covered my quivering face with my hands, to hide the burning tears that forced themselves from my eyes. I could hear tears also in her voice, as, stooping to kiss me, she resumed: "Don't think we are too hard on Harry, darling. You know how we all love him, but no love for him can excuse this weakness on his part that looks like wickedness, and that has caused you such pain. I come to you as much on his mother's behalf as my own, to tell you that you must do something to put a stop to it. You may know it has appeared seriously wrong, when our quiet mother has noticed his public devotion to that arch hypocrite—yes, and has even spoken to him about it, too. And what do you suppose his answer to her appeal was? The only disrespectful words I ever heard him address to her, 'That as long as Minnie did not see fit to lecture him, none of his family need trouble themselves to do it.'"

I felt as though her words would kill me—to think that my Harry could speak so coldly of so grievous a fault seemed bitterer than death to me, and I shrank back from the words as if from sharp knives. I had no heart now to seek to extenuate his conduct, and I nerved myself to hear all that Maggie had to say, and then I would try to resolve upon what was best to be done.

"I see, Minnie, that I am paining you deeply," she went on, "but sharp pain is preferable to the slow torture you have been enduring for these weeks that she has been here; and I verily believe, if I had not come in this afternoon, you would have gone on enduring, until it pleased her ladyship to release Harry from the enchantment she has put upon him. Now that you know that every one is beginning to whisper, you surely will take such measures that will make her understand that she must bring her campaign to a close. Just to show you how barefaced she has become, and how utterly regardless of the thoughts and feelings that may be entertained with regard to her, I may as well tell you what occurred not more than two hours ago. I was down in town, and just about to take the car for home when I met Adele. Supposing up town to be her destination, I said to her that we would ride together. 'Really, she would like to do so, but she had an important engagement.' Of course, I came on alone; but, the car being detained, whom should I see, as I passed Royal's, seated at a table discussing their cream, but Adele, and her cavalier was Harry. And now, Min," she went on, "don't think because I have talked so plainly to you that I fear any change in Harry's love for you. No one will despise his weakness, his inexcusable weakness, more than will Harry himself when the temptress has been routed; but we are not willing she should take her own time for surrender, and, above all, I can't allow her to make these pale cheeks hollower than they are now, or to give you one heartache more than you have already suffered."

And, having gone through with her task, Maggie undertook "setting me to rights," as she called it, and badly enough I needed it. My long imposed self-control had given way completely before the melting warmth of her kindness and sympathy; but the relief that the tears and her caresses brought to me, with the diversion she secured in the shape of my boy, whom she brought in "to cure his mamma," had partially restored my equanimity before Adele's return, when, kissing me good-by, she hurried down, on her way out to excuse me until dinner to my guest on the plea of my suffering from a severe headache.

Oh, the misery of that hour before dinner! The tortures I underwent in anticipation of the interview I must have with Harry—my darling that I had always so proudly confided in! It seemed as if I could never bring myself into the presence of the woman who had wrought it all, and yet I rose and dressed for the meal with the conviction that it would all come right yet. My headache would account for my deathlike pallor and the dark circles about my eyes, and I was too proud to let Adele suspect the agony I was enduring by my absence from the table.

Harry was rather late to dinner, and I noticed his preoccupied manner when he replied to Adele's lively greeting. My heart beat quickly, as I thought perhaps the accusing voice of conscience was at last awakened, and I argued favorably for the effect of the appeal I intended making to him that night. And, when he noticed my distressed face, and inquired, in almost his old loving manner, the cause of it, I felt my reproaches and grief giving way, and my heart went out to him in love and sympathy, while a wild desire to trample upon the serpent who had coiled herself in my Eden took possession of me.

She was ill at ease, and by the occasional furtive glances she gave at Harry's averted face I knew she feared for the ascendancy she had gained over him.

Mutually pleased to escape from the restraints of the meal, we left the dining-room; I, to go to the nursery, passed quickly through the hall, where Adele, standing in the parlor door, looked in surprise at my husband, who, taking his hat, remarked:—

"You ladies must amuse yourselves to-night. I have a business engagement that may perhaps detain me until late."

She felt, as did I, that it was but an excuse, and again, as she turned away, I saw the wondering, baffled look upon her face that I had noticed at dinner; and as I said to her I would be back presently, and went slowly up the stairs, I saw that expression fade before one of contempt and anger blended, as, throwing herself upon a fauteuil in the dim light of the back parlor, she muttered beneath her breath: "The pitiful fool! Does he think of going back now, and for the sake of that crying pale face up stairs?"

How plainly I see her, now, as she reclined against the window, every outline of her perfectly moulded face and figure a model of grace, even the dress she wore—a pale green grenadine falling away from her in long undulations—the beautiful neck and arms bare, save where they were brushed by the golden ripples of her glorious hair, which, drawn back from her face, fell far below her slender waist, and the brilliant glow of those mischief-making eyes; all are before me now, indelibly stamped upon my memory the first of those pictures that made to me that night the most miserable of my existence.

Detained up stairs longer than I anticipated, I at last returned to the parlor, unwilling to appear to hold myself aloof from her, and more particularly that, as I neared the open door, I heard voices, and supposed company had come in during my absence. Passing in by the front room, I approached the folding-doors as simultaneously I heard Adele's low tones as in a dream:—

"Oh, my darling! I did love you, and now we are separated forever," and the sight which forever stamped her words upon my mind greeted me. Her eyes were raised to my husband's face, as he sat beside her; her head rested upon his shoulder, her mass of hair sweeping his breast. As she spoke, he drooped his head towards her as though he would have kissed her lips. Then I heard, I saw nothing more; my heart swelled within me, and I thought I was dying; my one thought was to get out of that room. I turned, and then came oblivion.

When consciousness returned, I lay in a darkened room, and Maggie sat beside me—so childishly weak I only wondered what had happened, and it was only after some time that I collected mind and strength to ask for Harry and my baby. The memory of all the past was for the time obliterated from my memory; and, when Maggie enjoined silence, telling me if I would go to sleep a little while I should see them both when I awoke, I obeyed her as a child would, and, when I again opened my eyes, it was to find Harry kneeling beside me—but, oh! so changed, grown so old looking and careworn, that striving to think what could have caused it brought back all the events of that miserable night.

Forbidden to talk, he could do nothing but caress me; the great tears of joy falling from his eyes as he called me "his own precious darling!" and thanked Heaven for my recovery. And I was satisfied with this, until we were allowed to go together over the past, and only felt gratitude for the near approach I had made to death, since it had restored to me my husband's love.

When the first days of my rapid recovery had passed, and there was no necessity of absolute quiet for me, Harry came to me, and, going step by step over the time of Adele's fatal visit, I learned the full extent of the snare she had entered our doors to set. I learned all from Harry, marked as his recital was by bitterest repentance for his weak yielding to her subtle flatteries and the great suffering he had brought upon me.

Coming at last to that terrible night, he threw himself upon his knees beside me, covering my hand with kisses, exclaiming: "And now, darling, upon this evening, whose close I had intended should see me repentant, and forgiven my past weakness by you, to think I should have but added the crowning piece to my wicked folly! I had come home that evening to dinner with conscience aroused at last, stinging me into remorse at my behavior; but, foolish, wicked as I had been, I knew that I had but to acknowledge my fault, and the love which does not fail me even now would shield me, and with your forgiveness the rest of my task would be easy—breaking with Adele, I mean. I could not bear the thought of a tête-à-tête with her while you were up stairs with Harry, and consequently made an excuse of a business engagement, thinking, with Adele in her favorite seat in the back parlor, I could return immediately unobserved, and, seeking you, could make my peace before being thrown again with her. I but walked around the square, and had entered the door again, when she called to me, 'What! back already?' and, weak fool that I was, I walked in to her 'for a farewell chat;' she said 'she had received a letter, and was going away to-morrow.'

"Then, with that weakness so fatally a part of my nature, I thought I could speak to you after she was gone, and blindly followed her, until it led to the disgraceful end you witnessed. We talked of old times, of the days of our engagement, and even when I knew well that her hand, and hers alone, had severed the bond, she spoke of her misery when, through her father's command, she broke it in order that she might engage herself to a richer suitor. Then pity and sympathy for her in the hollow, heartless life she described as having led since made me forget the black treachery she had shown me, and the blacker crime I was committing against you in listening to her; and I remembered nothing but that this bewildering, fascinating woman's head was upon my shoulder, her perfumed hair swept my breast, her eyes and lips both reminding me that I had loved her. Then, as in my utter madness I stooped to kiss those lips, I heard that quick-drawn breath of yours which told me you had been a witness of this, the darkest of my sins against you. Thank heaven! it came before my face reached hers.

"The despair upon your face made me forgetful even that she was a woman; and, throwing her off as I would a viper, I followed you, but not in time to save you from the fall that for the past two weeks has threatened to take your precious life, and leave me heart-broken. Oh, darling! it seems like a long, hideous dream, a dream that only your forgiveness has power to waken me from. Can you ever grant it, ever love me as you once did?" He bent over my hand, fairly sobbing, and with my forgiveness (which can you doubt I gave him?) I mingled tears of gratitude and thanksgiving for the love which, "purified as by fire," had returned to me.

Of Adele Worlie we heard nothing for some time (as she left our house the day after my injury), until, not long since, Maggie heard through one of their mutual friends that she spoke of her visit to Harry Sanford's as "having been very pleasant; that she had seen very little of his wife, as she was occupied during her stay with a sick child; and, having accomplished her mission, which was the purchase and making up of her trousseau, she had retired, leaving her old lover to play the devoted to the 'yea—nay' piece of flesh he called his wife. For her part, she liked something a little more decided."

Maggie pointed out to me in the paper her marriage, remarking: "Probably she has found something 'more decided,' for her husband is 'most decidedly' old and ugly, though I suppose the weight of his gold counterbalances all that."

Harry and I, except to notice her marriage, have never spoken of her since our long conversation about her. Too terrible to us both were the effects of her visit for it to be touched upon lightly, and we are too grateful for the happiness we have since enjoyed to mar it by even the shadow of her name.

BY THE RIVER.

BY CARRIE D. BEEBE.

At twilight, by the smoothly-flowing Hudson,
We stood—my love and I—
Beyond the hills the crimson clouds, and golden,
Lighted the western sky;
I silent, gazing on the gilding river,
So fair at twilight-time;
He, in a soft, clear cadence, low, repeating
An old familiar rhyme.
All nature seemed in one harmonious concord—
The rushing river's flow—
The sunset sky—the air with fragrance laden—
His words, so sweet and low.
He paused—then spoke again: "The river, gliding,
Speaks in sweet tones to me;
Tell to my heart, oh, truly tell me, Linda,
What does it say to thee?"
"It says, 'Oh, let thy life, in pure, grand current,
Like mine, unruffled, flow—'"
I paused, for his eyes, smiling down upon me,
Had caught the sunset glow.
It might not be the sunset, but more tender
And soft they seemed to shine;
My own, beneath his earnest gaze, drooped slowly—
Gently, his hand sought mine.
"Linda, the earth, the sky, the air, the river,
Sing the same song to me;
Ay, and my true heart joins the chorus ever—
'Linda, I love but thee!'"
His voice was eloquent with sweet entreaty,
I trembled—not with pain—
I knew his true heart sought my soul's affection,
Nor asked my love in vain.
Waiting he stood, the river's gentle murmur
The only sound we heard;
Raising my eyes, I gave his heart its answer,
Although I spoke no word.

FIRMNESS both in sufferance and exertion is a character which I would wish to possess. I have always despised the whining yelp of complaint, and the cowardly, feeble resolve.—Burns.

JACK AND THE BEAN STALK.

A FAIRY TALE DRAMA.

BY S. ANNIE FROST.

*Characters.*MRS. TWADDLE, *Jack's mother.*HELPA LONG, *a fairy.*HORRIDHEAD, *a giant.*SCAREDTODEATH, *the giant's wife.*JACK, a dreadful boy.Costumes.

MRS. TWADDLE. Short dress of striped chintz, overskirt of gay flowered chintz, white muslin apron, and sacque of red stuff, with white muslin kerchief. White muslin cap, buckled shoes, and black mittens.

HELPA LONG. Dress of white tarlatane, short and full; white satin slippers; wreath of white flowers; wand with a star at top. Dress, slippers, wreath, and wand covered with gold spangles. Hair in curls, or crimped and flowing.

HORRIDHEAD. A giant, made by carrying a pole under a long, flowing cloak of scarlet. The head may be made by the largest and ugliest mask to be found, and a wig of coarse black yarn in long locks. The cloak buttoning from throat to hem can cover the whole figure, but the legs should be stuffed, and the boots of a size to match the head and height of the figure.

SCAREDTODEATH. Dress of blue woollen, made short; kerchief, apron, and cap of white muslin; buckled shoes.

JACK. Jacket and pants of gray woollen, low shoes, blue yarn socks, straw hat with blue ribbons, scarlet necktie, and striped shirt.

SCENE I.—A room in a cottage, poorly furnished.

Curtain rises, discovering JACK seated on a low stool, whistling a stick. MRS. TWADDLE making a coarse garment of any kind. JACK is whistling a gay tune.

Mrs. Twaddle. Heigho! Dear me! (Wipes her eyes.)

Jack. When will dinner be ready, mammy?

Mrs. Twaddle. Dinner, you dreadful boy! Dinner! You know very well I gave you the last cent in the house to buy a peg-top.

Jack. And it split the first time I tried to spin it. I wish I had bought marble.

Mrs. Twaddle. Oh, dear! What are we to do?

Jack. I'm sure I don't know. I say, mammy, didn't father have any money?

Mrs. Twaddle. Hush! hush! Don't say a word about your father. Don't, don't, Jack. You frighten me to death.

Jack. I won't, I won't. Dear me! you are trembling all over. But to return to the dinner question. Is there nothing to eat in the house?

Mrs. Twaddle. Not a scrap of food. We ate the last loaf for breakfast this morning.

Jack. And no money?

Mrs. Twaddle. Not one cent.

Jack. That's a lively prospect. Nothing we can sell?

Mrs. Twaddle. Nothing but the cow. I suppose she will have to go next market day, if you won't work.

Jack. Work! I have an idea I was born to be a gentleman, for I hate the very name of work. (Rising.) Well, I will go sell the cow, and buy some dinner, for I am hungry.

Mrs. Twaddle. No, no. I'll sell her myself. You'll be sure to be cheated.

Jack. Nonsense! You'd look pretty selling cows. That ain't woman's work. I'll make a good bargain, never fear.

[Exit JACK, whistling.]

Mrs. Twaddle. Oh, dear me! He'll certainly be cheated.

Jack. (Looking in at door.) I say, mammy, are cows dear or cheap just now?

Mrs. Twaddle. (Crying.) Oh, you wicked boy! Your laziness and idle ways have brought us to beggary and ruin. Cruel boy! My poor, poor cow! To have to sell the poor thing breaks my heart, and you are making a jest of it.

Jack. (Kissing her.) There, mammy, don't cry. I'll be so industrious after this that we will live on turtle soup and pound-cake. Don't cry, that's a darling mammy. I'll sell the cow for present expenses, and I'll go to work to-morrow like a man.

Mrs. Twaddle. Will you, dear, really, really?

Jack. Really. There, now, cheer up. I'll go sell the cow.

[Exit JACK.]

Mrs. Twaddle. Dear fellow! He grows more and more like his poor father. If only he would go to work, now, we might, with my sewing, be quite comfortable. But who can blame him? Little did I think when he was a baby that he would ever be obliged to work. Heigho!

Enter JACK, with his hat in his hand, carrying it carefully, as if afraid of spilling the contents.

Jack. Oh, mammy, mammy, see what a bargain!

Mrs. Twaddle. Why, Jack, have you been to market already?

Jack. Oh, no, indeed! Just at the door I met a farmer, and he bought the cow.

Mrs. Twaddle. Bought the cow! How much did you get for her, Jack?

Jack. (Showing his hat.) All these beans.

Mrs. Twaddle. What! Beans! Oh, you bad, wretched boy! Sold the cow, our only cow, for beans!

Jack. But see, mammy, they are blue, and red, and white, and yellow, and green. I never saw such beautiful beans in my life.

Mrs. Twaddle. (Rocking herself and crying.) You'll break my heart! You'll kill me with your wicked ways! When we have cooked your paltry beans, we may starve to death.

Jack. Cook them! Cook my beautiful beans!

Mrs. Twaddle. No, you don't deserve any dinner. There! (Snatches the hat from JACK, and throws it out of the window.)

Jack. Oh, mammy! Oh, my beautiful beans! (Runs to the window.) They are all scattered on the ground. Oh, how could you do so? (Looks out for a moment, then cries suddenly,) Oh, mammy, look, look! They are growing! Oh, see, see! The stalk is as thick as a tree and as high as the house already. (Looking up.) See how it grows.

Mrs. Twaddle. (Looking out.) O Jack, what can it be? They must be fairy beans.

Jack. Now the top is out of sight. I must climb up and see where it goes.

Mrs. Twaddle. (Holding him back.) No, no. You will be killed.

Jack. I must go. Let me go, mammy. Who knows but my fortune is at the top?

Mrs. Twaddle. No, you shan't go. Jack, you must not go.

Jack. I'll come back soon. I'll come back to-night. (Breaks away from her.) Good-by! (Exit JACK.) Good-by! (Calling, his voice growing fainter and fainter, as if he was climbing up, till it is lost entirely.) Good-by! I'll come back soon. Don't fret, mammy. Good-by!

Mrs. Twaddle. (Who has been wringing her hands, and walking up and down.) Oh, he'll be killed! O Jack, Jack! (Crying and sitting down again.) Oh, I'll never see my boy again! [Curtain falls.]

SCENE II.—A large, handsomely-furnished room, with a long sofa across background. (Two lounges, placed foot to foot and covered, will make a good sofa for the giant.) Curtain rises, discovering JACK looking about him.

Jack. I wonder where I am. I began to think I never should get to the top of that bean stalk, and such a walk as I had afterwards. Not a tree, shrub, or living creature have I seen since I came to this strange country at the top of a bean stalk. When I saw this great castle, I came in, hoping somebody would give me a mouthful to eat. I am so hungry I could eat a live cat. Nobody here?

Enter HELPALONG.

Helpalong. Jack! Jack! Jack!

Jack. (Aside.) Oh, what a beautiful lady! (Aloud.) Servant, ma'am. (Bows.)

Helpalong. I will not ask you how you came here, Jack, for I am the fairy who promised at your birth to protect you, and I have myself guided you here.

Jack. Indeed, ma'am?

Helpalong. It was I who sent the beans to you, and I who made the giant bean stalk for you to come here.

Jack. Well, ma'am, now that I am here, may I inquire what you want of me?

Helpalong. I was about to explain that to you. Do you remember your father, Jack?

Jack. No, ma'am. Whenever I ask mother anything, she trembles and looks frightened, and sometimes, if I repeat a question, she will cry and sob all day, and seem actually afraid to answer me.

Helpalong. She is afraid, and I will tell you the reason. Your mother cannot answer you, but I may. But before I begin my story, I require from you a solemn promise to obey my commands. I am a fairy, and, if you do not obey me, I will destroy you.

Jack. Oh, I'll do whatever you say!

Helpalong. Listen, then. Your father was a very rich and a very good man, and made it a rule every day to relieve some poor person. Once a week he gave a great dinner to people who had been rich and lost their money.

Jack. That was good.

Helpalong. The rich and great were very seldom his guests, but the poor were treated at his table as if they possessed both riches and honor. All his servants worshipped him, and, although he was only a private gentleman, he was treated and lived like a prince.

Jack. But how is it that we are so poor, then?

Helpalong. Patience. I will tell you. A very hideous and powerful giant, hearing of your father's wealth, resolved to gain possession of it. He was as wicked as your father was good, and determined upon a plan to kill and rob him.

Jack. The monster!

Helpalong. He was, indeed, a monster, as you will hear. He came to your father's castle, and represented himself as having lost all his possessions in a terrible earthquake, and as barely escaping with his own and his wife's life. Your father believed him, and gave him a home at the castle, treating himself and his wife like visitors of distinction.

Jack. Oh, what a pity! What did he do?

Helpalong. It was a long time before he had any chance to carry out his plans, but one day a terrible shipwreck occurred. Your father's castle stood at some distance from the coast, but with a spy glass vessels could be seen. The giant saw the shipwreck, and ran to your father, begging him to send relief to the coast. Every servant was sent, but your father was ill, and not able to join them. As soon as the house was empty, the giant went to the study, where your father was reading, and began to chat. Your father recommended some particular book, and reached up to get it, when the giant stabbed him in the back and killed him.

Jack. The wretch!

Helpalong. Wretch, indeed. You were then only three months old. Your mother had you in a remote part of the house; but, coming to the study, fancy her horror at finding your father lying dead and in a pool of blood.

Jack. The poor mammy! No wonder she cries so much.

Helpalong. The giant rushed upon her, and would have killed you both, but she begged so hard for your life and her own that the giant consented to let you live. He made her promise in the most solemn manner never to tell you anything of your father, and threatened her with instant death if she did so. Your mother fled with you instantly, and she has lived in your present house ever since. The giant loaded himself with your father's treasures, loaded every cart in the stables and the horses, and then set the castle on fire, and also fled with his wife, leaving the people to suppose your parents and yourself perished in the flames.

Jack. But where were you?

Helpalong. Alas, Jack! your mother called for me in vain. Know that fairies have their laws and punishments as well as mortals. Just before your father's death I transgressed, and my power was suspended from that time until to-day.

Jack. What a pity!

Helpalong. A pity, indeed. But since I could not help your parents, I wish now to help you. You are the person appointed to regain your father's treasures and punish the giant. You came here by my magic power, and you must remain till the giant returns. You must not be alarmed, for I will aid you. Seize on all you can, for all in this castle was stolen from your father, and is rightly yours. Remember, while you obey me, I will protect you; but, as soon as you disobey me, I will severely punish you.

Jack. I will obey you. I long to avenge my father.

Helpalong. Courage, then, and farewell!

[Exit HELPALONG.]

Jack. I wonder what I am to do. She did not tell me how I was to regain these stolen treasures of my father's. Oh! if I could only give the giant what he deserves, I would not care for the treasure. But we are so poor, and the dear mammy frets so much, that it would be jolly to take her what belongs to her.

Enter SCAREDDEATH.

Scareddeath. A boy! A live boy!

Jack. Yes, ma'am. Is there anything very wonderful in the sight of a live boy? They were plenty enough where I came from.

Scareddeath. You wretched child! How did you come here?

Jack. You'll never guess, so I'll tell you. I came on a bean stalk.

Scareddeath. Do you know where you are?

Jack. I have not the faintest idea.

Scareddeath. You are where your life is not worth two cents.

Jack. Ma'am!

Scareddeath. You asked me if there was anything wonderful in the sight of a live boy. It is a most marvellous sight to see any human being within ten miles of this castle.

Jack. Indeed, ma'am. May I inquire the reason?

Scareddeath. Because this is the castle of the great giant, Horridhead, who has devoured all the people within ten miles, and who will walk fifty miles any day to get a nice, tender boy for dinner.

Jack. Oh, oh! Let me hide.

Scareddeath. Hide! I expect Horridhead in every moment. You will be sure to meet him if you run out, and I dare not keep you in here. He would kill us both.

Jack. Oh, please hide me! I will keep very still, and if he does find me, I'll never tell him you hid me.

Scareddeath. I dare not.

Jack. Oh, you won't send a poor little boy out to be eaten up for a giant's supper! Dear, good Mrs. Horridhead, please hide me! I'll be as still as a mouse.

Scareddeath. Oh, I hear Horridhead coming!

Jack. How the room shakes!

Scareddeath. That's his steps! Oh, he'll swallow you like a pill, and kill me for not cooking you! Here! hide under the sofa, quick! (JACK crawls under the sofa.)

Jack. I wish I was at home! Ugh! I'm scared almost to death!

Scareddeath. Stop chattering, and lie still.

Enter HORRIDHEAD.

Horridhead. (Snuffing the air.) Wife, I smell fresh meat.

Scareddeath. Oh, my love, it is only the man you ate for breakfast.

Horridhead. I tell you I smell fresh meat.

Scareddeath. Oh, I remember, now! The crows left a piece of sheep on the roof this morning.

Horridhead. I tell you I smell fresh meat here, in this room! I'll find it, too! (Begins to hunt about the room.) It's here!

Scareddeath. It must be outside, my dear. You can find it in the morning.

Horridhead. Well, bring me my money bags, and my harp, and my hen. I'll eat my supper after I have had a nap.

[Exit SCAREDDEATH.]

Jack. (Peeping out.) Oh, what a monster! If he should find me, I'm a dead boy.

Horridhead. (Sitting on the sofa.) It is very curious what a strong smell of fresh meat is in this room.

Enter SCAREDDEATH, with a hen (or any large stuffed bird), two bags, one marked silver and one gold, and a small harp.

Horridhead. (Putting them on a table, which he draws near to him.) Ah! here is my pretty hen! How many golden eggs has she laid to-day, wife?

Scareddeath. Fifteen.

Horridhead. Good hen! Have you counted the money to-day, wife?

Scareddeath. Yes. It is all right.

Horridhead. Then go and cook my supper.

(Exit SCARED-TO-DEATH.) I'll have some music, and take a little nap. (Lies down on sofa.) Where is my harp? Ah, here you are! Play! (Soft music behind the scenes, during which HORRIDHEAD covers his face and seems sleeping. When the music ceases, JACK creeps out.)

Jack. Is he asleep? Sound as a rock, I believe. (HORRIDHEAD snores.) Ugh! thunder is nothing to that noise. I must be off now before he wakes, and these little articles, I presume, are mine. My friend, the fairy, told me to take all I could carry, so I will appropriate these. A hen that lays golden eggs is surely a good commencement for a poultry yard, and will console dear mammy for the loss of her cow. (Takes the hen under his arm.) Then these bags of gold and silver will not come amiss for present expenses, and I could never leave a harp that plays without fingers. (Takes the bags and harp.) Good-night, Mr. Horrid-head! Pleasant dreams to you! (Runs off.)

Horridhead. (Jumping up.) Who calls? That is the fairy in my harp!

Voice. Master! Help! Master!

Horridhead. What is this? My hen gone! My money not here! My harp stolen! Thieves! Murder! Thieves! I'm coming! I'm coming! (Runs off stage.) [Curtain falls.]

SCENE III.—Same as Scene I. MRS. TWADDLE discovered splitting some wood with an axe.

Mrs. Twaddle. Oh, dear! Oh, dear! What has become of my poor boy? Why did he ever try to climb that dreadful bean stalk? I'll make a fire, and cook the beans I picked up from the ground, for he's sure to come home hungry.

Enter HELPALONG.

Helpalong. Mrs. Twaddle!

Mrs. Twaddle. Oh! who is this? Jack's fairy godmother! Bless me, ma'am, I was afraid you had forgotten us.

Helpalong. Not at all. I saw Jack this morning, and sent him to avenge his father.

Mrs. Twaddle. Sent my boy to that dreadful giant! Oh, he'll be killed to a certainty! Oh, miserable woman that I am.

Helpalong. He won't be killed. He is on his way home now. Hark! he is coming down the bean stalk.

Enter JACK, with the hen, bags, and harp.

Jack. Here, mammy! Look what I have got! (Throws them down.) Where's the axe? The giant is on the bean stalk, and I mean to bring him down faster than I came. (Takes the axe and runs off.)

Mrs. Twaddle. What do I see? My husband's magic hen! The fairy harp he gave me for a wedding present! The bags of money he kept for charity! O Jack! Jack! But he said the giant was on the bean stalk! Oh, if he comes here, we are ruined!

Helpalong. Never fear; Jack is chopping down his ladder. (Sounds like chopping behind the scenes.)

Jack. (Behind the scenes.) I'll have him down presently, mammy. Never fear. He won't eat any more tender little boys for supper. (A heavy crash behind scenes.)

Mrs. Twaddle.—Oh! what's that? Oh, I am frightened to death.

Helpalong. Brave boy! He has brought down the giant.

Enter JACK with HORRIDHEAD'S head.

Jack. Huzza! Here's the head of Horrid-head! He'll do no more mischief.

Helpalong. Jack!

Jack. I beg your pardon, ma'am. I did not see you before. I hope I have pleased you!

Helpalong. You have obeyed me faithfully. Be dutiful to your mother, and try to follow the noble example of your father, and count upon my assistance and friendship. Your enemy is dead, and you will soon have immense wealth. Be just and charitable. Farewell! (Soft music.)

[Curtain falls.]

LOVE AND TIME.

BY LOUDON ENGLE.

Love and Time a race would run,
For the mastery;
From dawn of day to set of sun
Ran they eagerly.

But Time's strength was falling fast,
Lagged he in the rear;
When Love, as he by him past,
Whispered in his ear:—

'Courage, comrade, come along!
Is thy strength so frail?
List! I'll cheer thee with a song.
Haste! look not so pale.'

But Time sat on the wayside,
Tired, drooping, wan;
Ran he more he must have died—
All his strength was gone.

Love the goal reached, and came back,
Light as any bird;
Time, still sitting sad, alack!
Not a finger stirred.

Would you know why Time with Love
Never can compete?
Learn that one is heaven's dove—
Nothing is more fleet.

Love is of the heavens born,
Time is of the earth;
Life to Love is ever morn,
Brimming full of mirth.

Time, grown old with age and cares,
Back to earth must fall;
Love knows not the flight of years,
Age, or death at all.

AN OLD MAID'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

BY L. MAUD M'CALEB.

AND so you wonder, Jennie, why I never married? Well, for your gratification, I will open the long-closed volume of my youth, and tell you why I am now a lonely old woman, instead of having the ties and affections around me that surround all the associates of my girlhood. It is twenty-eight years ago since the book of love was read and closed forever to me. Twenty-eight years! How long the time seems, and yet every incident of that dream is fresh before me; and, without an effort, I seem to pass over that vast vista of years, standing once more—a light-hearted girl of nineteen—under that old beech-tree that grew by the brook which ran through our garden, looking at Charles Wilmer as he stood cutting my name into the bark of that old tree! It seems so foolish for a woman of forty-seven years to cry over the remembrance of a love affair; but I never recall the time, when I dreamed that bright love-dream, without feeling a choking sensation in my throat, and my eyes filling with tears. Do not laugh at me, Jennie, for, although an old maid's love affair may seem a ridiculous story for you to listen to, it was to me the dawning and closing of life. Since my awakening, I have lived on, not caring how soon God called me from this cold and barren world. I pray, child, you may never have to pass through a similar ordeal—like that which blasted your aunt's heart, and made me a bankrupt of love.

I was, as I told you, nineteen years of age when Charles Wilmer—a young physician—came to practise his profession in our neighborhood. He was a young man, only twenty-four years old, but with a mind well stored with useful knowledge, and possessing a face and form of rare manly beauty. Do you wonder, then, that I felt attracted towards him? Ah! later, when I knew the sterling worth of that man, I made an idol of him. When he first came among us, he was so superior in appearance and intellect to the young men that had grown up in our midst that the entire neighborhood seemed leagued to make a "lion" of him.

Many bright eyes grew brighter at the approach of Doctor Wilmer, and he seemed a universal favorite, excepting with one person, and that person was my most intimate friend, Josephine Grey. Josephine was two years my senior, and greatly my superior in mental culture. I loved her too dearly to ever feel either envy or jealousy toward her, and, when I heard others speak of her beauty and talent, I felt as proud as though I myself had received the compliment. I did not dream that treachery and falsehood were a part of Josephine Grey, and little thought I that it would be from her hand that my happiness was to receive its death-blow. From the moment that Doctor Wilmer was introduced to Josephine Grey, there seemed to exist a mutual antipathy between them, and when I would speak of Doctor Wilmer's elegance and attractions, she would smile so scornfully that I would feel quite abashed, and hastily speak of some other subject.

But to go back to that evening when he cut my name on that old beech-tree. (The last time I was at your Uncle Thomas's, I went down to that old tree, and saw the name there still, although time has almost obliterated it.)

"There, Minnie"—he was the only one that ever called me that name; every one else called me Minerva—"is not that well done? Now, little one, I want that to be a record for something; and, if you will answer as I wish, I will put the date there, and it will be a memorial of my happiness."

I stood by him, wondering what he could mean, when he turned to me, and, taking my hand, said:—

"Minnie, do you not understand me? Don't you know what I would ask? I love you, little darling, better than all the world, and want you to learn to love me. Will you not try to love me a little, Minnie?" And his great black eyes seemed flooded with love that language failed to express.

I stood, without saying a word, for some moments, when I was recalled from silence by a pressure of the hand, and "O Minnie, have you nothing to say to me?" Then the truth would have its sway, and I leaned my head on his breast, and told him that I would not have to learn to love him, for it was a sweet lesson that had stolen unconsciously into my heart.

Ah, how blessed even is the memory of that evening! Every incident connected with my brief but happy courtship is painted indelibly on my memory's wall, and the portrait of my lost and now dead love that is engraved on my heart is brighter and dearer to me than all living beings. But I go into reverie, and the time is rolling on, and your curiosity is still unsatisfied about your aunt being an "old maid," when everybody tells you I was such a bright and beautiful girl.

Well, as I told you, Josephine Grey (I lived to hate her as much as I had once loved her) always seemed to dislike Doctor Wilmer, so it was with some misgivings that I went to confide my love affair and engagement to her. I wanted her to approve of my choice, for I could not be perfectly happy until Josephine—my best friend and confidante—shared my secret with me. She seemed to change in her manner towards Doctor Wilmer from the time that I confided my engagement to her, and I was too happy in his love to distrust any one, especially my dearest friend. On the contrary, I was well pleased to see her treat my lover with greater kindness and attention, for I blindly believed she did it on my account.

Shortly after our engagement, an old bachelor uncle of Doctor Wilmer's died, leaving him a fortune of sixty thousand dollars; but I, in my blind confidence in Josephine, never thought that she desired to supplant me in the affection of Doctor Wilmer, and make herself mistress of the elegant home he was having prepared for me. Ah, how happy I was in those days! My father and mother called me their "singing bird," for I was so blithe, and merry, and so joyous that I wanted to see every one as happy as myself. Sometimes, Jennie, when I see you so trusting and confiding toward your friends, I almost shudder with dread, and pray that you may never be deceived as I was.

Doctor Wilmer often chided me for my romantic devotion to Josephine Grey; for he seemed to distrust her, and would tell me not to confide so entirely in her, that now I need have no confidante but himself and my mother. Then I would grow vehement in her defense, and tell him he did not understand her; that she appeared cold and selfish to the world, but I knew her better, and would trust her blindly. He would smile at my eagerness, and then make me happier than ever by his caresses and affection. Frequently he would come and ask me about the house he was having built for our home, and insist on my suggesting any little change that I thought would be prettier, or that would suit his "little Minnie" better. I would often include Josephine in these conversations, and urge her to assist me in suggesting improvements, and would adopt any advice she would offer on the subject. We had concluded to be married early in October, and about the middle of August a cousin of mine—Willie Wilde—who was practising law in a distant city, came to spend a few of the hot dog-days at "Magnolia Grove," our pleasant farm.

Willie was my mother's great nephew, and was a universal favorite with all our family, for he was a most worthy and honorable man, deserving our confidence and esteem. He was a remarkably fine-looking young man, and very intelligent, but poor, and had to carve his way to fortune by his own exertions. Willie had a widowed mother and an only sister almost entirely dependent upon him for a support, and he had also been engaged for two years to a most lovely and excellent girl, but, like himself, Carrie Garland was poor. Her father was a prosperous merchant, but with a large family, of which Carrie was the eldest child, so all that Mr. Garland could give his daughter Carrie at her marriage would be her trousseau. For this reason they had put off their marriage, waiting until Willie should get established in his practice. Willie and Carrie were devoted to each other, and expected, at the time Willie came to see us, to be married early the following winter; but this fact was kept secret between them, and only confided to me in return for my confidence in him about my own engagement. Willie spent three weeks with us. He often met Doctor Wilmer, and admired him very much, and congratulated me upon my choice, but Doctor Wilmer never seemed at ease with Willie. However, that appeared such a trifle that I did not think it worth while to say anything to him on the subject. Ah, Jennie, Shakspeare was right when he wrote:—

"Trifles, light as air,
Are, to the jealous, confirmation strong
As proofs of Holy Writ."

Little did I imagine that Doctor Wilmer was jealous of Willie Wilde, and that jealousy fostered in his breast by the continued falsehood of Josephine Grey. At the end of his visit of three weeks to us, Willie returned to his home in the city; and a few hours after his departure a note came to me from Doctor Wilmer, saying only, "You have deceived me, but I have loved you too well to reproach you now. Henceforth let us be as strangers." I was almost stunned when I read those cruel words, but I read and reread them, until they seemed to burn themselves into my brain.

From the moment that cruel note was perused by me, a blight seemed to fall upon my life, and I have never been gay and light-hearted since. I felt that I had changed from a merry, happy girl to a sad-hearted woman in that hour. In novels and romances, Jennie, the severed, but loving ones, are always, by some happy freak of chance, reunited; but I am telling you a true story, and no such happy denouement came to me.

My mother's health, always delicate, now began to fail rapidly, and I read in her careworn features the ravages of consumption, and felt that her sands of life were nearly run. I was my mother's favorite child, and to me she was my earthly idol; and now, since my bitter disappointment, her constant but silent sympathy was my greatest consolation. When I felt that the wings of death were fanning her brow, I clasped my love for her more closely to my heart, and never left her to any one's care, but nursed her constantly, and this was a good reason for my retiring from society, consequently I never met Doctor Wilmer after receiving his note bidding me farewell.

Just five weeks after the breaking of our engagement, he was quietly, and unexpectedly by all their acquaintances, married to Josephine Grey. When they told me of this marriage, I felt that the last sod had fallen on the grave of my happiness.

Doctor Wilmer and his bride left immediately after the marriage ceremony was over, on a bridal tour, and I felt glad to know that I would have sufficient time to learn self-control before their return, and prepare myself to meet my two false ones. They were absent a little over three months on their "tour," and when they returned, my mother's rapidly failing health prevented me from going into society at all, but I heard frequently of them, and of Josephine's grand entertainments. Shortly after the Wilmers' return to their home, the greatest grief and sorrow of my life came to me in the death of my beloved mother. Oh, those long days of anguish and despair that followed my saintly mother's death! It seemed as if there was not one ray of light left for me in life, for at that time I had not learned to seek for guidance and consolation from that Being who has said, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." It was three years after my troubles came that the lamp of religion burned for me, and though I was late in seeking its comforting powers, since it has been lit in my heart, I have not felt so lonely and desolate.

Josephine Wilmer did not live long to revel in her falsely acquired wealth, for when she had been a wife of only six months, she and her husband were going to visit some relatives in a northern city, when one of those dreadful railroad accidents occurred, which terminated Doctor Wilmer's life almost instantly. The only words he ever said after that accident, were, "Tell Minnie that I died loving her to the last, and praying for her forgiveness for the wrong I did her."

Josephine's injuries were fatal also, but she lingered almost two weeks after that dreadful catastrophe. She sent an imploring request to me to come to her before she died, and some secret power urged me to comply with her wishes. So I went to her as she lay upon her death-bed, and it was then she confessed the cruel wrong she had done me by telling Doctor Wilmer that I had long, but secretly, loved my cousin Willie Wilde, and had never revealed the fact to any one save herself and Willie; but that since Willie was too poor for us to marry, I had accepted Doctor Wilmer's proposition, never intending to consummate our engagement had I not had a new impetus added to my motive by the fortune bequeathed him by his uncle. Josephine managed in a most skilful manner to undermine all his trust and confidence in me, and when he demanded proofs of my falsehood to him, she treacherously forged them, and they answered her ends well, for, in his anger at my apparent falsehood, he wrote me that cruel note, and then offered the shattered remnants of his (as he thought) deceived love to Josephine Grey. Thus she accomplished her twofold purpose, by forever separating us, and making herself mistress of the house that Doctor Wilmer had commenced erecting for me.

"Doctor Wilmer and I did not live happily together, Minerva," Josephine said, "for we never loved each other. He knew that I had married him for his money, and one day taunted me with the knowledge, when I, in a moment of anger, confessed the truth about the way in which I had deceived him in regard to you. This occurred only two days before his death, and after I acknowledged that fact to him, he seemed a changed man, and I do not think he was sorry to die. I could not die in peace, Minerva, until I had cleared the memory of the dead from all intention of wrong towards you, and with the approach of death, came also the yearning for your forgiveness."

I told her that I hoped I spoke the truth when I said that "I forgive you," and then rushed from the room, fearing the wild thoughts that were surging up in my heart would find expression, and make wretched the dying hours of that wicked woman.

Since that time I have never felt the least unkindness towards the memory of Doctor Wilmer, but have sorrowed for him more than the woman he called his wife could ever have done had she survived him. She lived only a few hours after her confession to me.

Other suitors asked for my hand, but I had one answer for them all, and that was, that I could never give my heart away again, and consequently would never marry. Now I look forward to that blessed time when God shall call me hence, and I shall be reunited in heaven with the one who was separated from me on earth by treachery, falsehood, and deceit.

Now you have my heart's history, and in conclusion let me add: Take warning by my experience, and never let a life-time happiness be wrenched from your grasp without an effort to detain it, for when that cruel note reached me, if I had only asked an explanation, perhaps my heart's anguish and life-time sorrow might have been averted, and I been a loved and loving wife, instead of an unloved and lonely "Old Maid."

TO W. F. COOKE.

BY FAITH DERECK.

Farewell! If human love could win
A blessing that would prove most sweet,
If prayer and tears could purchase it,
I'd lay it at thy feet.

Farewell! we may not meet again;
Indeed, I feel 'tis best we part,
For thou, alas! didst never know
The worth of my true heart.

Life had been sweet, a boon too dear,
If thou hadst treasured, fond and well,
The lonely one, whose latest prayer
Is this sad parting knell.

God keep thee, guard thee, save from ill;
Be unto thee a tender friend,
Who never, never will forsake
Until thy life shall end.

Ah! cannot language teach some tone
With which to weave a parting spell;
O'er ruined hopes, a broken heart,
No language fails. Farewell! Farewell!

GODEY'S COURSE OF LESSONS IN DRAWING.

LESSON XVI.

By the combination of horizontal with vertigiven in Fig. 11; also an elevation of their sides; and let the distance between them be equal to one of their sides. With the width of the base, on the base-line, draw by preceding rules three square horizontal planes, representing the bases of the three pillars, and shade them for the sake of distinctness. On the base cal planes, we arrive at the perspective delineations of rectangular solids. Let it be desired to show in perspective a row of three square pillars of equal size, a plan of their bases being

Fig. 11.

Fig. 12.

A B erect perpendiculars A E, B C, equal to f i, g h, which connect at the top by E C parallel to A B. Draw visual lines S E, S C; at the points 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, erect perpendiculars parallel to B C, meeting the visual line S C; and from their intersections with that line, draw lines to S E parallel to E C. These lines, in connection with the visual lines S E, S C, will denote the horizontal planes forming the tops of the pillars; and the perpendiculars B C, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, in connection with the visual lines S C, S B, will denote the vertical planes, forming the sides of the pillars.

The same rule will apply to the forms of houses, boxes, and numerous other objects, whose external shapes may be considered as simple rectangular solids. On observing an object with a view to its perspective representation, the student should consider what geometrical figure it most resembles, and treat it accordingly. As he may now be supposed to have become sufficiently familiar with the parallel perspective of squares and rectangular figures, he may, therefore, proceed to that of other regular figures; and will first be introduced to the circle.

Every circle may be inscribed in a square (Fig. 12), touching it at four points, 1, 3, 5, 7, of the circumference, and cutting its diagonals at four other points, 2, 4, 6, 8; and if the perspective positions of these eight points be found, a moderate proficiency in drawing and command of hand will enable the learner to draw such a figure through them as shall represent the perspective circle. These points are found by the method shown in Fig. 12, and called "squaring the circle." The diagonals 2 6 and 8 4 are drawn on the plan, and also the diameters 1 5 and 3 7. The two lines 4 6 and 2 8 are also to be drawn through the points at which the circle intersects the diagonals; and the square with its lines may now be put into perspective by preceding rules, by which means the perspective positions of the points 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, through which the circle must pass, will be found at the intersections of the corresponding lines. The squares, diagonals, diameters, and other lines, being only drawn in order to obtain by their assistance the points 1, 2, 3, etc., may be obliterated as soon as the perspective circle is inked in. The above eight points will, in drawings of ordinary size, be sufficient guide to the hand in drawing circles; but for circles of very large dimensions, the principles may be extended, and twice the number of points easily found by doubling the number of cross-lines, 2, 8, 4, 6.

ing of the arch; draw the visual lines $S a$, $S b$, $S c$, and the others denoting the top and bottom lines of the viaduct. To ascertain the perspective point representing the top of each arch, draw the diagonals $e d$, $c f$; their intersections will be the perspective centre of the vertical plane $c d$, $f e$, through which $g h$, drawn parallel to the side of the picture, will cut the visual line $S a$ at the top of the arch. Produce the two sides of the rectangle $c d f e$, to meet the line $S a$ at i and k . Draw the lines $i o$, $k o$, intersecting $S b$ at 2 and 4. The perspective semicircle may now be drawn through the points 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, thus obtained. Proceed in the same manner with each of the arches, using the same visual lines $S a$, $S b$, $S c$, by which, with the aid of similar diagonals, they may all be completed.

Gothic arches of pointed form may be drawn in perspective by the same rule, varied only to suit the change in their form. The object of squaring the semicircle in the last figure was to

The last figure gives the perspective circle in a horizontal plane; the same rule applies to its projection on a vertical plane, with this difference only: that in the latter case it must be squared against the side of the picture, instead of against the base-line (Fig. 13). This rule being highly useful in drawing bridges and viaducts with semicircular arches, an example is given, with a description of the process. The arches in the annexed viaduct being semicircular, the upper part only of the circle is to be squared by diagonals, diameters, and cross-line, as in Fig. 12, by which means five points in the semicircle are obtained. Find the perspective lengths of the arches and piers by settling off the real lengths on the base-line, and drawing diagonals to the distance-point intersecting the visual line $S D$. At the intersections erect perpendiculars to the base-line denoting the piers. At the side of the picture set off $d c$, the height of the piers to the spring-obtain certain points of its outline, which, drawn in their perspective positions, would guide the hand in forming the perspective outline; and points in any other curve will, in like manner, denote the perspective outline of such curve. In Fig. 14 the elevation of the arch is drawn against the side of the picture, as before, and points are found in its outline by a similar process. First join the two lower corners by a line $a b$; draw the diagonals $a c$, $b d$; from that intersection draw $e f$, passing through the centre of $a b$ at g . Draw $f a$, $f b$; divide each of them into three parts, and through each division draw lines from a and b to the opposite side of the arch; seven points, $a k l f n m b$, will thus be found. Produce $l m$ and $k n$ to the side of the picture. From the points thus obtained at that side, draw visual lines to the point of sight; find, as before, the perspective point, f , of each arch by diagonals; draw the perspective lines $f a$, $f b$; divide each of them into three parts; through the divisions draw lines from g, intersecting the visual lines at points which will denote the perspective curves. ✓

WEDDINGS.

THERE are all sorts of weddings and marriages; it would take many pages to register them; from the marriage of true minds to that of a couple of money bags. Sometimes the bride and bridegroom are two masked figures, tricked up and disguised, so that it would be hard to say which is the most deceived in the other. Sometimes it is a living creature united to a shadow. Have you ever known a man married to a doll? He chose her out and paid for her. What a sweet face it is! What high-bred calm! And then, again, come the happy lovers two and two; as they pass before the high altars, the long white veils of the brides sweep along the gray aisles of the churches; their happiness lightens up the faces looking on. Then, perhaps, some blooming young girl comes up, bringing a crutch and a bronchial wheeze; and it now and then happens that a youth appears, leading a wig of false plaits, a set of artificial teeth, and half a century of bones to the altar. The disparity is not so great as you might imagine. There may be a heart beating still beneath all these adjustments, while the bridegroom, for all his youth and good looks, has not one single drop of warm blood in his body. So bad, good, and indifferent, they pass their way. Sometimes it is Peace and Goodwill who go by hand in hand.

What does it matter if Goodwill's beard is grizzled, and Peace has crow's feet round about her loving eyes? Sometimes it is Pride and Vainglory that go sweeping past down the long church, out into the churchyard beyond. They are a fine-looking couple as they sail along, and they look to see their reflection in the eyes of the bystanders. Sometimes—and this is no very strange phenomenon—it is only the past of one of the contracting parties that is united to the present of the other. They find it out too late.

THE SECRET.

BY ANNA CLEAVER.

What is this my heart doth say,
Whisp'ring, whisp'ring all the day,
Words as sweet as minstrel lay?

What fond secret would it tell,
With its sweet, bewitching spell?
Ah! I know the secret well.

What is this the zephyrs say,
As amid the flowers they stray,
Strewing rose leaves on my way?

Kissing oft the plain gold ring
On my finger, as I sing,
Oh! the precious, priceless thing?

What is this the sunbeams say,
As around my feet they play,
Lighting all my dreary way?

Ah! we know, my heart and I,
For love's brightest roseate dye
Colors all our earth and sky.

LONG AGO.

BY MRS. HOPKINSON.

GENERAL REUBEN ELLIS had no idea corresponding to an English country house when he bought two thousand acres of land in Walton, and prepared to settle on it and to bring up a family. Like all settlers, he regarded trees as twofold enemies, and, therefore, to be cut down without mercy. They were the haunts of savages, human or bestial, and they were barriers to that universal civilizer and health-giver, the sunshine. So the first thing done was the cutting away the death shadows of mighty pines and great oaks from a rise of land that was almost a hill, and the next, to place a log-house on the highest point of rock. Then he built dwellings, many, large, and convenient, both for brutes and for substance. Barns, cowhouses, sheepfolds, and cornhouses. These were spacious and roomy. But the farm-house itself was no larger for its inmates than a nest is for the young ones of the bird. The family must needs have stifled, stowed away so thickly at night, but for the wholesome cracks and crannies through which the pure air whistled in the winter, to say nothing of the snow-banks that often penetrated into the big garret through the end windows, and lay lightly on the bed-covers of the sleepers. In summer, of course, the air came freely in from both door and window. Never during the general's life would he demean himself by sleeping behind a locked door, insisting it was the way to make thieves.

Mrs. Ellis loved to tell, and Ruth to hear, of the one fearful adventure that had nearly happened from this over-confidence in humanity. In telling it, she always chose a bright winter evening, when the blaze lighted up every nook and corner in the kitchen, where any listening robber could lurk and hear such a story of himself.

It was a dreadful story, and would make anybody jump that had a fancy for sound sleep. It happened the week after they moved into the new house, and this robber of Mrs. Ellis's was a wayfarer whom they had, according to their hospitable custom, taken in, fed, and comforted. Think, then, how disagreeably startled for her to open her eyes in the dead waste and middle of the night, and find the traveller leaning over the bed, shading the candle with one hand, and actually looking at her! Then, the impossibility of waking the general, who slept like the enchanted princess. It was horrible, this utter helplessness under this mysterious look. To be sure, the robber muttered something about a toothache, and Mrs. Ellis told him to look on the shelf for a phial of laudanum, when he withdrew. But could Mrs. Ellis, or anybody else, ever expect to sleep under such suspicious circumstances?

Mrs. Ellis did try, and did sleep, and did waken. She woke to see the same face bending over her again, and looking at her again. This time she awakened the general somehow, perhaps by pinching him, and the traveller had to tell another story to account for his being where he was; he called it sleep-walking. But he went back to bed, and the general went out into the barn, where he found the traveller's horse, or perhaps one of his own, all saddled and bridled, and ready for flight. In the desk were all the family papers, deeds of the estate, and whatever money the general kept with him. So it was a mercy they were not all robbed and murdered in their beds. The moral of this story is, that General Ellis continued to sleep with open doors; and when, long after, a bag was brought to him holding ten thousand dollars in gold, which belonged to a bank somewhere, and he was requested to take charge of it for one night, what does he do but put the bag into a closet under the stairway, and sleep as soundly as ever, with the doors wide open, telling Mrs. Ellis, when she timidly suggested more caution, that if he shut his doors that night, every thief in the county would suspect he had something to steal.

After years had passed over the Ellis farm, and changed the forests into wide clearings, broad meadows, and fields of waving grain; after the deep solitudes had been succeeded by a thriving and busy community, and the township of Walton had a point of common interest called the Four Corners, General Ellis enlarged and improved even the new dwelling, and added another story, as befitted his increased wealth and importance, but at this time there were only three rooms below, and a long garret above. One of the three was a spacious kitchen, which extended through the whole house at the back, leaving the other two for bedrooms and sitting-rooms. In the kitchen, all the family gathered of an evening in the winter. In the summer, they all went to rest with the sun, so weary were they with the day's labor. The evening kitchen fire in the winter was a noble piece of furniture, glorifying all around, from the burnished pewter pans to the shining human faces, and inciting to cheerful reminiscences, as well as hopeful prognostications. Here were gathered, on one platform, the employer and the employed. The six hired men of the summer dwindled into two in the winter, and with Earl Hyde, the school-master, and Phil Forbes, from the Red Tavern, formed a pleasant addition to the family party. For the benefit of any modern reader, the winter fire shall be briefly described, and it can then be seen why and how it was the cheerfulness, briskest sight in the world, as much more stirring to the spirits and the tongue than to-day's contrivances for warmth, as its own ascending columns of flame and smoke exceeded in interest the motionless glare of anthracite, or the "social hole" in a modern parlor. In the kitchen chimney were struggle and triumph. In the construction of the fire there was evidence of massive strength of material, both animal and vegetable; for no pigmy hands could have rolled in that back-log, full two feet in diameter, with its back-stick a-top fiercely charred to a red coal by the day's burning, and the fore-stick half as large, and lying across the iron dogs that support four or five great sticks of oak or walnut. Mrs. Ellis sweeps up the broad stone hearth for the fiftieth time, and this time she places before the hot fire a half-loaf of rye and Indian bread. She knows the general's taste, and that he thinks nobody can prepare his evening meal like his woman. To him she is the woman of all the world, though he never speaks to her except as Miss Ellis, and then very briefly. But she knows how to toast the brown bread to a delicious crispness, peeling it off from the loaf as one would an orange, and dropping it in large appetizing flakes into the thick rich milk. And she couldn't do this so well if she did not perfectly understand and sympathize with him. So she does, and there is no more need of talk between the two than there was when they were lovers. That was such a long time ago! When he was a soldier, and walking on the walls of the fort, saw her, a sixteen year old girl, looking just as Ruth does now, and said to himself then, "That girl shall be my wife," and, of course, in time she was. When a person determines on a certain action, it is generally his own fault if he does not succeed.

Of the two young men already mentioned, an observer might have thought Earl Hyde and Phil Forbes had both determined on their course of action, but from the nature of things it was not likely that both could succeed.

Earl Hyde was a young gentleman from Boston, and a student of Harvard, who had been engaged with fear and trembling by the school committee, at the recommendation of the college President, to teach the town school in Walton. The committee had found no literary deficiency in the young fellow, but his extremely delicate appearance caused great doubts of his physical ability to fill the place. In algebra, geography, and spelling, he seemed adequate to all emergencies; how he would manage in a contest with Jack Higgins was quite another matter. In less than a week from Master Hyde's installation, however, he showed himself master of the situation. The very first day, and on the first symptom of insubordination, he quietly took up a heavy chair by one leg, and holding it aloft by sheer force of muscle in his right arm, carried it down the aisle between the desks, and after standing on it to drive a nail into the wall over the door, returned it to its place in the same muscular way. Every eye in the crowded school room was on him, and every mouth was open with astonishment. The next day came the contest with Jack Higgins. The school expected it. Last winter, Jack Higgins had headed the procession which took the school-master out of town on a rail.

The school went on fairly enough for two hours in the morning. Every appearance of insubordination in the young scholars being met with cold surprise from the calm blue eye of the master, and his gentle tones somehow inducting a corresponding gentleness on the part of the scholars. All felt, however, that insubordination was scotched and not killed. Not killed, as long as Jack, heavy Jack, brutal Jack, ignorant Jack, fighting Jack Higgins was in the school, for had he not publicly asserted that he would not only not mind the master, but that he would put him out of the school? It was difficult to make a quarrel with a man who did not notice him, and Jack was obliged to begin offensive operations himself. He began, therefore, by walking out from his seat at the back of the room, and placing himself in a defiant attitude in front of the master.

"Take your seat, or leave the school," said the master, in cold, gentle tones.

"I won't take my seat, and I won't leave the school! You come out here and I'll put you out!" roared Jack Higgins.

Earl Hyde was a lamb-like looking youth, with a pink and white face, light hair, and a form which, though tall, was so lithe and supple that it would seem an easy matter to toss him over a fence any time. So, at least, Jack thought, as his roar changed in the end more into contempt than rage. Nevertheless, the young master only walked calmly out into the aisle, between the long rows of expectant faces, and uttered the monosyllable, "Try."

At his very first onset, Jack was met by a scientific blow, which laid him out on the school-room floor a stunned giant.

"Take him out, some of you," said Mr. Hyde.

Forty Lilliputians laid hold of Gulliver and dragged him outside.

"Now to your seats and your lessons."

Earl Hyde saw Jack Higgins from the school house window slowly walking off. But when the school was over, and while the master remained to look over lessons and sums, the door softly opened and the giant reappeared. He had dismissed his swagger, and really seemed an inoffensive and extremely curious beast. He walked up the aisle to the desk where Hyde sat impassive, and said, scratching his bushy head:—

"Master!"

"Well?" said Mr. Hyde, coldly.

"Du tell heouw ye did it! I swan! if ye'll larn me that, I'll promise to larn all the rest, and never give you no more trouble! Come, don't be put out!"

"Is it a bargain, Jack? You're upon honor, you know. If you mean to stand to your word, give me your hand."

Jack delightedly stood to his word, and from that moment never ceased his open-mouthed admiration of the schoolmaster. To the rest of the school, the fall of Jack Higgins was as wonderful and supernatural as if he had been touched by an angelic spear, so sudden was the demon's tumble, and so lightly and Gabriel-like had stood the slender Earl, whose unerring hand sent the blow.

After that encounter there was never any need of a harsh word in the school. Here was a born commander, and both scholars and committee made haste to show their sense of his value. The same qualities made him influential in society, for Walton had a society. But he was not popular, nor was he much liked. If a question were asked him, he paused before he answered, and that gave him a double advantage, which people feel as an injury, without knowing why. He had time to think what to say, but the speakers also had time to hear the echo of their own words, which, being spontaneous and unstudied, often did not please them at the rebound, and oppressed them with a sense of unfairness in the game of conversation. Then he was a perfect sponge in talking, making people talk of themselves and their own affairs, and so learning, in a short time, everything about every body in Walton, while no one knew anything about Earl Hyde, except that all the Hydes were Tories.

Walton had a society. It was gathered from far and near, to be sure; but, as every man owned at least one horse, and poor, indeed, must a family be who had not a wagon or cart, distance was annihilated as effectually as it is now in railroad days. When Earl Hyde first came to Walton, he had wondered, as well he might, where his scholars were to come from, for not a house was in sight of Parson Pratt's, where he boarded. However, they did come, as parson said they would, as inevitably, as abundantly, and as mysteriously as the travelling juggler's eggs out of his tightly-fitting sleeve.

"Ye better make parson agree not to give ye salmon for dinner more 'n four times a week," the laughing mail-carrier had said to him, just before he lifted out the trunk of the master from the only public conveyance that Walton boasted. And Earl learned very soon that the broad Connecticut poured her fiscal bounties into Walton laps in such profusion that it was made an article of agreement in the hire of labor to have salmon for dinner "only so often." However, Parson Pratt was a reasonable being as well as a stern theologian; also he knew well what a good mug of flip was. He enjoyed shouldering his Harvard crutch, and showing how honors were won in his day, and comparing the present degenerate times with his own.

The evening hours, sometimes varied with a checker-board, went placidly, if not merrily, over the head of this man, who had been educated in all the learning of the Rabbis, only to pour out weekly commonplaces and platitudes to a congregation quite too weary with week-day work to listen to him. "It was good to stir up old memories even with this stick of a collegian," he thought.

"How do you exist here, sir?" said the youth, after one of these talks.

"I have come, Mr. Hyde, to feel that men are better than books, and the ordering of daily conduct the best study of the humanities. Besides, this place, that to you seems so empty and lonely, is crammed full of originals that are excessively interesting to me. Separated from all the assimilating influences of social life, each man ripens his own personality of character, and even appearance, independent of his neighbor, and each wears outwardly the sign of the inward man. This makes Walton a gallery of living pictures; all suggestive to me, who know them, of a certain course of experience, of which I have also knowledge and sympathy. I live a hundred lives in Walton, where I used to live one in Cambridge."

Still, Mr. Hyde, being but a youngster, pitied the old minister, and longed for the day when he should get back to civilized life, and put on his intellectual harness once more. Parson Pratt did not pity Mr. Hyde, but saw in him the stuff to make a distinguished man of, some day or other; and he saw also many traits which would mellow with experience and the pommelling all get in time. Mr. Hyde never talked any at table, nor ever with Mrs. Pratt, but he listened well, especially to any accounts of General Ellis's family. Mrs. Pratt often spoke of Ruth Ellis, and said it was expected that Ruth and Phil Forbes would make a match. At the Dorr huskings, Phil had given her the red ear. General Ellis was well to do, and Phil was a forehanded fellow. It was said that the general could give Ruth five hundred dollars clean, and not feel it. Mr. Hyde's delicate face often suffused and lightened under these interesting disquisitions. Perhaps he too began to comprehend that persons are good in their way as well as books. But he said nothing, and only fixed his handsome blue eyes on the slices of salt pork, which, swimming in a sea of their own fat, alternated with pickled salmon at their pleasant breakfast-table.

Earl felt that he had been warned about Ruth, but a young man of nineteen finds it very natural to occupy his leisure with such ideas as filled Earl Hyde's brain, as from Sabbath to Sabbath he had occasion to look at General Ellis's pew. It kept him awake more effectually than hartshorne to glance over across the high railings, where, demure in her Sunday's best, Ruth bent her hazel eyes on the hymn-book, or raised them from time to time as Parson Pratt droned on to the "seventeenthly" of his lengthened discourse. Why Parson Pratt persisted in reading such long sermons, when his flock were all asleep, it is impossible to guess. Perhaps for the same reason that some people will tell over old stories, though assured that the facts are familiar. Perhaps he knew that the town wanted its money's worth.

One night Earl Hyde had played on his flute under Ruth's window. And one day he had given her some verses from Thomson's "Seasons," like these:—

"Without the smile from sparkling beauty won, Oh! what were man? A world without a sun."

Ruth said, when she read it: "My! what pretty poetry!" They were pretty lips that said so.

Earl wandered out on one of the warm Indian summer afternoons to enjoy the hazy landscape and the wide loneliness of the Putney road. He knew he could let himself go on for miles without being lost, and that the right-hand turn would bring him back into Walton. So he walked dreamingly on, talking to himself, sometimes aloud, that he might see how well his thoughts sounded. He had been thinking how different Walton was from Boston, and how character seemed here to be in the ore, and sometimes very rich ore, too. The daily talk was of oxen, to be sure, and yet he could not help feeling that in men like Josh Hubbard and General Ellis, under all their roughness and coarseness, was the sturdy strength of principle on which a republic could thrive. They cared not for what other men thought of them; they were a law unto themselves, and gave laws and steady support to the weak-minded. They were not open to corrupt influences, like citizens whose interests rub against each other till they become too burnished to reflect anything but what is good for themselves. And here Earl got into a muddle of figures, and stopped uttering to himself aloud. Indeed, when he began thinking of Ruth Ellis, he was always quiet.

The night shadows fell one after another down before his eyes, unheeded by him. His tall, spare figure and slightly-bent head was the only living thing in motion; for the herds were long ago gathered into their several folds, and silence brooded over the great meadows and the still, flowing river. Without knowing it, Earl had come within forty rods of the Ellis farm, passing close to a ruined out-building which had once belonged to the first log-hut, before the new house was built. He stepped so lightly that his tread did not disturb a person who stood on the farther side of the ruin, and whose low voice Earl distinctly heard. His heart stopped as well as his foot, for there was no mistaking Ruth's voice. But, then, "What did she here?" was, of course, the obvious and foremost question.

Stepping cautiously forward, and hiding behind a pile of logs and old boards, he listened for the sound of her companion's voice. He did not care what the two said, only he wanted to be sure who it was. And, besides, Earl had the chivalric sense of honor which belonged to an army officer's son. He did not think of listening, nor mean to listen to a conversation. To one soft, musical, mysterious voice he listened eagerly, intently.

"I wind, I wind,
My true love for to find,"

said this voice.

Leaning forward, he saw Ruth's form indistinctly through the gathering darkness. She was quite alone, and winding on a ball of yarn, the other end of the thread being in the cellar of the old building. She continued to wind on, softly repeating the words as a spell, without any trembling of the voice, and quite unconscious of the neighborhood of the listener. As the last thread was wound on, the maiden turned her face to the full moon, which rose from the horizon, and flooded the valley with light. Earl stepped forward then, and said, in his usual quiet tones:—

"What Runic rhyme are you spelling, fair maid?"

Ruth gave a little shriek of surprise. Whether real or affected did not appear, nor whether he happened to be in her thoughts at that moment.

"Oh! how did you come here? Why, you stepped as still as a ghost. How did you happen?"

"The fates must have sent me, I think, miss. It certainly was not myself, for I was perfectly unconscious of my whereabouts until a minute or two ago. But you have not answered me my question about your incantations, and I am very curious. Have mercy on me, I beg of you."

"Don't ask me. It is nothing but a silly superstition about—about the full moon."

She turned her head bashfully away from his eager gaze, and by the bright moonlight Earl saw the crimson that flushed over her throat.

"I must go home," she said, hastily. "I hear the horn sound for supper."

"Let me go with you as far as the door," said Earl, in the same quiet voice, though his head was dizzy looking into her lovely moonlighted eyes. "I shall not go in, to vex your father. But are you not afraid to be out here alone?"

"Afraid! Of what?" said Ruth, surprised.

"Of everything!" replied the young man, drawing her arm into his, with the sweet sense of protection that is one of the foremost elements in a man's love. "Of cattle, wild Indians, wild beasts—everything?"

"Good gracious!" said Ruth. "Why, there hasn't been a bear about the place these five years, and there's nothing else I am ever afraid of, but rattlesnakes. Indians! They're the quietest creatures in the world; they won't hurt you, bless your soul!"

She turned her face full towards Earl with such a conviction written in it that he needed her assurance of safety from these unknown dangers, especially savage ones, that the young man burst into a hearty laugh.

"I assure you, Miss Ruth, that I have not the smallest fear of an attack from any wild beast, from an Indian to an alligator; but I did think it quite possible that you might not be able to defend yourself from such a danger."

"My grandmother defended her house against the wild Indians," said Ruth, proudly, "and I have some of her blood."

"On the other hand, did you not tell me that you were always frightened at the sound and sight of a gun?" said Earl.

"Yes, I did. And I am. But I can't be expected to go walking about with a gun. I think I have fight in me, for all that, and I should seize on whatever came first. However, all this is nonsense. The Indians are as quiet." She turned again towards him her assuring face, but this time he did not laugh. He was irritated. He wished that he looked more like a buffalo and less like a lamb.

"What a blind, unjust thing a woman always is!" said he to himself.

They were very near the house now, and Mrs. Ellis stood on the kitchen door-stone, looking for Ruth. Earl bowed formally to Mrs. Ellis and Ruth, and went his way.

"I do wonder what makes your father hate the sight of the master so," said Mrs. Ellis, musingly, as she gazed after the erect, springy figure going down the road. "He has desperately fine, pretty manners; I always think of Sir Charles Grandison when I see him."

"He looked dazed-like when he said good-by," said Ruth. "Father hates all Tories, anyhow, mother. But I think he has something of the same feeling that I have about Earl Hyde. If once he puts his mind on a thing, he will have it, and he will do it. I suppose father's afraid of—but he needn't be."

Mrs. Ellis looked quickly at Ruth without speaking. She had read Earl's eyes, but not her own child's.

"Mother, do you believe in rolling a ball? You know what I mean—the trick."

"I can't tell ye, child. Sometimes I do, and oftener I don't. They do say if you go down cellar with the looking-glass at midnight, you'll see the man you've to hev; but I never tried it," added Mrs. Ellis, with a little laugh, "because I was suited, and didn't want to inquire further. Why?"

"Oh, nothing! Tricks are nothing but nonsense. I've tried a dozen, and ne'er a one come right. Here comes father and the rest." She shot into the house and up stairs, from which she did not come down again, until Phil Forbes had gone to the Four Corners. She was quite certain of his absence, having watched him spring upon Trotter, and gallop till the hill hid him from sight. Then she heard Persis Flint tell fortunes from tea-grounds, and the day for her was done.

Earl mistook the nature of the bright blush on Ruth's cheek. She was not thinking of him, but of something and somebody else. It is a pity, but a great deal of good material is always wasted in making up characters, and Earl wasted many heart-throbbings as he retraced his way from the Ellis farm to the turn-pike.

While he was making that farewell bow, so gracious and graceful, and so like Sir Charles, a strange thing happened to Earl. It was a vision, only a second long, but vivid and complete; and for the instant that it occurred his brain obliterated the forms of Ruth and her mother, and gave his face the unseeing expression which Ruth remarked.

As if he had received a slight blow on the side of his head, which changed the position of the atoms there, there slid before his eyes a certain parlor in a house in Boston, in the then fashionable quarter called the North End. Every part of this high-studded, deep-corniced room was familiar to him from childhood, from the faded crimson window-drapery to the tiled chimney slabs and the brass andirons three feet high, which glanced at each other in the light of a wood-fire. On the faded Turkey carpet sat an erect, spare, pale man, who spread out his old, thin hands to catch the warmth of the blaze. His powdered hair was tied with a black ribbon at the back, and his aspect showed him to be one of that perennial band called gentlemen of the old school. It is to be presumed that he was not stiff and tiresome, since a young lady stood smiling at him, and looking highly interested. She had heavy-lidded eyes and flaxen hair, with eyebrows of a darker hue. Dressed in the rich fashion of the period, which, among the English and Tories in America, still clung to brocades and paduasoy, and despised the classic draperies introduced by a loose democracy in France, Lillian Devereux would have been well placed in the picture to which she was pointing, and which was a family group by Copley. Her satin dress was as shining as the painter's own, her velvet as rich, her jewels as sparkling; while her flesh and blood, though of the palest, was much more real looking than his. She was saying something of this critical sort to the cold old gentleman, and he had answered her, "Yes, yes!" as people do when they mean "No, no!" for he thought a Copley quite superior to a reality.

Earl looked at the snowy arm and slender fingers that pointed to the pictured group, and curiously scanned the falling lace from the sleeve, and the soft shadow of it on her arm. He knew, without looking, that she pointed to his own boyish portrait, leaning against the lap of the stately lady in red, and with her powdered head turned proudly away in a two-thirds view. Also he knew, without seeing, that the youngish looking man in the picture, with bluish-white silk legs crossed, and a military undress costume, was the oldish looking man here present; only he knew very well that, whatever change might be in the outside, the interior man was precisely the same as then, having, indeed, been fossilized at the age of twenty-one. Earl heard his father's answer to something Lillian had said. It was this:—

"I have no fear that my son will be led into any acts or opinions unworthy of his name."

Then Earl knew, of course, that they were discussing the possibility of his getting into a country entanglement, and that they had been reading his last letter, which, indeed, lay on the mantel-piece, by the foot of one of the three-branched silver candlesticks.

Then Earl remembered what his father had told him so often, and which, in Walton, he had fairly forgotten, that he was a lineal descendant of a brother of Anna Hyde; of Anne Hyde, the queen; of the daughter of the great Earl; of Anne Hyde, whose children sat on thrones which crumbled away beneath them, and buried all of that blood in the ruin. Of course, no mention was made in this retrospect of dead glories of any ancestral washerwoman. Anne Hyde herself ignored her grandmother, and Earl never would have known about it but for Parson Pratt's library, where he found the story. Something, it might have been this atom of association, displaced the picture in Earl's brain; the Turkey carpet, the tiles, the old Copley, even pale, tender Lillian Devereux faded out, and, as he looked about himself, he found he had not yet completed his bow, and so had not lost time in his daze.

Pondering on the singular optical illusion which, for a moment, had occupied his brain, and had so vividly reproduced the past, Earl found himself irresistibly impelled in one mental direction. Taking Lillian as she looked in his momentary dream, he ranged the two girls side by side in his waking fancy. They were as unlike each other, he thought, as a flowering lily-branch is unlike a luscious peach. How faded seemed that water-colored shadow of a high civilization compared to the glowing richness and deep tone of this redundant nature! All his own lacks cried out to this bounteousness of free thought and action, which might help him to fulfil the high possibilities of his being without the cramp and obstacles of a civilized conventionalism. These conventionalisms as pronounced, and inevitable as the street pavements, his father's intense conservatism, the close air of his ideas, his obstinate clinging to the dead past, regardless of the new world of thoughts that were springing continually from below its tombstone; the family alliance, projected from childhood, and which was to fill the Hyde purse with Devereux gold—all these thoughts, reminiscences, and aspirations oppressed and almost suffocated Earl. He sprang over the low stone wall that marked and bordered the turnpike road, and, running all the way across the great meadows, found Parson Pratt tranquilly reading Sir Thomas Browne.

Earl sat with him, silent, and refreshed by the contact.

"What do you think of unequal marriages?" said Mr. Hyde to Parson Pratt, a few days after the waking dream he had had.

"I should ask you what you mean by unequal."

"Unlike, perhaps, I ought to say. Between persons whose education and associations are entirely different."

Parson Pratt took the tongs, and laid the brands straight on the iron fire-dogs. Without glancing at Mr. Hyde's face, which was of a delicate crimson, he spoke, meditatively and moderately:—

"I should say they are to be avoided."

"But don't you think, sir, that a discrepancy of temper and disposition should be more avoidable than one merely of circumstances or manners?"

"Oh, yes!"

Mr. Hyde thought of Mrs. Pratt, and wondered for the thousandth time why her husband had married her, and whether it was possible he ever loved her. Mrs. Pratt was cross-eyed, freckled, a little deaf, and not fond of books.

To show how little one person can judge for another in matters of the heart, nay, in appreciation of the intellect and character, it is enough to lift the cover of Parson Pratt's Diary, which, in common with other wise men of his day, he kept faithfully. In it were all the interesting items of the parish and farm, for, of course, the parson was expected to work on a farm, to eke out his living. Just after the account of the weekly "payment of one and sixpence to Betty Price for housework and spinning," came these words within brackets: ["Her voice is ever soft and low, an excellent thing in woman. Her fingers are quick at needle-work, and nimble in all a housewife's cunning. She is slow of heart to understand mischief, but her feet run swift to do good. And she is simple with the simplicity of girlhood, and wise with the wisdom that cometh only of the Lord—cometh only to the children of the kingdom. S. P."]

To be sure, this bit of sentiment was sandwiched in between Betty Price and "pig-killing on the 24th," but it showed that the thought of his wife and helpmeet mingled sweetly in all the details of his everyday life; that to him she was much. Besides this, if Mr. Hyde had only known it, she was not deaf when she was married, and Parson Pratt chose her rather than her sister, who was unfreckled and straight-eyed. Partly it was suitableness. She fitted his needs and his faults, he said. She was patient and ready, and complemented with her good sense and discretion all the deficiencies in his parochial career. He it was who originally made that often-quoted epigram, that he "wanted a wife and not a colleague." Mr. Hyde was still young, and did not know that people get to doing without love, in his sense of the word; life being so supplemented and crowded even with duties and occupations that many men never stop to think how they feel, and take their own sentiments as well as principles for granted. It is a good and healthy mental condition when daily habit has thus fossilized into character, and when impulses are to be depended on, having been rooted and founded on principle so long that introspection is not necessary to verify their purity.

"Don't you think women very easily take on themselves a certain polish, if circumstances make it necessary, so that they are able to suit themselves to an entirely different condition of life?" pursued Earl Hyde, with ill-dissembled eagerness.

"To some extent, yes. I should say, however, that would only apply to manners, not much to feelings or opinions. There must always in such cases be a discrepancy, an inharmoniousness. It depends on how great the difference is in station and opportunity. Our Mrs. Abigail Adams, country-born and bred, is doing us all credit at the English Court."

They were silent for a few minutes. Mrs. Pratt brought in some boiled chestnuts, and they grew into personal talk.

"You came to Walton partly for your health, you told me, Mr. Hyde. Do you find the mountain air good for you? Have you quite got over your pain in the side?"

"Quite. I am strong in body, but grievously puzzled in mind. I suppose there is a time in every young man's career when he is pulled in two or three different directions."

"While some outside influence is acting. I think our tendencies are generally settled early enough. We puzzle ourselves afterwards, calling a transient temptation to divergence, a real uncertainty as to fitness."

"Did you always choose the ministry, sir? Were you never tempted to law, or medicine, or the army, or navy, or mercantile pursuits?"

"Fortunately, never. I liked my profession, and my wife liked it. Directly, perhaps, I shall not do much good with it. Indirectly, I hope to do a little. One cannot measure the benefit or advantage of a cultivated centre in a community, and we all do a great deal of both good or evil that we never dreamed of doing.

That is always a pleasant excitement, even in a dull place. You are doing something by your example, perhaps for good, while you are in the way of daily duty."

Parson Pratt never asked many questions; partly because, living among a reticent and undemonstrative set, he had learned to define looks, slight gestures, and vocal inflections. Now that Earl Hyde avoided communicating his thoughts, except indirectly, and felt quite sure that his secret was within his own breast, Parson Pratt read him like a book, and answered the questions he never asked. He thought it more than likely the young man's friends had ambitious hopes and intentions for him, possibly political ones. There was not much talk of politics between them; but, at all events, a country love entanglement would not be acceptable to the aristocratic relatives of the boy. A boy he was—only nineteen—though with the maturity of manhood in many respects.

They ate the chestnuts, and then Mrs. Pratt asked Mr. Hyde if he were going to the Ellis quilting. He did not know whether he was, and did not know what a quilting was. Parson Pratt laughed.

"We haven't had one since you came. They never have them until after the annual ball and the huskings are over. Then, between them and the sleigh-rides, comes the quilting. And the quiltings at the Ellis's are of the highest order for hospitality. We shall have dancing and roast turkey."

"And do you attend them, sir?" asked Mr. Hyde, whose Boston experience had given him no guide for pastoral dignity in these matters.

"Always. Mrs. Pratt and myself are of the first consequence in all merry gatherings. I don't think General or Mrs. Ellis would allow any mirthful meeting that wasn't sanctified by prayer. Besides, the presence of the minister and his wife keeps the young fellows steady, and is a wholesome restraint on the frolicsome girls. You'll go with us, of course."

"You haven't much of the old Puritan spirit here in Walton," said Earl, smiling.

"Modified—a good deal modified. If a man, let alone a minister, wants to do any good among such a parish as this, he must be in and of them, that by all means he may save some. To tell the truth, if you won't think me a gormandizing old abbot, I will confess to a liking for both turkey and toddy myself. All in decency and order, mind."

"I don't believe you will ever be accused of exceeding the bounds of either, sir," said Hyde, laughing.

Then the three moderate drinkers took a half-mug of flip between them, and retired with easy consciences.

And Earl Hyde never knew the skeleton that was in that house, ay, in every room of it. For in every room had sounded the sweet young voice that would be heard there no more forever. From that quiet, God-fearing roof had gone forth a graceless son to mortify and distress his parents by his life, and to give them a certain relief at hearing of his death in foreign parts. After hearing that, they slept soundly. For twenty years they had started in their sleep with the hope or the fear of his coming; and now the parents never spoke of him and his sweet childhood, lest the sympathizing hearer should ask another question. If one looked at this old pair, knowing these facts, the writing was plain on their sad eyes and the deep lines of their mouths, where tears had worn channels; but none of the parish ventured to speak of Robert Pratt to the parents, and by degrees he was forgotten.

It was the skeleton in almost every house in the parish that gave Parson Pratt his perpetual interest and loving sympathy with the somewhat rude and unpolished farmers there. Rude they might be, yet one or another had drunk each their cup of bitter in life; and the parson knew how to lay his hand softly on their hearts like a blessing, and to weep heartily with those who wept, as well as to rejoice unaffectedly in all their joys.

To the "Ellis quilting" came young women from far and near. The quilting was finished, and the frames all put away long before night. Then the two large square rooms were made as empty as possible. Every article of furniture—such as beds, bureaus, the old high desk, and the scalloped mahogany tables—was taken out into the lean-to. Only chairs were placed as thickly as possible round the edges of the two rooms and in the small square entry. In the long kitchen the ample table was set for every luxury which the climate produced. Every variety of cake and pastry, every kind of pickle and sweetmeat, and every sort of cold meats. Flanking each plate was the ample toddy glass and the mug for the sparkling cider, and on a side table stood apples and pears in rich and rosy perfection, with shelled walnuts and butternuts.

When the young men should arrive, the hot turkey would be served; after that were to be dancing and games. Every thing was in readiness. General Ellis himself walked through the rooms with a satisfied air, feeling sure that his wife was an unfailing refuge for hungry men, and beginning to wish for the rest of the guests, since the workers had all dined sharp on the stroke of twelve, and it was now full six o'clock.

Ruth came in from the lean-to, where she had been stowing away some last things, crossed the kitchen, and sprang up lightly on a chair to wind the clock. Not a mahogany-cased, ornamental article of furniture this clock, such as one sees now-a-days occasionally, preserved on a front stairway as a relic of by-gone splendor. This clock was a droll-looking anatomy of Yankee invention, being composed by one Eli Terry, who drove his cart and his clocks himself through Walton, and left one first at General Ellis's, afterwards at every house at the Four Corners. This primitive timekeeper, made simply of wood, and finished up in the process of manufacture by Eli's own cunning jack-knife, won the reverence of all Walton for its sterling qualities, though its outward seeming never ceased to be ludicrous, and Mrs. Ellis continually threatened to put a gown on it, to make the skeleton look decent. For, first, there was the moony face of the dial-plate looking quite lively, and from that descended cords bearing heavy weights, and counter cords with other heavy weights, which alternately rose and fell. Eli had promised that it should faithfully keep time, if it was faithfully wound up, and that in fifty years it would be as good as at the first day. So Ruth undertook the clock-winding as her special duty; and a pretty sight she was, every day at six o'clock, when her light figure poised itself gracefully in front of the odd-looking machine, and looked into its moony eyes. To-night she was prettier than ever, with her round, dimpled arms raised, her rich color melting over her lovely neck, and the pleasant excitement of expectation making her feet tip-toe in the chair as she stood to the tune she was humming. Old Dan was to play the violin, and she would be right glad when the supper should be over, and the proper business of the evening begun. In the "square room" were huddled the belles of Walton, Dummerston, Walpole, and Weston—the choicest collection that could be culled. Rosy-cheeked, tall, finely-developed girls they were, too. Grace Crawford, stately and grand, with great soft eyes and gentle movements; the three Misses Clay, each fine-looking in her own way, and all with the supple lightness of wild animals; Relief Patten, short, dark, and plain, but so cheery and good-natured as to be a universal favorite; and a dozen more as healthy, happy, and vigorous girls as ever ripened in mountain breezes, or caught grace from twirling spinning-wheels.

Slowly, and one by one, came in the young Vermont giants. Their day's work first finished, then the unwonted toilet made that stiffened them all into discomfort and uneasiness, then the drive with open wagons, or the ride with pillions behind and prospective enjoyment over the long hills by the light of the late autumn moon. Last of all Phil Forbes from the Red Tavern, just as handsome and comfortable in his best as in his worst dress, being, as the parson remarked, a person of so just a make, and so perfect a proportion, that he couldn't move unsuitably or ungracefully. Close behind Phil drove Parson and Mrs. Pratt with the schoolmaster. The signal was given to the turkey, which appeared in all the dignified promise of a sixteen-pounder, and, after kind greetings to each person in the square room, the festivities began.

First of all a blessing was asked for by the minister in fervent and brief phrase, and then the company partook of the bounties before them with praiseworthy alacrity. So fully, indeed, doing justice to the feast, that even Mrs. Ellis did not complain, in her usual eager and hospitable way, that "nobody seemed to eat anything." Certainly, on this quilting night, everybody seemed to eat everything. It was pleasant to see even a Yankee housewife satisfied.

Old Dan's violin wouldn't be ready till he and Cely had refreshed themselves; so the company adjourned to the other rooms for some quiet games, preparatory to the dancing. And now there was an opportunity for Earl to have a private word with Ruth. Taking an auspicious moment, when she stood quite alone at a window, he ventured to ask her hand for the first contre-dance.

"Yes!" she said, with an eager blush that thrilled him, for in general her manner was cool. She left the window, however, at once, and went into all the hospitable proprieties incident to the occasion and to her part as the young lady of the house. Earl watched her with ever-growing delight.

"Suppose we have some singing, first of all?" said she to Grace Crawford, who led the treble in the Walton meeting-house.

"Agreed!" resounded on all sides.

Nobody sung songs in Walton. There were two kinds of music known—sacred and profane, and the profane was in the shape of old Dan's fiddle. So the young people began the hymn:—

"The Lord into His garden comes,
The spices yield a rich perfume,
The lilies grow and thrive," which they continued with all their hearts to the end, and then added "Coronation" and "Old Hundred." By that time old Dan's dark, shining face appeared, and the dancers arranged themselves.

Earl Hyde could not get over his astonishment at the curious mixture in the social life of Walton. He did not appreciate the independent and individual life of country folk, removed so entirely as they were from metropolitan influences. In Boston the lines were drawn with much more precision between allowed and unpermitted amusements. Indeed, an amusement often served to indicate a whole class of doctrinal opinions. He felt he had still much to learn from these lineal descendants of the Pilgrims, who held as their most precious privilege the right to think as they pleased. Eventually the assertion of this right broke Walton up into sects; but at this time the flock were in peaceful union under the sway of Shepherd Pratt, and he was most of all desirous they should keep so. At nine o'clock the pastor left the merry-makers, who kept up their exercise until ten or eleven, and then set off on their overland routes for home, some of them eight or ten miles away. These social gatherings for mutual help, whether for raising house-frames or quilting bed-covers, are among the pleasantest features of a new settlement, and serve to bind the population by a twofold cord. More than ever Earl Hyde felt to-night how nearly and intimately people are connected in country life, and how different it all was from anything in his city experience. Every family knew the heart happiness and bitterness of its neighbor, and so sanctified with sympathy and real interest the curiosity and trifling that is so objectionable a feature in small communities.

This evening had been one of peculiar and exquisite happiness to Earl. His consciousness of possessing a somewhat superior style and ease of manner to most of the rustic youths assembled gave him a freedom as unusual to himself as it was surprising to those around him; while the excitement of the music and motion gave fluency to his tongue, and brightened the languor of his blue eyes. Vanity served to console him, in some ways, for his lack of burliness and strength; if he could not be as big as Alpheus or Elizur, he felt himself, in other eyes as well as his own, twice as ready and graceful in the Virginia reel or the mysteries of money-musk. It was in one of the long "down the outsides," when the parallel lines of dancers reached from one end of the house to the other, that Earl promised himself that he would raise a smile and a blush on Ruth's face which should be decisive. His heart beat so hard, as he chased up the rooms, that he was nearly choked. It was the third time Ruth had danced with him. She looked so radiantly lovely! The thought of Boston and all its objections left him for a moment, and gave him breath to whisper, as they went like a flash of light "down the middle," only these words:—

"Tell me, can you say the words of your namesake?"

Ruth's roses could not be deeper, but she dropped her bright eyes, and said, bashfully: "I don't know what you mean."

Perhaps she did not. If she had, it would have been all the same, for the womanly instinct is always to evade and deny in such answers. It was easy for her to avoid hearing another word, and so to twirl, moulINETTE, and balancez as to require all her senses, as well as her partner's, to bring the figure out properly.

Phil Forbes danced with everybody, and was the lightest, readiest, gracefulest of all the merry throng. If he danced oftenest with Grace Crawford, it did not seem to disturb Ruth's serenity. Two or three times Earl looked anxiously at her to see if she cared when Phil and Grace "brought down the house" in rapturous plaudits at their light pigeon-wings or intricate double-shuffles. But, no, the crimson on her dimpled cheek was no deeper, the sparkle from her eye had no anger in it; on the contrary, a beaming content, a fulness of happiness radiated from her whole figure, which was a perpetual puzzle to Earl. He could not quite make himself believe that this happiness was in the perception of his own devotion.

When he said good-night to all the Ellis's, he clasped Ruth's hand in his very closely, looking in her face for some answer to the thoughts she could hardly fail to read in his. But Ruth dropped her eyes so persistently, and fluttered out from his hand so like a bird, that Earl was fain to wait for another opportunity to win the one little word he waited for.

For now Earl was almost sure that he could be quite happy in the country and living on a farm. So it must be, if he would marry Ruth. Visions of faded splendor ceased to haunt him, or of coming greatness to inspire him. His only thought was of the long summer days, when he and Ruth should wander among the hay fields, and, loitering beside the brooks, whisper ever more and more fondly their love for each other. And General Ellis? Oh! he must set them up somehow—on one of his farms, perhaps. And there would always be books and pictures, and the annual visit to Boston. Lillian! How would Lillian like the country? Would she come to them for the summers? And would Ruth like the city in the winter? And—and what would Lillian think of Ruth? But why should he care?

Then, with the thought of Lillian, came the thousand luxuries and elegancies to which he had all his life been accustomed to look forward. He thought of the handsome Devereux carriage and the high-stepping horses; of Lillian, leaning back against the blue velvet lining, and playing with the silver tassel against her little white hand; of Lillian, with silk attire and siller to spare; of Lillian, haughty, delicate, and sensitive as the "true princess," sweeping into the governor's large parlors, talking with foreign statesmen and politicians—all with the same stateliness and air superb that he had so often admired in her, and which had made him feel that whatever distinguished position fate might have in reserve for him, Lillian would grace and crown it with her own dignified and classic person. It is very odd, but the more Earl thought of Lillian, the surer he felt that she would never spend a summer with Ruth and himself. Then, ought it not to be a question with him whether wholly to give up all connection with his family? With these thoughts thronged a thousand more, confusing and disturbing his feelings and his nice sense of honor.

When he had been in the daily habit of seeing Lillian and her luxuries, he had thought nothing of them. But the long absence from anything like Boston social refinements and conveniences, had brought his ideas all into rustic shapes, and he had measured every thing and person by another standard. The bare or sanded floors, the tallow flaring candles, the coarse surroundings, the limited conveniences and furnishings of Vermont farmers, had accustomed him to a different standard of even female beauty and grace. He said to himself always, how much nearer nature, how much more statuesque, even, were the simple garments and unstudied gestures of these mountaineers; how much more truly artistic than the stiff courtliness of the city gentry. But he also said to himself, twenty times over, before he fell asleep after the evening of the quilting, "Could I ever introduce Ruth at Boston assemblies? What would my father and Aunt Devereux say to her little brown hands, and her nasal twang? Could that ever be changed? Will she ever cease to say 'ceouw?' A man should be proud of his wife. He must not blush for her." So Earl had tossed in mind as in body, till he fully concluded that if he took Ruth, her people must be his people. And then he fell asleep.

"I wish I were a Catholic, Mr. 'Pratt!'" said Earl, suddenly, as the two were sitting by themselves in the minister's study the next day.

"The faith suits some of our weaknesses wonderfully," answered the parson, glancing at Earl's excited face.

"If I were a Catholic, now, I could make you my father confessor, and I would! A person who is not an interested party can judge so much better what is the best way to go," said Earl, wistfully.

"Only he cannot tell exactly how deep or strong feelings are. I should be afraid to take the responsibility of directing any one's path, except, of course, that of duty and honor. But that, we take for granted, is every one's intention."

He looked keenly at Earl as he spoke, and saw that his eyes drooped, and the delicate, womanly suffusion came even to his brow.

"You will not understand me!" he said, impatiently, "and yet I think you might. You must have seen enough in your early life to appreciate some of the difficulties in the way of a decision which must be for life. That's the worst of it!"

"Yes, that is the worst of it," replied the minister, seriously. "We might deal in generalities an hour longer, but I hesitated to make our conversation direct or personal, not knowing how I could help you. If I understand you now, there is a conflict in your mind between ambition and love. Is it so?"

"I have not put it in that shape," said Earl. And then he poured out in one half hour all the circumstances, feelings, and conflicting reasons connected with this decision for life, and his utter inability to fix on a line of conduct which would be honorable and satisfactory. His excessive and habitual reticence gave way entirely before this good, honorable, true-hearted man, and he sat with a humble face, waiting to be directed in his duty by one whom he felt to be infallible.

"You think your father would be much grieved and disappointed to have you break your engagement to Miss Devereux?"

"That I am sure he would. But there is no heart about that matter. Lillian does not love me particularly, I think. I doubt much if she would love any one. It is precisely as I have told you. On one side, duty, ambition, self-indulgence, luxury; on the other, self-denial, love, obscurity. Was ever anybody so puzzled? Is not it exasperating?"

"You are more puzzled than I am," said the parson, smiling at him. "May I ask you to say, frankly, did you ever, have you ever, loved your cousin Lillian?"

"I thought so until I saw Ruth."

"And you were satisfied to marry her?"

"Until I saw Ruth," he repeated.

"And now?"

"My dear sir," said Earl, impatiently, "why does Satan enter into the heart of a man? Can you tell me that? Why am I entirely delighted and happy at the thought of marrying a woman, and the moment the thought becomes familiar, why do I begin to cavil? to find fault? to wish she were otherwise? It is the same with both of these beautiful persons. The question is only, in what shape, and for which idol, shall the human sacrifice be made? To tell the truth, there are times when I heartily wish I had never seen either of them."

Parson Pratt smiled at him. "What a child you are!" he said. "But such as you are, I have learned to like and love you, and I see your purity of intention. If you should marry Ruth, I am sure you would devote your life to making her happy. You must renounce all your dreams of diplomatic distinction, and devote yourself to country life and employments. Learn to work with men who work with hands instead of heads, and get your bread by the sweat of your brow."

"Yes," said Earl, slowly, in answer to this catechism. "But then, I dare say, I should be wretched after the first year. Probably I should add my own discontent to the disappointment of my father and friends."

"Yet you are not willing to give up Ruth?"

"That is it. If I could win her! but you know how it is; you have been young," and here Earl paused in some confusion at the thought of Mrs. Pratt, who by no figure of his fancy could be made an attractive or bewildering person.

"Yes, I have been young," said the minister, with a far away look in his eyes. Then he seemed to collect himself, and spoke, in a low voice to the young man beside him. "Perhaps I can help you with my experience. Before I went to college, I pledged myself to the woman who is my beloved and honored wife. You can see that she must always have been plain, but to me she was sufficiently comely, and I loved her very affectionately. She was not literary, as you see. But she loved me very heartily and truly."

He paused, and sighed. So deep a sigh that Earl started to hear it. It was laden with so much of sadness. Looking at the minister's face, he was surprised to see the working of the thin features and the air of grief in the whole person. He was, as it seemed, bowed down with some sudden recollection of the past.

"Don't distress yourself, sir; don't tell me," said Earl, with earnest sympathy.

"I think you will understand me, my dear boy," answered the minister, coming to his usual manner with a sort of rousing mental shake, "and I would rather tell you; in confidence, of course. But it is so long since I have lifted the stone of this sepulchre."

In a minute or two he spoke calmly.

"While I was in college, I kept up a correspondence with my betrothed wife, but I saw her unfrequently, as she lived far in the country. Meanwhile, I made the acquaintance of a very beautiful young girl, with whose mind, as well as person, I was enraptured. I use this word, because it expresses better than any other the emotion that the sight of her always gave me. She was fair and angelic-looking, with a grace of manner and a mental culture that I never saw equalled. Of course, I have seen more profound scholarship, but never such a charming balance of literary attainment and intellectual vivacity. She was all alive with sympathy, with wit, with the ready understanding of other minds, that made her conversation a delight and instruction. I say instruction, because women have great fields of taste, thought, and sentiment, that are never traversed by men, unless a woman leads them. Then, indeed, it is over paths of flowers. In these paths I trod for months, entirely unconscious of danger. You can partly guess with how much delight, for I was not introverted in my mental habit, and had no idea how much I enjoyed or felt. I was awakened from this blissful trance all at once, by hearing of the dangerous illness of Elinor. And then, her father came to me, and with tears and strong crying, besought me to save his daughter's life. It seemed that the family had inquired and learned all about me, and, of course, of my betrothed. The news struck to the heart of Elinor. I need not tell you that she loved me as unconsciously as I did her, until this news, which was terrible to her."

Here the minister stopped talking, but turned and laid his hand on Earl's shoulder. Evidently it had been a relief to express his pent-up grief to this sympathetic and refined young man.

"Tell me, my boy, was it not hard to decide which was right?"

"I need not ask you, of course, which way you did decide," said Earl.

"I went to West Southwark. I did not go to Elinor until I had first seen Sophia. Walking with her in the garden the evening I arrived, I asked her what she should do if I were to die, or be unfaithful to her? She said, after a little pause, for she was never demonstrative, 'If you die, dear, I must bear it; it will be the hand of God. If the other way—no, I don't think I could.'

"I shall do neither, I hope and trust, and so we won't think any more about it," I said; for my way was as clear now as that of the Hebrews behind the fiery pillar."

"Did you not see Elinor, sir?" said Earl.

"I saw her, yes. Just before she died, I went to see her; she sent for me. It was no infidelity to Sophia when I took the poor withered rose in my arms and held her close there, her arms about my neck, her dying lips blessing me, and begging me to remember her. I was clasping an angel, and not a woman."

"It must have been agonizing to you. How you must have been torn and tried! I am ashamed that I should ever have troubled you with my comparatively small trials."

"I should not have told you, only that you might feel how very slight, indeed, they are, my dear; for your very heart of hearts, I think, is not even touched. Only your fancy, your taste, your love of the unusual and the picturesque. If you should ever really, deeply, heartily love, there will be no conflict of ambition with it. There will be no mistake about it in your mind; no uncertainty as to what is your duty, on the whole."

Earl looked hesitatingly at the good face before he answered.

"But you, too, had a divided heart!"

"Not after I fully understood myself and Sophia. With the consciousness of her entire affection and trust, came also my own fidelity to that trust, and the happiness that God has given us to feel in acting rightly. It sounds coxcombical to say it, but here were two women whose lives were so bound by their affections that neither would outlive their disappointment. Honor settled the matter at once in my mind, though I will not deny that life has had a deep pain in it. But there are worse pains than that, Earl. Do not disappoint your father, nor your Lillian."

The minister said what he felt about "worse pains."

"I cannot tell you, sir," said Earl, "how very much I feel this kind confidence of yours, nor how much good it has done me. I feel already years older. But I must ask you, tell you something else. Will not Ruth expect some more explicit declaration? Will it be honorable in me not to say anything further to her? and her father, too?"

"My dear boy, her father hates Tory blood, and, of course, he hates yours. You couldn't win his consent, if you brought Golconda on your back."

"Is it possible he is so absurd? But Ruth?" and here the man's love of conflict came into his face again with a bright flush and sparkle. He thought he could win her, father or no father.

Parson Pratt only said very quietly, for, indeed, this all seemed childish and unreal, in the light of those dead sorrows which lay ever at his heart, and of which he had spoken with such a deep pang, "Phil Forbes is to marry Ruth Ellis. Didn't my wife tell you that was an understood thing? And the time was agreed on only day before yesterday. I don't know what the little coquette would be up to if she had a chance, but if you are the sensible lad I think you, she won't get it."

The boy looked affectionately at the old man, who for his good had been willing to uncover a past so full of sadness.

"I shall never forget this kindness of yours, sir. I need not say how sacred every word will always be in my heart. Even the name of her you lost is very dear to me. My Aunt Elinor Hyde was just such a lovely being as you describe. We have her picture at my father's."

"You look like her sometimes, my dear. Often your eyes light up as hers did. You guess now, why I wanted to have you come here; and how dear and important your honorable and dutiful conduct must always be to me. But it is best that this should be our last talk on this subject. Let the dead past bury its dead."

Earl had lived several years in the last half hour. In the light of the minister's experience, his own way became clear. So clear, that no dancer at Ruth's wedding was gayer than he.

GOLDSMITH thought people should write their own flattering epitaphs, and then live up to them.

THE covetous man makes a halfpenny of a farthing; and a liberal man makes a sixpence of it.

KEEP IN GOOD HUMOR.—It is not great calamities that embitter existence; it is the petty vexations, the small jealousies, the little disappointments, the minor miseries, that make the heart heavy and the temper sour. Don't let them. Anger is a pure waste of vitality; it is always foolish and always disgraceful, except in some very rare cases, when it is kindled by seeing wrong done to another; but even that noble rage seldom mends the matter.

ONLY A TRIFLING MISTAKE.

BY S. A. F.

"WELL, little lady, are you prepared for a rainy day?"

"Yes, indeed. We cannot order holiday weather, unfortunately, especially in February. I brought knitting and sewing, so I shall manage very well till you return."

"I won't be home before six o'clock, but you will go to dinner with Mrs. Clarke."

"I will wait for you, and dine late."

"Very well. Adieu, then."

An affectionate kiss, and Mr. Smith left his little daughter to a rainy day in a New York hotel, while he went out upon business.

There was nothing very romantic or uncommon in the situation. Papa had come from Utica upon business for a week in New York, and papa's only daughter had begged for a holiday and come also. This was the first rainy day, so Mary Smith opened her trunk and fished up from a lot of clothing a most dainty little work-box. A few minutes were given to a crochet collar, and then:—

"There! I'll write to mamma! She won't expect a letter, but it is just the day to write one. I'll tell her about our meeting Meta Clark on the train, and how nice it is to have a lady friend here, and I can ask her about my new silk, too. I'll write."

Pen, ink, and paper being produced by a waiter, the young lady went to work.

"Let me see, what day of the month is it? The fourteenth. Why, it is St. Valentine's Day! I wonder if any Valentines came for me!"

Two minutes more of writing, and then a short, sharp rap on the door interrupted the letter.

"Come in!"

Only a bell-boy, with a snowy envelope in his hand.

"Miss Mary Smith?" he inquired, showing that address in a bold masculine hand on his letter.

"Yes."

"Letter for you," and off he went to deliver the remainder of a postman's package.

"Now who is that from?" speculated the young lady. "It's not John's hand, nor Harry's. It is stiff, too; feels like a card; and sealed! Who can seal a letter now-a-days? Two doves kissing. Oh, it is a Valentine! Can it be for me? 'Miss Mary Smith, Metropolitan Hotel, New York.' That's all right. I'll open it!"

Not a letter, not a fanciful picture, or a copy of sentimental verses; only a photograph. A photograph of a gentleman, young, good looking, with a mass of curling hair, pleasant eyes, and good features. Under the portrait, one line of pencilled writing: "Can you guess who I am?"

Miss Mary Smith gazed and wondered. Mentally she passed every masculine face she remembered in review, from her cousin Adolph's down to the milkman's, but the one before her did not answer the call of memory.

"Can you guess who I am?" she read, after vainly endeavoring to identify the features. "No, Mr. Impudence, I can't, but I'll find you out some time and pay you for your saucy Valentine. I believe I won't write home, after all, but finish my collar. Oh, it is going to clear up! I'll go and see if Meta Clark will go to walk if the sun comes out, and we can decide upon the silk. Stewart has just the one I want!"

Meta Clark and the sunshine both being propitious, the bright little brunette was soon equipped, and the shopping undertaken.

"You know papa has given me carte blanche for a new evening silk to figure at brother John's wedding."

"Are you bridesmaid?"

"No, indeed! 'Three times a bridesmaid, never a bride,' and I was bridesmaid for Henry's wife and for cousin Hattie, so this time I declined with thanks."

"You superstitious little goose. I was bridesmaid six times before I figured as bride."

"I won't peril my chances in that way," was the gay rejoinder. "Why, there he is!"

"Who? Don't stare at that young man in that way, May. Who is he?"

"I don't know. It certainly is him!" was the odd answer. "I don't believe he knew me."

"He did not look as if he did. What possessed you to stare so? There, he has vanished. Who is he, May?"

"I don't know. I certainly never saw him before in all my life," was the emphatic reply, but mentally Miss May added, "That is certainly the original of my Valentine. He didn't know me, I am certain. What did he send me his picture for?"

Evening silks and the relative merits of corn color, orange and pink for brunette complexion and hair, soon drove the Valentine from May's mind, and the recollection of May's odd conduct from that of her young friend.

"You are coming home for the wedding, Meta?" said May, after the important choice was made.

"I am going home on Wednesday. I only came to keep Charley company. He hates coming to New York alone, and declares he won't do it now he has a wife."

"Oh, you turtle doves," laughed May. "Wait till next year."

"I'm sure we've been married nearly a year now," was the half-pouting reply. "By the way, I'll delicately suggest to Charlie that I want a new dress for the wedding. John, you know, disappointed me awfully. I was sure he was my devoted slave, when I was thunder-struck to hear he was engaged to Louise."

"How long had you been engaged?"

"You horrid girl, I was not engaged till a month later. What was I to do? Deserted by John, I accepted Charlie."

"I'll tell him so."

"You wretched little mischief-maker. I have told him so forty times already."

"And he believes it?"

"Certainly. So if I faint at the wedding, he is quite prepared to catch me. By the way, May, when are you going to have a wedding?"

"Never! Henry married, John soon to be so; I shall stay at home to comfort papa for his sons' desertion."

"Nonsense! Henry lives at home, and John won't be far off."

"Daughters-in-law are not daughters," said May, decidedly. "Papa relies upon me."

"Of course he does. Poor papa!"

"Where are you going next summer, or don't you form plans so far ahead?"

"O May, how odd you should ask. We are going to a new place. I have a friend here, Mrs. Williams, who went last summer to a delightful place, a farm in Western New York. She is forming a party already for next year, her idea being to secure all the rooms for her own friends, and so guard against unpleasant strangers. Won't you go? Charlie has given me permission to engage a room for two months, while he goes to Chicago."

"Does he go there every summer?"

"Yes. Come, May, join us."

"If papa is willing."

It was no difficult matter to win papa's consent to any scheme for his little daughter's pleasure, so summer found May one of a gay party assembled at C—— for two months of country life. There were numerous introductions, and amongst others, a tall, stately blonde was brought to the little brunette and introduced.

"Miss Mary Smith, Miss Mary Smith. We shall have to call you Albany and Utica," said Meta Clark, as she made the introduction. By the way, May, you were nearly introduced last winter. Mrs. Williams says Miss Mary had just vacated your room at the Metropolitan when you took it. Have you a pet name for convenience sake, Miss Mary? We call this fire-fly May."

"Then Mary will do for me," was the reply. "I have no pet name."

"When is Mr. Sanderson coming?" asked Mrs. Williams.

"To-morrow week, probably."

It was a merry party. Such as were not old friends speedily became good ones, and the two Marys were inseparable.

"I hope you will like Carroll Sanderson," said Mary to May the evening before that gentleman's arrival. "I mean to make him give you all the time I can spare him myself."

It was evening when the gentleman arrived, and the party were on the porch in the summer evening's half light. It was soon evident that the new comer was a valuable addition to the circle. Jest and merriment received a new impetus from his lively conversation, and he made friends with Miss fire-fly May at once, the two tossing repartee and gay sallies one to the other, till all were amused to listen to the playful warfare.

"You will have your namesake jealous," said Meta to May as they at last broke up to retire.

"I want to see if he is as handsome as he is pleasant," said May. "It is fortunate that he is appropriated, for my heart will be safe."

"May, May, look! There he is under the hall lamp! I've seen him before, somewhere. Why, May, he is the very gentleman you stared at in the street last winter in New York."

"You must have stared, too, or you would not recognize him."

"Certainly, I did. I wanted to see what sort of an orang outang you were looking out of countenance."

How the summer days speeded on, I have no space to tell you. May was intensely happy for the first four weeks, and then—then May began to ask herself what made the summer days so short and pleasant, and her heart answered, Carroll Sanderson. Believing him engaged to her namesake and friend, her loyal little heart was appalled to find she was growing to love his bright face, pleasant voice, and lively manner. His position in society was defined by his admission to Mrs. Williams' select circle. He was in business in New York, and he certainly admired her. As she drew back, he became more earnest and pressing in his attentions, till the poor child almost resolved to run away to get rid of him. It was while affairs were in this position that a discussion on the subject of photographs one evening called forth a remark from Mr. Sanderson:—

"I like vignette style best of all. I had some really good likenesses taken in that style last winter. Don't you think so, Mary?"

"Did I see them?"

"Now, don't tell me you never looked at the one I sent you at the Metropolitan."

"It is the first I knew of it."

"Then it is there still. I wonder which of the chambermaids is passing my phiz off for a portrait of her darling Mike!"

"Not one," said May. "I got the picture by mistake, and would have restored it before, but I left it at home."

"May!"

She had gone alone to a corner of the porch away from the others, and started at the voice.

"May, will you keep that picture?"

"It belongs to Miss Smith."

"But I would rather have it belong to you."

"But her claim!"

"Pshaw! I'll give her a dozen if she wants them, but I want you to keep that one."

"Mr. Sanderson, you know I cannot. Mary may not like the portrait of her fiancé in my album."

"Her what! Is it possible you do not know Mary is my half-sister?"

So that trifling mistake rectified, "papa" had to allow another visit to New York for May's trousseau.

AT SEA.

BY FLORA L. BEST.

On an ocean's foaming surges,
Lone and dark,
'Mid the wild wind's dreary dirges,
Drifts my bark;
And the distant storm-king speaking,
In his pride,
Sends the sea-bird homeward shrieking
O'er the tide.

All things toward some home retreating,
I, alone,
'Mid the billows' busy beating,
Sit and moan;
Now the avenged lightning quivers,
Keen and fast,
While my good ship shrinks and shivers
In the blast.

From the sky no star-gleam falling,
Lights the sea,
And a phantom voice seems calling
Unto me;
Phantom hands are grasping, clinging
To my soul.
Are the waves a death-song singing,
As they roll?

List, my heart, for somewhat ringing,
Deep, yet clear,
Weirder than the wild waves' singing,
Soundeth near;
Spirit bells are wailing, sobbing,
'Neath the sea;
Courage, heart, the knell that's throbbing,
Tolls for thee.

Waveless calm shall soon enfold thee,
Tempest-tossed,
To the warring strifes that hold thee,
Ever lost!

Down in rainbow lighted bowers,
Thou shalt be,
With the bloom of sea-born flowers
Over thee.

Now the bells sob slow and slower—
Faint they toll;
And the sea moans low and lower
To my soul;
Through my being thrills a sweetness,
And my breath,
Fleeteth with a quickened fleetness,
Welcome death!

THE foundation of domestic happiness is faith in the virtue of woman.—Landor.

WET BLANKETS.

Do we not know them, those wet blankets who come down on our pleasant little fires and extinguish them, with no more ruth than the rain feels when it pours on the encampment of the merry picnic party, or floods the tents of a flower show? What offence was it to them that we nursed our pleasant little fires, and heaped up this bright coal and that yule log, laughing as we watched the blaze and spread our hands to its warmth? Why could they not let us enjoy ourselves in our own way? which was not a way that interfered with any other person's, that trod on no one's toes, shouldered no one out of place, and did no earthly damage to friend or foe. All we asked for was leave to nurse our own small fire by our own hearth-stone—leave to laugh, to sing, to feel hopeful and joyous—when down fell the wet blanket and extinguished every spark and every flame, leaving us as cheerless, cold, and melancholy as before we had been bright. What is that miserable quality in some people which cannot let others be happy? Is it jealousy? is it the mere love of meddling? or is it that cross-laid temper which can never put itself in line with any other temper, but must cut in at all sorts of angles and prove its own rightness by demonstrating the wrongness of every one else? Whatever the cause, there is the fact; and we might as well attempt to shut our eyes to the fact of the sun, or of the night, as to that of the existence of a set of people who are always at cross corners with every other set of people, and who specially are never happy when others are happy—whom, moreover, they never let remain happy if they can help it.

Sometimes, however, wet blankets themselves can be as bright as the best; but—have you never observed it?—they are bright only when things are at their worst, and all the world about them is in despair; and almost the only time you hear them express a cheerful certainty, or prophesy an eventual escape from a bad pass, is when no one else has a shred of faith remaining, and the most sanguine has given up his last hold on hope. Then the wet blanket flutters about in quite rollicking spirits, declaring that none of you have any cause for the smallest fear; that despondency is a crime, and hope the first virtue of humanity; and that everything is perfectly safe at this present moment if you would but think so, and sure to come patently right in the end. Your child going to die? Pooh! they knew a child who had diphtheria in a far more aggravated form, and it lived. Your son going to the dogs? Nonsense! A young man will be young, and though to be sure those bills are awkward, and that check which you swear you did not sign—well, that is not nice!—but, Lord bless us! when did you ever see old heads on young shoulders? and are not the best men proverbially those who have sown the largest crop of wild oats in their youth? If, on the contrary, you have many reasons, and all of them good, for believing that things look worse than they are; if, having experimental knowledge of certain ways of escape from the Slough of Despond into which your affairs are plunged, and which ways are not open to all the world, you are less cast down than you might be; if you have a real and not an affected hold on hope, and think that no game of life, as no battle, is lost till it is won, and that, therefore, no one need despair until his enemy's knife is in his heart; and if, more especially, you are in such straits that cheerfulness and courage and the energy which comes by hope are the only chances of salvation—then your wet blanket no longer prances about with a brisk and cheerful air, but stalks solemnly and mournfully across your path, with condolences and surety of evil at the merest beginnings of mischance. Ravenlike, he croaks your dirge before you have even owned yourself ill; and talks to you about your child's funeral—for he is sure it will die—when the doctor assures you that in a week's time it will be playing about your knees as if nothing had ever ailed it. And then these wet blankets are so dreadfully knowing! That is how they frighten the inexperienced and oppress the sensitive as they do. To believe them, they have had, either personally or through their friends, every experience that can befall humanity; and they have found out, therefore, the rottenness of all the stays to which you are trusting, the reed-like qualities of all the props on which you are leaning. They have been in more griefs, more perils, than any one else of your acquaintance, and they have assisted at more tragedies. It is this knowledge of life, they tell you, which makes them more than doubt your ability to ultimately clear yourself of your difficulties—which makes them despair of your position, and feel so sorry to see you buoy yourself up with false hopes as you do. "At all events," they say, with an appearance of condescending to your weakness so far, "there can be no harm in being prepared for the worst;" and they advise you to prepare yourself for the worst, and then you cannot be disappointed. Of course, the advice is not absolute nonsense all through, else it would have no effect; but we can scarcely call it wise to live always by an open grave, and to contemplate the fact of our funeral to come on the day of our marriage. The grave has to be filled, the funeral day has to come and be gone through; but there are flowers to pluck, and songs to sing, and glad hearts to make blessed in the present, and the time for all things includes also the time for mirth—when wet blankets are out of place.

Among the trials of the young, we may count the wet blanketry of their elders as one of the very greatest. For the young have their trials, poor bright-eyed martyrs; and it is very well for them that they have the elasticity, the ignorance of coming evil, and the forgetfulness of past sorrow, which are the characteristics of their state. Still, while it is on them, they suffer from wet blanketry as much, and, indeed, more, than others. They are radiant with some bright, hopeful anticipation; they are happy in their guileless way about some silly little pleasure that only youth can enjoy; down comes the wet blanket, and either saddens them by the most gloomy forebodings, or, if in a position of authority, finds something at which it may gird, and scold, and torment, and so breaks up the innocent "run" of gewgaws and rootless flowers in which the young soul was taking its unoffending pleasure, like a pretty little bower-bird dancing before its tinsel treasures. There was no kind of reason why that poor human bower-bird should not make itself happy over its bits of tinsel and broken mirror, its fluttering ends of ribbon and shining wealth of colored glass; it might be all mere rubbish in the more experienced eyes of the elderly wet blanket; but why say so? and oh! why find fault? Let it have its hour of pleasure; let it think its colored glass the finest jewels of the mines. The day will come quite soon enough when its bright eyes will get opened to the relative worthlessness of its former nest—when it will laugh, with a half sad surprise, at the rubbish it once found sufficient for its delight. But while it can believe in the loveliness of its "run," in Heaven's name, let it! and keep that wet blanket of yours, dear madam, safe under your cloak, and sacred to your own wearing for this time, at least. You have had your day of bower-bird happiness; now let your young people have theirs. Remember what you felt when the wet blankets which extinguished the fires and knocked to pieces the pretty nests of your own youth fell pall-like about you, and have pity on these, for the sake of what you yourself once suffered. But when did experience ever teach the cross-laid sympathy or tenderness? How should it, indeed? Is not the very core round which the wet blanket has wrapped itself, the core of selfishness and want of sympathy? And you might as well look for blood from the traditional stone as weeping with those who weep, rejoicing with those who are glad, or pitiful interest in the pleasures of the young, and a tender care not to destroy them, from the wet blanket, who likes nothing so much as to chill and overset.

The fortunes of war play us many curious tricks in our lifetime, and chance fits in the various pieces of the great mosaic we call human society as often ill as well. The grave are mated with the gay, the sober with the dissipated, the home-staying with the runagate, the humdrum with the ambitious, the dishonest with the scrupulous, the idle with the industrious, and so on. But about the most misfitting of all these personal rights and lefts is the one made by the light-hearted and sanguine when mated with wet blankets. And about the greatest amount of heroism that can be shown in a quiet way is that which enables this same light-hearted and sanguine nature to keep its head above the dreary waters which the wet blanket pours out again, and to retain anything of its brightness, anything of its hope, in the presence of so much sodden misery and foreboding. Day after day, year after year, the wet blanket drips its petrifying showers; day after day the bright smile is frowned away, the happy impulse checked, the innocent pleasure cut down at its roots; and can we wonder, then, if the heart sinks heavy as lead under the influence of the killjoy associated with it? and if life becomes a bitter thing, even to the young and loving? So bitter, indeed, that they run away from it whenever they have the chance, taking refuge in the houses of sympathizing friends when the home drip is more petrifying than usual, and on the first occasion that presents itself, giving to a stranger all the love and hope and life that finds no room for growth at home. Parents often lament the ease with which their daughters give themselves away to strangers; but none do it so readily, with such grievous gayety of heart, as the daughters of wet blankets, who are not allowed to be innocently happy, and whom it is the habit of the house to suppress and subdue. There is not much use in bringing up children as if there was no maturity, no beyond—as if all life was a meadow full of daisies and lambkins and pretty little boys and girls with shining hair, and leave to love like the birds; but neither is there much use, or good, or beauty, in bringing them up as if all life was a funeral procession, and our daily walk among uncovered graves, with the snake who ruined Eve in Eden gliding ever at the roots of the melancholy flowers on the brink. The youth time of life is short enough at its best, and we need not make it substantially shorter by premature jeremiads; so of the joy time, whether of youth or maturity. While we can be happy—anywhere outside a fool's paradise—it seems hard that we are not let to be happy; and when we make sunshine for ourselves out of our own love, our hope, our gayety of heart, why should the wet blanket come down upon us and put out our fires, darken our sunshine, root up our flowers, and destroy the poor little bower-bird "run" we have made for ourselves, wherein to escape from the storms of life, and enjoy an hour's dream of hope, and maybe love?

WHEN any calamity has been suffered, the first thing to be remembered is, how much has been escaped.—Dr. Johnson.

PONDROUS PAPERS—NO. 2.

WE didn't come to no houses for a long ways; and I missed the fences each side the road, as they used to be back home (in the Eastern States, I mean), and I missed the woody hills we had there. Here the hills are bare of trees, exceptin' here and there a live oak; but, it being May when we started on our trip, the land hadn't got dry, but was still covered with grass and flowers, though the flowers are much more plenty in March and April than in May. Why, in March and February, too, some of the hills round our house are jest yellow with California gold poppies, and some are blue with bluebells, and some are white and sweet with minyonets; and then again there are fields where there is a mixture of all kinds—larkspurs, prince's feather, buttercups, and daisies, and hosts more that I don't know the names of.

When my little boy and girl was alive, they brought in nosegays every day as long as the flowers lasted. And Mr. Pondrous brought some rosebushes and plants from town, and set out for a posey bed. But first the grasshoppers come and eat 'em all up before they were fairly started, and next time the flood washed 'em away, so he said 'twas no use gittin' any more.

If there had been any of Plumbolt City left when we had that flood, 'twould have been washed away, too; for it stood on lower ground than our house, and the water filled our lower rooms half full, and the surging of the water made the house shake so we was afraid all one night that 'twould be taken away. Oh! the darkness, rain, wind, and flood was dreadful, and there was plenty of broken windows and parts of houses strewed along the shore we found afterward to tell us some houses went down.

But, there! this ain't tellin' about our tower, is it? Well, bimeby we come to where four roads crossed each other, and there was sort of a gide board, and I was jest readin', "8 miles to Croft's Ranch," "14 miles to Walton's Ferry," and so on, when we saw a man on horseback ridin' cross the fields. He seemed to beckon to us, so we waited till he came up. He looked kind of surly, and wanted to know if we had seen a woman and two little boys ennywhere along the road.

"No, we hain't," says John. "How big was the boys?"

"Wall, I don't know exactly, but I reckon one's 'bout eight and t'other six."

Just then another horseman come along, and the same inquiry was made of him.

"No, I haven't met any one," said the last comer. "Were they your wife and children?"

"Yes," says Mr. Surly. "They just cleared the coop, sure's yer born, and they're a right smart piece ahead, now, I reckon, for the y crossed yon ferry jest as it was plum dark last night. They was a footin' it, and I reckon I ken overhaul 'em if I git the right track."

"They'd be likely to take the shortest road to Stockton, I suppose?"

"I ain't right sure of that. My old woman know'd a heap. She was raised in York State, and was mighty homesick; she'd take the road I'd be least likely to foller. She was bound for her old home, now, sure; she telled me she'd go, but I didn't b'lieve it."

"You seem a bit vexed, stranger," said the second horseman; "but, if you overtake her, don't be rough with her, for"—

"I don't want none of your jaw. I reckon it's none of your sore corns that's got trod on, no how. Ef yer had the shoe on your foot, yer mightn't feel quite so peart."

"Stranger, my wife left me once, and I brought her back with many rough words, and in two weeks she died. When I overtook her, she was sitting on a rock by the roadside. She was frightened at my angry face, but begged me to let her go on."

"Jemmy," says she, 'do let me go on! I sha'n't live long, nohow, and the ranch is hateful to me. I want to die in my old home, and I thought you wouldn't care after I was once gone; for you never minded much about me, never asked me to ride. Why, I have not been even to the nearest village for more than two years.'

"That's your own fault," says I, crossly enough. 'If you wanted to go, why didn't you tell me? I never refused to let you go when you asked, did I?'

"I suppose I was too proud for my own good, Jemmy, for I thought if you cared for me you would think what was for my health and pleasure yourself.'

"That's right—go on—lay it all to me. You'll be saying, next, that I beat you.'

"You never scourged me with anything but your tongue, as you are doing now," said she.

"And you don't deserve it a bit, now, do you?" says I, fiercely. "Come, will you go back?"

"And I took her back, and she died, as I told you, and I can never forget how she sat by the wayside. No matter what I am doing, I hear it over and over again, 'Jemmy, I am so homesick, do let me go on?' And I hear again my own fierce words, and I say to myself, why couldn't I have been kind to her when I saw she was half-crazy with homesickness, and longing for the friends that honored her and treated her kindly? I didn't honor her. I always let her see that I had a perfect contempt for her opinions. She was better educated, more accomplished than I was, and I was afraid she would feel herself above me; so I never conversed with her as though I had any admiration for her in the least, but I made her afraid of me, and I kept her down."

He jest bent in his saddle, not to us, but as though sorrow made him bend, and I heard him moan, and then of a sudden he touched his horse with his spurs, and was over the hill before I could wipe the tears from my eyes, for I was jest cryin' for the poor dead child.

Mr. Surly was a-hanging his head, and seemed to be afraid we would accuse him of being unkind to his wife, for he said:—

"I allers treated my wife well, though we had a right poor house, only two little rooms in it, and I promised to build her a better one last year, but I took the money to build fences with instid. We needed the fences a heap more'n we did the house, now, sure as yer born. Thar's a right smart chance of houses in this yare state no better'n our'n, and she know'd it. But I must go on; and ef you uns come up to her, I'd take it kindly ef ye'd bid her come back. Tell her she shall have a new house right soon."

"Will you really build?"

"I will that, and 'pears like I feel better now I've said it; I do so."

Then we parted; and I told Mr. Pondrous we'd seen three unhappy folks, and I hoped we'd meet some happy ones soon. We was in the main road now, and began to meet big teams—monstrous waggons, monstrous wheels to their waggons, monstrous hubs to the wheels, and the six or seven span of mules were driven by rough, dirty-looking men, most of them swearing and whipping the poor jaded brutes with their monstrous whips.

Pretty soon we came to a house with a large yard near it, where these teams halted to feed, or to stay through the night. The house itself was a tidy little home, and, as we stopped at the waterin' trough, John said perhaps we'd better go in and git some dinner. Just then a merry little woman came runnin' out, and says she:—

"How de do? I was jest wishin' somebody would happen along, for my husband, Mr. Baily, has brought home some of the nicest strawberries you ever did see, the first we've had this year. And sez I to him, sez I, 'I do wish somebody would come—I wouldn't care if they was travellers—and I'd ask 'em to dinner with us.' And I looked out the winder, and there you weré jest as though the faries had sent you."

"Well, you're real kind," says I.

"Yes, I told Mr. Baily I wished somebody would come that I liked the looks of; and, I declair, you look jest like an aunt of mine back home in New Hampshire."

"Do you th?"—

"Think so? Yes, indeed. O Daniel! don't she look jest like Aunt Kezzia?" calling to ner husband. And, then, as he came: "This is Mr. Baily, Mrs."

"Pondrous," says I.

"How do you do, Mrs. Pondrous and Mr.

Pondrous?" said he, shaking hands with me and John.

"Don't she?" says Mrs. Bailly.

"Well, yes, I must say she does look considerably like Aunt Kezzy. I must say that is so, wife."

Mr. Bailly spoke very slow, Mrs. Bailly very fast.

"Thought so minit I set eyes on her. Now, come to dinner, and you're not going to pay for it, either, coz you are my company and I've asked you. Run away, children, and set down still as mice. Take off your bonnit. Um! um! hair jest like hern for all the world. Declair! I shall be callin' you Aunt Kezzy haff the time."

She trotted about, settin' a plate for John and me, happy as a bee. Buzzing all the time, about how she had teamsters to dinner some days, and some days she didn't, what a nice lot of peach-trees they had set out, how many chickens she raised, and how good her children were.

We had a nice dinner, and stopped about an hour afterwards to git well rested.

"Be sure to stop again, if you ever come this way. I shall want to see you, you look so much like Aunt Kezzy."

After we left here, the houses wasn't so far apart, and bimeby we came to a little village, and, oh! my dears, we came to a garden. There was a pretty house in it, but the roses they seemed to cover it. They climbed up the porch clear to the roof, and they were so bright, so perfect in their buds, so perfect in their blossoms!

I said: "Stop, John!" and I was out of the buggy, and through the gate, standing by the roses, scarcely knowing how I got there. And I put my old hands about them, and my old face down to them, and I cried, for, oh! my dears, I hadn't seen roses since the minister brought some to put in my children's coffins.

I looked about the garden, and it was so beautiful! There were shade trees and flowers too many to name, but I hugged their beauty in my heart, as it were, to keep it forever. All the paths were paved with smooth cobble stone, and every little plat for the different flowers was marked into diamonds or circles with the same stones. And there was the neatest summer-house, covered with honeysuckle and passion flowers, and there were roses like a wreath trained up and over the arched doorways. A little away from it on each side were oleanders as much as ten feet high; the branches drooped, and to look at them they were a perfect fountain of flowers—pink as the inside of a sea shell, and almost as sweet as pond lilies.

And I don't know how long it was, but all at once I felt some one was near me. I looked up, and there was John and a lady. He had been up to the house to ask if I might pick some flowers. The lady had the kindest face; and, when she knew I hadn't seen garden flowers for years, she went about cutting ever so many for me, told me all their names, and I went away with my hands full.

We drove through the town, and there were other gardens, but none so beautiful as the one we visited, and I never have seen one like it before or since.

JANE PONDBROUS.

AT THE MILL.

BY L. S. C.

UNDER a canopy, bending low,
Of willow, and oak, and chestnut bough,
With the wooded mountain's rugged wall
In grim reliance surrounding all,
Stands a busy mill, whose pond'rous wheel
Groans as it labors, and seems to feel
The coming on of a good old age.
The brook, that christened the gray-grown sage Long years ago, and was hoary then,
Leaps the rocky fall, as lithe as when
The mill, with its solid masonry,
Was counted among the things to be.
Within the floor had been cleanly swept,
And the hopper humm'd, as if it kept
Time with the laughter and dancing feet
Of lads and lassies, long used to meet
In the web-draped mill, to while away
The noon-tide hours of a sultry day.
A dark-eyed boy and fair-haired girl
Withdrew from the merry, noisy whirl,
And together sought a distant nook,
O'erlooking the wheel and cheery brook.
The maid remarked, in womanly phrase:
"The stream will mourn when the wheel decays;
They work together with so much ease—
The wheel to guide, and the brook to please."
The manly impulse, the boy possessed,
Caught the suggestion with eager zest;
And, leaning down on the worn sash low,
He answered: "Indeed, they seem to know
Their usefulness in their union lies;
One's power, the other's need supplies."
Then, looking into her half-turned face,
He asked, with a bashful, boyish grace:
"If you were the brook, and I the wheel,
Would you toil with me through woe and weal?"
Blushing, she roguishly made reply:
"You now are useless, and so am I;
If you can guide, I'll essay to please,
And we'll turn life's mill with greater ease."

TO ONE WHO WILL KNOW.

BY HENRY LORNE.

WHEN grace and virtue ceased to be admired,
And goodness of the heart hath lost its charm,
Nor longer holds us captive; when the hand
Of human sympathy, its mission here
Accomplished, is outstretched to man no more;
When manners gentle win us not; and all
That now makes woman lovely, to be loved,
Forgotten, disregarded lies, ah! then,
Then may we cease to love thee, only then!

WORK DEPARTMENT.

FEATHER TRIMMINGS FOR BALL DRESSES, ETC.

SOME of the newest and most uncommon trimmings of the present season are composed of feathers arranged in a variety of ways, either as ornaments for the hair, in separate shapes, or in continuous rows forming a border of any desired width, very suitable for trimming ball dresses—ostrich, pheasant, and even partridge feathers being called into requisition. Ladies residing in the country, and keeping fancy and other poultry, may easily make a collection of useful and effective feathers for the purpose, while those living in towns may obtain them from their poulterers. The white poultry feathers are particularly useful, as, by the aid of dyes, they may be made to assume any tint required to match or contrast with any ball dress. From the Magenta dye a beautiful rose pink may be obtained by putting in a small quantity of it. Scarlet, cerise, mauve, violet, yellow, blue, orange, gray, and many other colors may be had. For dyeing the small feathers, pour into an earthen basin two quarts of boiling water, and let the feathers soak in it for a minute or two, then lift them out with a perfectly clean quill pen or piece of stick, and pour in a little of the dye. The quantity must depend on the shade required; but it is better to put in too little than too much, as it is easy to add more if requisite. The feathers must never be allowed to remain in the basin while the dye is poured in. When the dye is thoroughly mixed with the water, put the feathers in, and stir them about well with a pen or stick in each hand, that the color may take effect equally. When the feathers are of the shade you wish, take them out of the water with your little implement, and hang them to dry. We will now proceed to describe the various trimmings, illustrations of which are given in

Figs. 1 to 7. Fig. 1 is a pretty ornament for the hair, and looks extremely well with lace, ribbon bows, or flowers. It admits of great variety in the combination and arrangement of the colors; and, after describing the manner in which it is made, we must leave each lady to exercise her taste and ingenuity in the matter, merely remarking that the feathers of all kinds of foreign birds are very available for this purpose, as they need only match each other in pairs. For the foundation take a piece of rather thin Bristol board, three-quarters of an inch in depth and one inch and one-eighth in width; slope the outer corners towards the centre, leaving one-quarter of an inch in the middle for the body, which must be sloped and rounded at the extremities, and slightly fold the card-board straight across, depth ways, on each side of this. This piece is for the support of the wings (it is better to be colored black on the under side), and to it the feathers composing them must be fixed with strong gum-Arabic. For these, feathers having a larger and stronger shaft than those forming the trimmings hereafter described must be selected; those for the two upper wings cut to about an inch and three-quarters in length, and for the lower ones an inch and a quarter; these last must overlap the former, part of one side of the feather being cut away that they may not do so too much. The feathers for the upper wings must also be shaped with the scissors, and sloped to meet the under ones, and both sets notched at the edge. Scarlet looks well for the upper wings, and buff or sulphur color for the lower ones (but these can be varied in any way); white spots may be painted on the scarlet with body or oil color, and black on the buff with lampblack, with which also the notches may be edged. The breast feathers of pheasants are very pretty for the centre, arranged something in the manner shown in Fig. 1, their natural markings coming in to great advantage. The very small neck feathers of the peacock, too, may be advantageously used for the same purpose. Having arranged the wings to your satisfaction, proceed to cut the shape of the butterfly's body in the Bristol board, about an inch and three-quarters in length, rather pointed at one extremity, and rounded at the other for the head; paint the under side black, and cover the upper with black velvet gummed on; but, before doing so, put between it and the former piece of card-board two of the thinnest filaments of a peacock's feather

(or, if not thin enough, cut them narrower), about one inch and three-quarters in length, for the antennæ; these, being so very light, are the best things for the purpose, as they move with the air, and give a more natural appearance. Now insert into the centre of the under piece of card-board a short length of fine wire (such as is used for artificial flowers) put through the loop in the wire fastens it to the hair in any required position. Figs. 2 and 3 are well adapted for bands to loop up the tunic of a white tarlatane or crape ball dress.

Fig. 3.

A foundation must be made by folding a double piece of the same material as the dress, rather narrower than the feathers will cover, and on it, for Fig. 2, are to be fixed a row of five twisted round a knitting needle, and make a small loop at the disengaged end; it only remains now to gum on the body in its proper place, and the butterfly is complete. A hairpin feathers in breadth, of any light or bright color preferred, placed not quite straight across, but in the manner shown in the illustration. There are to be five rows of the same feathers also in height, as distinctly seen in the illustration, and then by way of contrast the tip of a large dark green and black cock's feather, or a peacock's eye, which would have the best effect at the same purpose, for a mourning dress, is composed entirely of black feathers, arranged in the form there shown, and edged with very light narrow ones. Some gray feathers might night, with a very small feather of the same color as the rest on each side of it to make up the width. There are two ways of fastening on the feathers. Some people fix them with very strong gum-Arabic at the quill end of

be intermixed in any way preferred to lighten this trimming; and, in order to adapt them to any desired shape, all and any of the feathers may be cut with sharp scissors to give them the proper form and make them fit in where re-each, but the most secure way is sewing over every feather twice on each side the top of the quill. The peacock's feather and the smaller colored ones are to be repeated in the manner shown in the illustration till you have the required length. Fig. 3, which is intended for quired. Fig. 4 is a narrow trimming for the edge of the tunic, to correspond with the looping up, and, in the choice and arrangement of the colors, must be made to match the others. Fig. 5 is a rosette, which may be used for many purposes, composed of single white or colored feathers, which, being rounded at the tip with scissors, are arranged in circles on a foundation of stiff tulle; the centre is filled up with a few longer, slightly curled feathers, prepared before fixing with the back of a heated knife. Fig. 6 is peculiarly adapted for trimming the low bodice of a ball dress, like a bertha. It is composed entirely of the single barbs of white ostrich feathers, curled as before directed, arranged in the manner shown in the illustration in a kind of continuous row of rosettes, which appear as if tied together by loops of white floss silk placed in the centre of each. Ostrich feathers, which have become worn at the tips, or otherwise damaged, may be made available for this trimming, which is to be repeated in a narrower width round the short sleeves; and Fig. 7 is a fringe for the edge of the tunic to correspond. Strong gum-Arabic will be the most expeditious way of fastening these barbs to the foundation either of stiff tulle or tarlatan. The same trimming looks still lighter and more delicate if made with marabout instead of ostrich feathers.

CROCHET BANDS FOR LINEN.

THE bands for tying the linen together, of which Figs. 1 and 2 show a part about the real size, may be knitted, crocheted, or made of soft cotton tape, with a simple pattern in point Russe worked on it with Turkey red cotton. Those of which illustrations are given, are crocheted with white and red cotton, about one yard and five-eighths in length, and form a loop at one end. For Fig. 1, make a chain of the required length, and join to the 40th stitch to make the loop. Work on each side of the foundation chain (but only on the outer side of the loop part) a row of dc, taking up every chain, and in the round part at the end of the loop putting two stitches in one, so as to keep it flat. Then, still going round, a row of trebles (thread once over the needle), with 1 ch. between, and missing 1 of the last row; when the round end of the loop is reached, 2 ch. or 3 ch. between (still only missing the 1 stitch) as may be found necessary to keep the outer row flat; and, having completed the row by joining to the commencement by a single stitch, fasten off. With the red cotton, work a row of close scallops all round the edge, thus

(taking up every stitch of last row): * 1 dc, 1 treble, 2 long (twice round), 1 treble, 1 dc, and repeat from *. The other band, Fig. 2, is commenced with the red cotton, making a chain of the required length; join in a loop as before and work on both sides, except at the loop, 1 dc., 1 ch. alternately, missing a stitch. On both sides of this centre strip, dc. round each ch. 1s to be worked, in white cotton, and 1 ch. after it; repeat. Then follows a row all round of trebles, with 1 ch. between, missing 1 of the last row, keeping the end of the loop as before; and, lastly, a row of picots, with 2 dc. between, with the red cotton, each picot consisting of 4 ch., and dc. into the first of them.

TRAVELLING-BAG.

THE pretty bag made with a strap to hang over the shoulder—the practical arrangement of the inside being shown in Fig. 2—is, in our model of glazed holland, made up with a somewhat darker embroidery of silk braid stitched on, and silk stitches, a cord of the same color going all round, and tassels. A skilful hand will find no difficulty in the making up of such a bag; we shall, therefore, confine ourselves to the most needful directions. The front, hind parts, and flap of this satchel, eight and a half inches high, ten and three-quarters inches wide below, and seven and a quarter inches above, are of one piece of the stuff taken double.

On the front, plain half of the bag, three-quarters of an inch from the upper edge on the upper layer of the stuff, must be put a pocket, which, as seen, stitched with brown and made in single stuff, being four and a half inches long, five and a half inches wide at the top, and four and a half inches below, is stitched on in two rows. A similar pocket, yet somewhat larger, is to be sewn for the inside space to the inner stuff layer of the hind wall. After the two stuff parts have been finished so far, they are then joined to the flap by a run and fell, and, for the bottom part are stitched six divisions, each half an inch from the outer edge for the putting in of whalebone.

Fig. 1.

The upper edge is to be turned over as a hem and arranged by the stitched-on lining to put in two pieces of whalebone; three lines of stitching for two smaller pieces of whalebone mark the upper edge of the hind wall. The rounded folding sides, each at the top with a piece of whalebone cracked in the middle, of double stuff, and two and three-quarter inches wide, are next to be joined to the lined part by a run and fell and to the largest part by the side stitches. Brown silk cord edges round the folding sides and the bag flap.

The two straps for bearing the bag, with each a button-hole at end—the pointed ends of which lead through each of the button-holes of the flap—make at the same time the end straps two and a half inches long of the inner bag; and of double stuff are each twenty-eight and a half inches long and three-quarters of an inch wide, decorated with two rows of braid stitched on, and to be button-holed with brown silk at the lower pointed ends. The place where each strap is securely fastened in the button-hole of the flap is hidden on the outside by a gimp-button.

A small steel buckle lock, of two parts, joins in the manner usual for leather-bags; the two straps may be made longer or shorter, the part going under having a cord strap to slip through the other strap, with a silk tassel attached. Two tassels put on the flap finish the decoration of our model.

TENT PENWIPER.

Materials.—Red and black leather, and some black, stiff muslin.

THE outer covering of the little tent consists of two equal parts of different colored leather, plaited into each other, as represented in the design. Fold a red and a black strip of leather, each measuring one inch and five-eighths broad and six inches long, in the middle, to three inches in length. From the folded size make five straight cuts, one inch and five-eighths, so that there are six equal narrow strips. These somewhat rounded ends may be cut in corners, in round or pointed scallops. Then plait the prepared leather parts into each other, so that the closed side of one strip incloses the open side of the other (see Fig. 2), beginning from the under plain ends. When the plaiting is finished, cut the inner double muslin leaves (a little smaller than the outer part). In order to support the leather walls, a kind of stick of rolled pasteboard, gummed together, two and three-eighths inches long, and nearly half an inch in diameter at the bottom, and tapering at the top, is pushed in at the point of the tent, and fastened there, together with the points of the muslin leaves. A stick, two inches long, the under end of which is hidden in the pasteboard-stick, is cut out of wood, around which red silk is twisted, and upon it is placed a black, red, and white silk braid flag.

GOLD POCKET WITH BELT.

THIS pocket is intended to hold gold, jewelry, and similar articles, and will be found very useful in travelling. The original is made of a double piece of linen sixteen inches long and eight inches wide; the top is cut slightly convex, while the bottom is rounded. In the middle of the upper piece, cut a slit five inches and a half long, beginning about three inches from the top. Work the edges of the slit in button-hole stitch with red cotton. Work the edges of the pocket in the same manner, putting the needle through the double material of the pocket. Bind the top of the pocket between the linen band, in doing which, catch the end of a red cord ten inches long, the other end of which is attached to an oval ring drawn over the pocket. For this ring, take three pieces of bonnet wire, and over them work button-hole stitches with red cotton. A brass ring worked in single crochet may be used instead. Sew hooks and eyes to the belt for fastening.

COVER TO BE PLACED OVER DISHES, FOR KEEPING EGGS WARM ON THE BREAK- FAST TABLE.

THIS cover is made of white linen lined with red flannel, which has previously been slightly quilted. A square of guipure d'art is sewn into the linen on the upper part of the cover; a lace border to correspond, one inch and one-fifth wide, is sewn on all round. Cut two pieces of linen, or stiff gauze, and of flannel, each ten inches square; quilt each flannel part, stitch it through in diamonds, and line the cover with them. The upper part of the cover is ornamented from illustration with a square of gimpure d'art; the latter consists of a centre of plain netting, five and three-fifths inches square, darned in point d'esprit and darning stitch. The upper half of the cover is then ornamented with lace; work a row of herring-bone stitch with thread along the outer edge of the cover, and a similar row with red wool along the inner edge. The netted square is likewise shown, and labels on each, the sheets, tablecloths, or whatever it may be, fastened together by the bands, of which we give an illustration. The labels for the packets of linen are cut out in card-board in the form shown in illustration, and covered with shirting—calico or linen—previously ornamented in front in point russe with ingrain red cotton; the initials worked in edged with a herring-bone stitch row, worked with thread. Sew both parts of the cover together along two sides; sew on loops and buttons round the two other sides, as can be seen on illustration.

satin stitch, adding the name of the article contained in the packet, either in single point russe or in marking ink. For the table linen it is well to give a more particular description, such as "Tablecloths for twelve," "for eighteen," etc. Two slits are cut horizontally in front of the label, of the length requisite to allow the crochet band to pass through, and these slits are worked over with long overcast stitches

LABEL FOR PACKETS OF LINEN.

KEEPING a linen closet in order is such an important branch of housekeeping that we give our readers this month a plan, which, if followed, will save much trouble. Have a shelf devoted to each suit of articles, with covers, as (not close together) with the red cotton, and the outer edge of the label is ornamented round in the same manner.

LADY'S UNDER BODICE WITH SHORT SLEEVES (KNITTING).

Materials.—One ounce and a half of single Berlin wool in half ounce skeins, of any color preferred; five wooden or bone knitting needles, No. 10; a bone crochet hook to suit the wool; and six mother of pearl shirt buttons.

COMMENCE the bodice at the wrist, by casting on loosely 120 stitches, divided on 4 needles, 30 on each. It is knitted in rows backwards and forwards, first (for the edge) in ribs of 2 plain, 2 purl, for 12 rows, afterwards alternately one row plain, one row purl, so that the right side of the work should appear to be all plain knitting. The 13th row is pl'n; and continue knitting backwards and forwards to the end of the 24th row. 25th row. 16 plain, increase in the following stitch by knitting a plain and a purl in it; 14 plain, increase as before, 56 plain, increase, 14 plain, increase, 16 plain. 26th to 28th. Without increase. 29th. 17 plain, increase, 88 plain, increase, 17 plain. 30th to 32d. Without increase. 61st. 25 plain, increase, 94 plain, increase, 25 plain. 62d. Purl. 63d. The armhole begins. Knit the first 42 stitches backwards and forwards without increase to the 80th row for the right front. 81st. To give width on the shoulder, increase as before in the last stitch but one, and do the same in the 87th, 93d, and 99th rows. 100th to 106th. Without increase. 107th. Cast off the first 8 stitches, knit the rest plain. 108th. Purl. 109th. Cast off the first 3 stitches, knit the rest plain.

111th and 113th. Like the 109th. 114th. Purl. There should now be 29 stitches left. 115th. The shoulder-piece commences, for which knit the first 6 stitches plain; turn back, and purl the same 6 stitches. Knit 12 plain, turn back, and purl the same 12 stitches. Knit 16 plain, turn back, and purl the same 16 stitches. Knit 21 plain, turn back, and purl the 21 stitches. Knit 27 plain, turn back, and purl the 27 stitches. Knit 21 plain, turn back, and purl the same 21 stitches. Knit 16 plain, turn back, and purl the 16 stitches. Knit 12 plain, turn back, and purl the same 12 stitches. Knit 6 plain, turn back, and purl the same 6 stitches; then knit a plain and purl row with all the 29 stitches of the right front piece. Knit the second front in the same way to correspond exactly with this one. The middle stitches for the back must then be knitted straight backwards and forwards for 16 rows. In the 17th row, after the 1st stitch, and before the last, increase in the same manner as before, and do the same in the 23d, 29th, 36th, and 42d rows. After the latter 12 more straight rows follow; then the outer stitches of the back on each side must be cast off, on the wrong side, with those of the corresponding front, putting the two needles together, knitting a stitch from each at the same time, and passing one over the other, as in the heel of a stocking. Knit the stitches remaining in the centre of the back for 6 more straight rows, increasing in the 1st of them after the 1st stitch, and before the last; when the 6 rows are completed, cast off, and sew the ends of this narrow strip to the shoulder-pieces. For the short sleeves, pick up 66 stitches from the edge of the armhole on 3 needles, and knit them for 15 rounds in ribs of 2 plain, 2 purl, like the top of a stocking, then cast off loosely. Round the throat and down both sides of the front a strip of 7 or 8 rows is to be worked in double crochet (either with the same wool or a contrast, as may be preferred), taking up both the upper threads of the stitch. In the 4th row six buttonholes are to be made in the right front, at equal distances, by making 2 chain and missing 2 stitches of the former row. If a smaller-sized bodice is wanted, use steel needles No. 12.

DIRECTIONS FOR THE ENTERTAINMENT OF VISITORS.

WHEN inviting company never undertake more than you can perform with credit to yourself; understand your resources, and what ought to be expected of you in your circumstances. Do not aim to an equality in entertainments with more wealthy people.

To Serve a Good Dinner for a Party of Gentlemen who do not Use Wine.—Unless the table is very handsome, it should first be covered with a colored tablecloth, after which a white cloth must be spread evenly over the table. If twelve guests are invited, set fourteen plates, as directed, with knife, fork, tablespoon, napkin, goblet, and salt; place the knife with the handle towards the right; the fork on the left, with the handle towards the edge of the table; napkin and goblet on the right; spoon between goblet and plate; and salt on the left. A side table should be spread, containing water, a plate of bread, extra napkins, fourteen large and twenty-eight small plates, also fruit, nuts, and fruit napkins; as many large and small knives and forks as there are small plates.

The bread should be cut in squares, and a piece laid on each napkin. The castor should be placed in the centre of the table, jellies and relishes at the corners, spoons put on tastily in places convenient for the dishes. When dinner is ready, the lady of the house may inform her husband. The soup should be placed before the lady of the house, the soup plates having been placed beside her plate when the table was laid; a waiter should fill the goblets while the soup is passing, which should be offered to every guest, commencing at her right hand, without remark. The host in the mean time should notice if any guest refuses soup; if so, he will serve them with fish, which stands before him. The waiter must notice when the guests are through with soup, take the plate immediately, and bring him fish if desired. The hostess must help the host last, and the host the hostess in like manner. When the fish has been served, remove soup, fish plates, knives, and forks. A boiled turkey is placed before the host, oyster sauce on his left, with the handle of the ladle towards the edge of the table; potatoes on the right, which should be mashed; and turnips on the left. Another platter containing beef may be placed before a guest, who is requested to carve; and another to balance on the other side, with duck or some other fowl, may be set before some other guest, who should also be requested to carve. If ham or beef is on the table with the turkey, it will be all sufficient, but two distinct varieties of meat are absolutely necessary for a genteel dinner. When the guests have finished with this course, the table must be entirely cleared, and the first cloth removed; the pudding should then be placed before the hostess, and the relishes before the host. She commences at the right as before, and passes a piece to each guest, the host passing the relishes. When this is finished, the waiter brings on the fruit, nuts, &c.; the plates, napkins, knives, &c., are placed before each guest with as little parade as possible. When the dessert is finished, the lady gives a signal to the host, and rises from the table, taking the arm of her escort, who should have been seated at her right, and leads the way to the parlor, where coffee should be immediately served, unless served at the table as a last course.

Directions for Evening Parties.—It is quite fashionable now to spread a table in the dining-room, to which the guests are invited for refreshment. Much taste can be employed in decorating the table; where flowers are plenty, nothing is more beautiful than well-arranged bouquets. A few articles are deemed essential for parties; chicken salad, ice cream, whips or flummies, jellies, fruits, nuts, coffee and tea, sandwiches, cakes, and fancy confectioneries.

The large dishes should stand at the head and foot of the table, fancy dishes in the centre, to balance each other, and smaller in groups. Any person of taste can arrange to suit themselves much better than they can be directed. If you wish good coffee, don't allow it to be put on the fire until just before time to serve the refreshments; it is quite common to smell coffee two or three hours before it is served.

If possible, have all your arrangements concluded early, that you may not look jaded or care-worn. Do not appear anxious if any accident occurs, take no notice of it, or pass it lightly; don't ask if this or that relishes, or if the evening has passed pleasantly; take it for granted your guests are happy; nothing embarrasses visitors more than a fussy anxiety, fearing they are dull, &c. Be easy yourself, and your guests will feel the same. In your dress be simple, not pretending to make a show, that no person may feel that you are better dressed than themselves. Spend but little time with each guest, that all may receive your attentions; let your manners be quiet and dignified. If any guest brings a stranger uninvited, be particularly polite to them; if a gentleman, introduce him first to your husband, and then to others near; if a lady, introduce to the host, who will introduce her to others. In short, act the lady, and you will succeed in making your entertainments pleasant for your guests.

How to Treat Accidental Company.—In the first place, make your friends welcome; but do not make a fussy parade or show in doing it. If you can possibly do so, avoid cooking on their account; it makes a person feel uncomfortable to find themselves the occasion of extra trouble. Better by far give them without comment the best the house affords ready prepared, and spend the time of the visit in their society. It is generally supposed our friends are not obliged to make visits to supply the deficiencies at home; and we are to take the visit as a desire for our society rather than the costly viands with which we might load our table. When friends come from a distance, be particularly careful not to have them imagine their visit ill-timed; do not complain of poor help, or want of room to make them as comfortable as you would wish. If you have a good room, give it them; if, on the other hand, your accommodations are not such as you would desire on their account and your own, make no apology, do not let them see your mortification, but act as though you felt satisfied with yourself and the world. If you have all you need, and your friends have hardly as much of this world as would be for their comfort, be careful not to wound their feelings by an ostentatious show of the comforts you happen to be blessed with, but appear as though your friends were accustomed to every luxury, and these trifles were only a matter of course. When a friend arrives, it is expected they need the refreshment both of toilet and table; as soon as congratulations are over, and their luggage arrived, show them to their rooms. Be sure that every article needed is there before you go up. Do not be obliged to call for water, towels, &c., but let them think the room was in order for company before their arrival. A bit of meat relishes well after a journey, if it can be obtained without too much trouble. Do not hurry your guests at their toilet, but be ready as soon as they have finished their toilet to serve refreshments.

Allow them to propose retiring at night, instead of saying yourself, "Our friends must be fatigued after their journey, and we will retire early on their account." If convenient, their room should be put in order while breakfast is serving; if not, as soon as possible after. Do not allow a guest ever to feel that you are putting yourself to trouble on their account. If you make changes, do it quietly, that it may not be noticed. It is much more agreeable to a guest to be treated to plain fare than to feel they are making needless trouble.

MISCELLANEOUS COOKING.

Lamb Cutlets (a French dish).—Cut a loin of lamb into chops. Remove all the fat, trim them nicely, scrape the bone, and see that it is the same length in all the cutlets. Lay them in a deep dish, and cover them with salad oil. Let them steep in the oil for an hour. Mix together a sufficiency of finely-grated bread-crumbs, and a little minced parsley, seasoned with a very little pepper and salt, and some grated nutmeg. Having drained the cutlets from the oil, cover them with the mixture, and broil them over a bed of hot, live coals, on a previously heated gridiron, the bars of which have been rubbed with chalk. The cutlets must be thoroughly cooked. When half done, turn them carefully. You may bake them in an oven, instead of broiling them. Have ready some boiled potatoes, mashed smooth and stiff with cream or butter. Heap the mashed potatoes high on a heated dish, and make it into the form of a dome or bee-hive. Smooth it over with the back of a spoon, and place the lamb cutlets all round it, so that they stand up and lean against it, with the broad end of each cutlet downward. In the top of the dome of potatoes, stick a handsome bunch of curled parsley.

Veal Loaf.—Take a cold fillet of veal, and (omitting the fat and skin) mince the meat as fine as possible. Mix with it a quarter of a pound of the fattest part of a cold ham, also chopped small. Add a teacupful of grated bread-crumbs, a grated nutmeg, half a dozen blades of mace powdered, the grated yellow rind of a lemon, and two beaten eggs. Season with a salt-spoon of salt, and half a salt-spoon of cayenne. Mix the whole well together, and make it in the form of a loaf. Then glaze it over with beaten yolk of egg, and strew the surface evenly all over with bread raspings, or with pounded cracker. Bake it half an hour, or till hot all through. Have ready a gravy made of the trimmings of the veal, stewed in some of the gravy that was left when the fillet was roasted the day before. When sufficiently cooked, take out the meat, and thicken the gravy with beaten yolk of egg, stirred in about three minutes before you take it from the fire. Send the veal loaf to table in a deep dish, with the gravy poured round it. Chicken loaf, or turkey loaf, may be made in this manner.

Veal Olives.—Take some cold fillet of veal and cold ham, and cut them into thin square slices of the same size and shape, trimming the edges evenly. Lay a slice of veal on every slice of ham, and spread some beaten yolk of egg over the veal. Have ready a thin force-meat, made of grated bread-crumbs, sweet-marijoram rubbed fine, fresh butter, and grated lemon-peel, seasoned with nutmeg and a little cayenne pepper. Spread this over the veal, and then roll up each slice tightly with the ham. Tie them round securely with coarse thread or fine twine; run a bird-splint through them, and roast them well. For sauce, simmer in a small sauce-pan some cold veal gravy with two spoonfuls of cream, and some mushroom catchup.

them, and then mince them very fine. Add grated bread, and season with a very little salt and pepper, some powdered mace and nutmeg, and some grated lemon-rind. Moisten the whole with cream, and make them up into small cones or sugar-loaves, forming and smoothing them nicely. Have ready some beaten egg, mixed with grated bread-crumbs. Dip into it each croquette, and fry them slowly in fresh butter. Serve them hot, standing up on the dish, and with a sprig of parsley in the top of each. Sweetbreads should never be used unless perfectly fresh. They spoil very rapidly. As soon as they are brought from market they should be split open and laid in cold water. Never attempt to keep sweetbreads till next day, except in cold weather. Similar croquettes may be made of cold broiled chicken, or cold roast veal, or of oysters, minced raw, and seasoned and mixed as above.

A Beef Steak Pot-Pie.—Remove the fat and bone from two pounds or more of fine, tender beef steaks, and cut them into small pieces. Season them slightly with a very little salt and pepper; put them into a pot with a piece of fresh butter rolled in flour, and just water enough to cover them. Let them stew slowly (skimming them as soon as the water comes to a boil) for an hour. Boil in another pot some white potatoes (a dozen small or eight large ones), cut into quarters. While the steak is stewing, make a paste of finely minced beef-suet and flour, in the proportion of a pound and a half of suet to three pounds of flour. For a large pot-pie, you should have more than the above quantity of paste; the paste being always considered the best part of the pie, and much liked by those who eat it at all. Having rubbed the minced suet into the pan of flour, add a very little salt, and as little water as will suffice to make it into a lump of dough. Beat the dough hard on both sides with the rolling-pin, to assist in making it light and flaky. Divide the dough into two portions; roll out one sheet thicker than the other. Line the sides of a clean iron pot about half-way or two-thirds up with the thin paste. Then, having poured a little of the gravy into the bottom of the pot, put in a layer of the half-stewed beef; then a layer of the thick paste, cut into long squares. Then a layer of the quartered potatoes; then meat; then paste; then potatoes, and so on till the whole is in. Pour on the remainder of the gravy, and add also a pint of warm water. Cover it well with a sheet of the thin paste, so as to form a close top-crust, uniting it round the edges with the paste that lines the sides. Then fill up the pot with boiling water, and place it over a moderate fire, and boil it slowly for an hour or more. Send it to table on a large dish—the meat, and potatoes, and soft crust in the middle, and the hard crust cut into pieces and laid round. Serve up the gravy in a boat. A pot-pie of fowls or rabbits may be made as above. If you prefer butter to suet for making the paste, allow half a pound of fresh butter to each pound of flour. Cut up the butter into the pan of flour, rub it fine with your hands, wet it with as little water as possible, beat and roll it out as above.

Fried Celery.—Take fine large celery, cut it into pieces three or four inches in length, and boil it tender, having seasoned the water with a very little salt. Then drain the pieces well, and lay them separately, to cool on a large dish. Make a batter in the proportion of three well-beaten eggs stirred into a pint of rich milk, alternately with half a pint of grated bread-crumbs, or of sifted flour. Beat the batter very hard after it is all mixed. Put into a hot frying-pan, a sufficiency of fresh lard, melt it over the fire, and when it comes to a boil, dip each piece of celery twice into the batter, put them into the pan, and fry them a light brown. When done, lay them to drain on an inverted sieve with a broad pan placed beneath it. Then dish the fried celery, and send it to table hot. Parsnips and salsify (or oyster plant) may be fried in butter according to the above directions. Also the tops of asparagus cut off from the stalk, and the white part or blossom of cauliflower. Cold sweet potatoes are very nice, peeled, cut into long slips, and fried in this way.

CAKES, PUDDINGS, ETC.

A Light Seed-Cake.—Take the yolks of six eggs and the whites of three, beat them well for half an hour; then put in six ounces of powdered loaf-sugar, mix it well with the eggs, add gradually seven ounces of flour and a few caraway-seeds; stir the whole well together, and put it into a pan or dish for baking. If the oven is hot, half an hour will bake it. The moment it is taken out of the oven, turn it out of the mould, and let it lie upside down until quite cold. Great care should be taken in the baking.

An Excellent Cake.—Rub two pounds of dry fine flour with one pound of butter washed in plain, and afterwards in rose-water; mix it with three spoonfuls of yeast in a little warm milk and water. Set it to rise an hour and a half before the fire; then beat into it two pounds of currants, one pound of sugar sifted, four ounces of almonds, six ounces of stoned raisins chopped fine, half a nutmeg, cinnamon, allspice, and a few cloves, the peel of a lemon chopped as fine as possible, a glass of wine, the same of brandy, twelve yolks and whites of eggs beaten separately; add orange, citron, and lemon. Beat the whole for half an hour. Bake in a quick oven.

Jumbles.—Take half a pound of flour, the same weight of loaf-sugar grated, two ounces of butter, rubbed in to the flour, one egg, and a dessertspoonful of brandy; make it up into a paste; if more moisture is required, add a spoonful of cream; drop it on tins with a fork.

Quaking Pudding.—Scald a quart of cream; when almost cold, put to it four eggs well beaten, one spoonful and a half of flour, some nutmeg, and sugar; tie it close in a buttered cloth, boil it an hour, and turn it out with care, lest it should crack. Serve with wine sauce.

Dame Jones's Pudding.—One pint of cream, eight yolks and five whites of eggs; melt a quarter of a pound of butter in a little of the cream; then mix in a quarter of a pound of sugar; when cool, put in a quarter of a pound of fine flour and the eggs. This quantity will make eight puddings, baked in small basins, at the bottom of which put a tablespoonful of currants well washed. Bake half an hour, and pour over them brandy or wine sauce.

Rolls.—Break an ounce of butter in very small pieces into a pound of the best flour, and add a little salt. Mix half an ounce of fresh yeast, and a little pounded sugar in a teaspoonful of lukewarm new milk, make a hollow in the centre of the flour, and pour this in gradually, stirring in sufficient of the flour to make a thick batter; strew more flour on the top, cover the pan with a thick cloth, and let it stand in a warm kitchen to rise. In about an hour, if it have risen considerably, mix a lightly whisked egg with another teaspoonful of warm new milk, and make the mass into a smooth dough. Cover it over as before, and in about half or three quarters of an hour, turn it out on a pasteboard, and divide into twelve portions of equal size. Knead these as lightly as possible into small round rolls, make a slight incision round them, and cut them once or twice across the top, placing them on slightly floured baking sheets a few inches apart. Let them remain a quarter of an hour or twenty minutes to rise, then wash the tops over with yolk of egg, mixed with a little milk, and bake them in a brisk oven for ten or fifteen minutes.

Orange Jam.—The following is an excellent receipt for preserving sweet oranges with rhubarb or apples: Put the oranges whole into cold water, boil them until the skins are tender, take them out, throw them into cold water, and leave them till the next day; weigh them, then cut them in quarters, take out the pips, and add two-thirds the weight in rhubarb or apples (the latter must be pared and cut into quarters). Melt an equal weight of sugar in a little water, add the fruit, and boil on a quick fire until the syrup is tolerably thick.

Editors' Table.

A NOBLE BENEFACTION.

THERE are many excellent seminaries for young ladies, both public and private, but, with the exception of two or three medical colleges and schools of design, there is no institution in which women can acquire what may be termed a professional education. Such an institution seems about to be supplied by the munificent bequest of a merchant of Boston. This gentleman, MR. JOHN H. SIMMONS, had, we are told, occasion to employ in his business many women in various capacities, and he had been much impressed with the defective training which most of them had received for their duties. He was thus induced to entertain the desire of making a provision which should enable women to prepare themselves for the necessity, which might come to any of them, of earning their own subsistence. By his will he has bequeathed property considered to be worth now not much less than a million and a half of dollars, and likely soon to be increased to nearly two millions, for the purpose of endowing a college for young women, in which the pupils are to be taught "medicine, music, designing, telegraphing, and other branches of art, science, and industry best calculated to enable scholars to acquire an independent livelihood."

This is, indeed, an act of noble and well-directed benevolence. We are glad to observe that the terms of the bequest are large enough to enable the trustees to furnish that professional education which all women ought to possess. This expression may surprise some persons who have not given the subject the attention it deserves. The need of professional training is commonly supposed to be limited to men and to those women who, as teachers, physicians, or artists, have to obtain a livelihood for themselves. This, however, is a grave mistake. It may truly be said that women in general, with so few exceptions as not to be worth mentioning, require this training even more than men. For, while men have usually only one profession or calling in which they are required to be adepts, women are expected to be proficient in four or five.

Every woman is expected to be qualified to take the office of housekeeper, either in her own household or in that of a kinsman or an employer. Every woman should be fitted to be a teacher, if not in a school, at least for her own children or others nearly connected with her, who may derive from her their earliest and most important instruction. Every woman is expected (in our country, at least) to be a dressmaker. Every wife and mother should, if the health of her husband and children is to be preserved, have some knowledge of medicine. And, finally, no one is qualified for the expenditure of the household moneys, which usually falls to the office of the wife, if she have not a knowledge of accounts.

Here are five professions—those of housekeeper, teacher, dressmaker, physician, and accountant—the duties of which every woman who undertakes the care of a household ought to be qualified to discharge, and which involve an acquaintance with the elements of several sciences and arts. How slightly women in general are prepared for these duties at the outset, and through what troubles, mistakes, sorrows, and losses—often the loss of the health or lives of those dearest to them—they struggle into the partial acquisition of this precious knowledge, are facts but too well known, and which most of our readers will be ready to attest from their own experience or observation. A young wife, who is certain that her husband has been thoroughly trained as a lawyer, engineer, mechanic, or merchant, sees him go out to his daily avocations with an assurance that they will be performed by him in a proper and profitable manner. But what assurance has the young husband, who places his bride in sole control of his household affairs, that she will not waste their common means, and injure the health of both and of the other members of their family, by mistakes which a proper education for her duties would have enabled her to avoid? That wealth and poverty are in the hands of the mistress of the house is an old experience. "He that would thrive must ask his wife," says the time-honored adage. If we rarely see half-trained professional men or tradesmen successful, how can we be surprised that in so many households all the labors of the hard-tasked husband cannot avail against the incompetency of his life-partner, who has undertaken the duties of her office with no better training than that which she could obtain from an equally ill-taught mother, and in many instances with not even that advantage?

Yet men have no right to be surprised at this result, while they deny to women those opportunities of scientific and systematic education for their future duties which are always open to men. Let the example which this clear-sighted and large-hearted Boston merchant has set be followed, not only by benevolent men, but by the public authorities throughout our country, and one of the greatest moral and social benefits which a people can enjoy will be the result.

LADY NURSES.

MUCH has been lately said of the benefits that would follow if the calling of sick nurse were elevated to a profession which an educated lady might adopt without a sense of derogation, either on her own part or in the estimation of others. A writer in an English periodical suggests that this result could be brought about by raising the scale of remuneration in the case of such lady nurses. He adduces the instance of the surgeon, who was formerly a mere mechanical assistant of the physician, and frequently combined the office with that of barber, but who is now a gentleman, receiving as high fees and held in the same estimation as other members of the medical profession. It appears evident, however, that the writer mistakes the effect for the cause. The surgeon of the present day is not respected because he receives high fees; but he obtains these fees because he is respected, and he is respected because he is a well-educated and thoroughly-trained professional man.

There can be no doubt that the duties of sick nurse, to be properly performed, require an education and training little, if at all, inferior to those possessed by members of the medical profession. To leave these duties to untaught and ill-trained persons is as great a mistake as it was to allow the office of surgeon to be held by one whose proper calling was that of a mechanic of the humblest class. The manner in which a reform may be effected is easily pointed out. Every medical college should have a course of study and training specially adapted for ladies who desire to qualify themselves for the profession of nurse; and those who had gone through the course, and passed the requisite examination, should receive a degree and diploma, which would at once establish their position in society. The "graduate nurse" would in general estimation be as much above the ordinary nurse of the present day as the professional surgeon of our times is above the barber-surgeon of the last century.

It would not, however, be necessary that the professional nurse should be educated in a medical institution, although the degree or diploma should in all cases proceed from one. In this respect the example of the English universities might be followed, in awarding degrees to out-students who are found qualified to pass the requisite examination. Physicians (either doctors or doctresses) might receive pupils desirous of qualifying themselves for the profession of nurse. If the pupil had already a good general education (which would be absolutely essential), a year devoted to the special studies of medicine and science, and another year of reading and practice combined, would probably be sufficient for this object. It must be borne in mind, however, that in this profession, as in all others, there would be no short road to proficiency, and that the higher the qualifications the better, as a general rule, would be the remuneration.

When once the value of the "graduate nurses" becomes known, there is no doubt that the demand for them would be very great. Every village of a thousand inhabitants would, with the country about it, give occupation for two or three, at least. In any case of severe and protracted illness, their services would be called for as a matter of course, when the circumstances of the family allowed it. Every physician would be glad to recommend an assistant, on whose intelligent co-operation he could rely, and who would be too well informed to interfere with his treatment, as uneducated nurses are apt to do. There are many diseases in which the patient must owe his recovery chiefly to diet, regimen, and careful attendance. In all such cases the graduate nurse would be invaluable. In committing the control of the sick room into her hands, the family would feel the same sense of relief and security as is felt by the passengers in a ship, when, in stormy weather off a dangerous coast, an experienced pilot comes on board to take charge of the vessel.

There would be the further advantage that the nurse would not be an ignorant and unrefined person, with whom association would be unpleasant, but an educated lady, who would form an acceptable addition to the family circle during a period of anxiety and trouble—one who could give useful counsel on many subjects besides those of the sick chamber, and who would know how to economize not only her own health and strength, but the health and strength of the household, which are apt to be taxed too severely when any member of it is ill for a long period. In short, whenever such a profession is once established, it will soon be deemed as useful and respectable as any other; and, to revert to our former comparison, we shall wonder as much that we could have done without its members as we now wonder that our ancestors were content to allow the operations of surgery to be performed by a hair-cutter.

WOMEN IN SCHOOL BOARDS.

THERE is one field of public life, if such it may be called, which women may well desire to occupy. It is, indeed, a province which may be said to belong to them. Many years ago, Mrs. Emma Willard, who accomplished so much in raising the standard and improving the methods of education, was accustomed to urge the importance of establishing boards of management, composed of women, to superintend the discipline and internal arrangements of schools, leaving the financial affairs to the "school trustees," who (as their title seems to imply) would be men of business. This idea, which appears to us an excellent one, has never been fully carried into effect. But the new school law of England, which promises to make a great improvement in the educational system of that country, specially provides for the admission of women as members of the elective School Boards which the act creates. At a great public meeting recently held at Greenwich, to prepare for the election, Mr. Stuart Mill, who presided, declared that, in his opinion, "it was of the utmost importance that there should be a proportion of women in the board," a declaration which was received by his audience with applause. Mr. Mill went on to give his reasons for his opinion in his usual terse and clever language. "In the first place," he said, "we have girls to educate, as well as boys; and a national education for girls, directed solely by men, would be an absurdity on the face of it. Moreover, women, as the principal domestic teachers, have more experience, and have acquired more practical ability in the teaching, at least, of children. Almost every mother of a family is a practiced teacher, and even beyond the family. For one man, not a teacher by profession, who has given much of his attention to teaching, or to the superintendence of teaching, there are many women who have done so." If the distinguished orator had been speaking in this country, he might have added that as the great majority of the school teachers are women, it would be in every way most proper that they should have superintendents of their own sex to direct and sustain them. It would seem that Mr. Mill's views met with general acceptance, as three ladies were afterwards elected as members of the London Board, one of them receiving more votes than any other candidate.

It will be observed, however, that this is not exactly the system which Mrs. Willard, as the result of her long experience, suggested. Her committee of women would have been a separate board, bearing much the same relation in its duties to the board of trustees that the wife bears to the husband in household affairs. This would seem to be a natural arrangement, and it is to be hoped that American legislators, incited by the example which has been set by the Parliament and people of conservative England, will adopt the system in this improved form. In that case, some other mode of forming the women's committee than election may possibly be preferred. A wife is not elected, but selected. The board of trustees might be empowered to choose their helpeest committee from among the ladies of their district whom they should judge best qualified for the office. The powers and duties of the committee would be fixed by the law, and should include especially the care of the school-house and the government of the pupils. If several respectable matrons were required to visit frequently the buildings in which these children and those of their neighbors were confined for five or six hours every day, we may be sure that they would not long allow the little creatures to inhale a poisonous atmosphere, or be oppressed with excessive tasks, or tortured with cruel punishments; nor yet would they permit them to be left in idleness and disorder.

We cannot but think that American women in general, even those who are most eager in demanding what they deem the "rights" of their sex, have failed to comprehend their duties in regard to the schools in which their sons and daughters are educated.

This English school law, however imperfect, may serve as a lesson and an incitement to something higher and better in the same direction.

BOOKS FOR HOME READING.

We have spoken so often of Jean Ingelow's poetry that our readers will not be surprised when we add her new volume to our Household Library. There is no topic of her verse which will not accord with the feelings and desires that cluster around the home. This book (Poems of Love and Childhood) has just been published by Roberts Brothers, of Boston, and will, no doubt, be a popular gift book for the holidays. It has Miss Ingelow's sweetness and poetry of thought, though here and there are obscurity and a strain after effect, of which she must beware. We quote a poem called "The Long White Seam:"—

"As I came round the harbor buoy,
The lights began to gleam;
No wave the land-locked water stirred,
The crags were smooth as cream;
And I marked my love by candlelight
Sewing her long white seam.
* * * * *

"I climbed to reach her cottage door:
Oh, sweetly my love sings!
Like a shaft of light her voice breaks forth,
My soul to meet it springs.
As the shining water leaped of old
When stirred by angel wings.

"Fair fall the lights, the harbor lights,
That brought me in to thee;
And peace drop down on that low roof
For the sight that I did see;
And the voice, my dear, that rang so clear,
All for the sake of me.
For O, for O, with brows bent low,
By the candle's flickering gleam,
Her wedding gown it was she wrought,
Sewing the long white seam."

The other book which we would place in homes is a book for boys. It is called "The Adventures of a Young Naturalist," and is published by Messrs. Harper & Brothers. The scene is laid in Mexico. Little Lucien is the son of a scientific explorer, who makes long journeys on foot through the Mexican forests to collect rare specimens of plants and insects. When he is about to start upon one of these expeditions, Lucien begs to go with him, and after some hesitation his petition is granted. The other members of the party are a fellow Naturalist, an Indian servant, and a dog. Their adventures are numerous and exciting, and are so told as to illustrate the habits and instincts of the animals who people those tropical latitudes. The ground is almost new, for we believe that Captain Reid has never taken his young readers into Mexico; and this volume has the great advantage that it does not attempt long and labored descriptions of natural objects, but condenses into a few telling words all that a boy need know of them. Of course, Lucien and his companions meet with a more constant succession of adventures than would fall to the lot of an ordinary party, but that no boy will object to. The book is well written, though occasionally the phraseology is too ambitious. Whether it is a translation from the French we do not understand. The author is Lucien Blart; it is edited and adapted by Parker Gillmore. We commend it to any parent who desires that his son shall be instructed and amused by the same volume. The boys will read it eagerly, and will not have to strain their eyes over it in the winter evenings; the type is large and clear, and the pictures are excellent. No better idea could be given of tropical scenery than is furnished by these numerous illustrations.

NOTES AND NOTICES.

A NEW CHARITY.—The First Annual Report of the "Woman's Branch of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals" is now lying before us. This society could never have been formed but in an advanced state of civilization, when sympathy for the weak and suffering had become a powerful motive. The Report of the President, Mrs. Richard P. White, shows how grievous are the evils to be repressed. Horses and dogs, the humble friends and helpers of men, are maltreated every day before our eyes. This society is doing what it can for the dumb races that we so torment. It has put up drinking fountains throughout the city. It is erecting a pound for dogs, to save them from the slaughter caused by the present ordinance of councils; and it has agents stationed in the busiest localities to arrest and bring before a magistrate the ruffians who abuse their power. Twenty-three arrests were made from December to April last, and almost all the offenders were convicted and fined. It seems eminently fit that women should be foremost in so good a work. Their natural tenderness should display itself in shielding the helpless and shaming the cruel. We hope that many of our readers will enroll their names in this noble society. The office is at 1320 Chestnut Street, where Reports may be procured, and the names of members are enrolled.

The movement did not originate with ladies. The society has been doing its good work for many years. In April, 1869, the Woman's Branch was organized, by the earnest desire of the gentlemen of the association. The Mayor of Philadelphia, and several others were prominent in the movement; and the Woman's Branch has gone on and prospered steadily.

LONGEVITY.—The statistics of deaths at different ages in England and Wales, for the year 1868, show that there were 561 deaths registered of persons aged 95 years and upwards. Of these 561 persons, 178 were males and 383 females. Among them there were 63 persons—that is, 11 males and 52 females, who were a hundred years old and upwards. The oldest man was aged 111, and the oldest woman 114. It is stated that the registrars do not appear to have taken any steps to verify the representations as to the age of the persons returned as dying at these advanced ages.

MEN AND WOMEN CRIMINALS.—In the New Jersey State Prison there are 575 prisoners, including 26 females.

THE munificent bequests of Miss SOPHIA Smith, of Hatfield, Mass., for the establishment of a female college were made in a spirit manifested in the following words of the donor: "It is my opinion that by the higher and more thorough Christian education of women, their wrongs will be redressed, their wages adjusted, their weight of influence in reforming the evils of society greatly increased; as teachers, as writers, as mothers, as members of society, their power for good will be incalculably enlarged."

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—The following articles are accepted: "Decoration Day"—"Tennessee"—"Autumn"—"Maiden with Soft Locks of Gold"—"How it Happened"—"Yearning"—"Dost Thou Care?"—"Doubts"—"Brother Nat's Ring"—"Grandma Dusenberry"—"Mother's Balm"—"Charade—Daylight"—"Soliloquy of Humphrey Gray, Bachelor."—"To Katie"—and "Sadness."

The following articles are declined: "My Haunted Room"—"Werner's Lament"—and "Sweet Tidings." "M. H.," Newburgh, O. Send a three-cent stamp. "The Face in the Crowd." No letter, no stamps. Will the author write us.

Health Department.

BY DR. CHARLES P. UHLE.

PAINFUL DIGESTION.

THE conditions of a healthy digestion are these: The food should be masticated, mixed with the saliva, and swallowed into the stomach; in the stomach it should be reduced to a semi-fluid consistence, and converted into a uniform pulp, called chyme; this chyme should be transmitted through the pylorus (the lower opening of the stomach) into the duodenum (the upper part of the bowels), and then mixed with the bile, the pancreatic juice, and the intestinal mucus; the whole should then be separated into two parts—the chyle, or the nutritious portion, to be taken up and carried to the blood, and the excrementitious portion to be conveyed through the intestines out of the body. When any of these conditions are wanting, when obstacles of any kind interfere with these processes, we have disordered digestion, or, as it is more generally termed among the people, dyspepsia, or painful digestion. Now, as it must be evident to every intelligent mind, these events occur from a variety of different causes, some directly, and others indirectly, influencing the process. And, in order to treat our subject properly, it will be necessary to examine them as they present themselves. We will commence at the mouth, and follow the food in its course through the body.

The first rupture of our "conditions of healthy digestion" we find exhibited in the very first act of the process, that of mastication. As a general rule, people do not chew their food as they ought. They eat in too much of a hurry, bolt it down in handfuls, and fail to mix it properly with the saliva. The starchy portions of our food must be converted into sugar before it is digested. All substances containing starch, such as flour, potatoes, pass through this process; and, when not thoroughly saturated with saliva, they lie in the intestinal canal, undissolved or incompletely so, until they pass well down its length and meet the pancreatic juice, when the process is completed. This decidedly disarranges the digestive process; for, although the pancreas was undoubtedly intended to perform part of this work, it was not put there to do the whole of it, or, at least, the greater part. We know a journeyman printer who was once much tormented with indigestion. Everything he ate at meal times "lay like a lump of lead" upon his stomach, and was the cause of much inconvenience and discomfort. In the course of events he was necessitated to change his residence, when his entire dyspepsia left him. He remained free from it until again compelled to move, when it returned as bad as ever, and no apparent cause could be discovered. Upon changing again his digestion began to improve, and soon became as sound as could be wished. This was for some time a great mystery. It was at length ascertained, however, that his indigestion depended not upon the locality in which he resided, but on its distance from the printing house. When far off, he ate his dinner with his family rapidly, having only time enough to walk home and back again within the hour. When he lived near, the time otherwise spent in walking was occupied in eating, or in cheerful converse with his wife and family. In other instances, where, by the loss of a lower lip—salivary fistula—or the dirty habit of spitting, the food is deprived of its natural quantity of saliva, we also witness its injurious effects upon digestion. Insufficient mastication and insalivation, therefore, is one great and common cause of dyspepsia.

The second condition of healthy digestion, as we have stated, is the breaking down or dissolving of the food in the stomach into a substance called chyme. This process is termed chymification, and is accomplished, first, by the action of the gastric juice, a watery-like fluid, which oozes forth in minute drops from the mucous coat of the stomach when the food or some solid substance is swallowed into it; second, by a churning or revolving movement of the stomach, which keeps its contents in constant motion, and secures its intimate admixture with the digestive fluids; and, third, by the action of the biliary, pancreatic, and intestinal juices, by which the process is completed.

These three digestive fluids—the gastric, biliary, and pancreatic juices—act in a different manner upon the different articles of food. The former operates more especially on the albuminous, and the latter upon the fatty compounds, while the biliary separates the excretory matters from the chyme, renders oleaginous matters more suitable for being absorbed, prevents the too rapid decomposition of albuminous food, and facilitates the assimilation of the nutritive portions of the food in general. Now, dyspepsia may be induced by any cause which increases, diminishes, or in any way interferes with the secretion of these three fluids.

When the gastric juice is in excess, we have a "sour stomach," as it is called, one of the most common causes of indigestion among scrofulous and consumptive patients. This excess of acid is often so great as to neutralize the alkaline action of the pancreatic juice, and render it incapable of emulsifying fatty matter. On the other hand, the gastric juice may be diminished in quantity, as it frequently is, from the effects of continued gluttony, drunkenness, mental work, or any thing which weakens and wears out the nervous energy of the stomach and digestive organs. A sense of load after eating is generally indicative of slow digestion from this cause.

When the pancreatic secretion is deficient, or wanting from obstruction of the pancreatic ducts, the fatty portion of the food remains undigested, a source of pain and inconvenience, and passes through the body unchanged.

When the bile is insufficient in quantity, the bowels become constipated, gases form in the intestines, oleaginous matters do not dissolve readily, and disordered digestion is sure to arise as a consequence. When it is secreted in excess, it acts as an irritation to the intestines, produces frequent alvine discharges, accompanied with much distress in the stomach and bowels, and puts digestion (below the point where it enters the intestines) entirely at a standstill as long as it continues.

But there is another sort of indigestion that must be noticed in this place, and that is the impediments—direct and indirect—to the natural and healthy contractile movements of the stomach and intestines. The organs of digestion, it must be remembered, are highly endowed with nervous susceptibility. The pneumogastric—a nerve, or rather a large bundle of nerves, emanating directly from the cerebral mass—passes downwards through the neck, and distributes branches to the pharynx, larynx, oesophagus, lungs, heart, and finally to the stomach, liver, pancreas, duodenum, and other organs concerned in the office of digestion and assimilation. This nerve supplies these parts with motion and sensation; every movement they make, every impression they receive, is transmitted through it from the great nervous centre, the brain. It is evident, therefore, that whatever cause disturbs the harmony of these proceedings—whether it be through the medium of the brain itself, or more directly through injury or accident to the nerve—interferes proportionately with the digestive process. The experiments of physiologists have shown that section of the pneumogastric, by arresting the contractile movements of the stomach, permits only that part of the food in contact with the secreting coat of the organ to be digested. This fact at once explains the reason why it is that mental emotion, hard study, or other absorbing mental occupation, is productive of indigestion. It calls off the nervous energy of the stomach (by concentrating it strongly elsewhere), depresses its nervous powers, and retards or checks entirely that important process of securing the thorough admixture of the food with the digestive fluids. The same effects are produced by the habit of tight lacing, so common among the ladies, although, of course, in a different manner.

We now come to the third and last mentioned condition of healthy digestion—that of the absorption of the nutritious, and removal of the unnutritious portions of our food. The former need not occupy our attention in this place, the only immediate effect of its perverted action being a loss of flesh, or anæmia, from a deficiency of nutritive materials. The latter, however, is of more importance, for, whenever the process is temporarily effected, that of digestion is interfered with in proportion.

We shall resume this subject in the next number.

Literary Notices.

From LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

DOROTHY FOX. By the author of "How it happened," etc. A readable novel of English life, in which the heroine, a pretty little Quaker girl, is admirably drawn.

FERNYHURST COURT. An Every-day Story. By the author of "Lettice Lisle," etc. We like this story well. It is pleasantly written, and its characters are all well conceived and well delineated. Its illustrations are numerous and creditable.

From PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

BESSY RANE. A Novel. By Mrs. Henry Wood, author of "East Lynne," etc. Mrs. Wood may not be the most brilliant of writers, but her stories are always entertaining, while their moral tone is unexceptionable. Indeed, for that part of the reading public who do not demand high literary merit, we know of no English writer whom we can more heartily recommend.

THE DEAD SECRET. A Novel. By Wilkie Collins.

THE STOLEN MASK. A Novel. By Wilkie Collins.

A reprint of two of the earlier novels of the best English sensational writer. Every one should read Wilkie Collins's stories.

A RENT IN THE CLOUD. By Charles Lever. One volume of Peterson's edition of Charles Lever's works. It is not, perhaps, as full of roystering merriment as some of his Irish stories, but is, to our mind, quite as pleasing.

ROSE DOUGLAS. An entertaining Scottish story, which will, no doubt, be new to most of our readers.

MAJOR JONES'S COURTSHIP. Detailed, with other Scenes, Incidents, and Adventures, in a Series of Letters by Himself.

From HARPER & BROTHERS, New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS and LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

WOMAN'S RECORD; or, Sketches of all Distinguished Women from the Creation to A. D., 1868. Arranged in four Eras. With Selections from Authoresses of each Era. By Mrs. Hale, authoress of "Northwood," etc. Illustrated by two hundred and thirty portraits. Third edition, revised, with additions. This is the most complete and comprehensive work of its kind ever issued, and has only been prepared and compiled after vast and exhaustive research. It is a work that has already become a standard and a recognized authority. The editor of a work published in London, who has made up his own book chiefly from "Woman's Record," frankly confesses his obligations to the American work. He says, in his preface, "Such a complete record of womanly excellence and ability cannot fall of being highly interesting and useful; and it must be evident to all that the task of its compilation must have been one of great labor and research; far more, indeed, than the present editor can claim credit for—his work having been chiefly that of condensation from a large and costly volume published in America, and entitled 'Woman's Record,' by Mrs. Hale, who states in her preface that it cost her three years of hard study and labor—a volume which in itself is a striking example of feminine ability in authorship."

MY APINGI KINGDOM: with Life in the Great Sahara, and Sketches of the Cobra, of the Ostrich, Hyena, etc. By Paul Du Chailly, author of "Discoveries in Equatorial Africa," etc. This book, written especially for youth, is equally interesting for adults. It is in some sort a sequel to "Lost in the Jungle," as it takes up the story of Du Chailly's adventures where that volume leaves them. Though based upon actual facts and occurrences, the narrative reads as interesting as romance. This class of books is an especially desirable one to place in the hands of our children.

THE WARDEN and BARCHESTER TOWERS. By Anthony Trollope. Everybody should read the series of novels by Anthony Trollope of which "The Warden" is the opening volume, and "The Last Chronicle of Barset" the concluding one. Mr. Trollope is, to our thinking, the very best living English writer, because the healthiest in tone, the most free from sensation, and the truest to life. His style is sometimes a little prosy, but then one can always "skip" the dry part pages in reading him.

IN DUTY BOUND. By the author of "Mark Warren," etc.

FROM THISTLES—GRAPES: By Mrs. Elioart, author of "The Curate's Discipline," etc. Two excellent stories of English life worthy the attention of the novel reader.

WILLSON'S NEW SPELLER AND ANALYZER. Adapted to Thorough Elementary Instruction in the Orthography, Orthoepy, Formation, Derivation, and Uses of Words. By Marcus Willson.

From D. APPLETON & Co., New York, through LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

THE SONG OF THE SOWER. By William Cullen Bryant. Illustrated with forty-two engravings on wood. This is the most beautiful book of the season. The binding is elegant, it is printed on tinted and hot-pressed paper, and every page contains a handsome illustration. The work is alike creditable to author, artists, engravers, and publishers.

AUTUMN DREAMS. By Chiquita. The author of this little book of poems modestly says: "There is not a thought entertained of its instructing any; only a faint hope cherished that, as there is nothing which can offend the taste or feeling of the most delicate, it may, from its simplicity and mayhaps tenderness of sentiment, find its way to hearts not yet cold or worldly." The poems are pleasant, and filled with tender thought and sentiment, which will win for them many admirers.

From CARLETON, New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

AT LAST. A Novel. By Marion Harland, author of "Alone," etc. This talented authoress again makes her appearance before the public, who is already well acquainted with her literary merits, though she is not so voluminous an author but that she takes time to prepare carefully, thoughtfully, and well whatever proceeds from her pen. The scene of this latest novel is laid in Virginia. It touches the "woman question" in a manner, and, as Marion Harland is a woman of advanced views on this question, she has made this novel to a certain extent the medium of giving them to the public. The particular point she touches is that relating to the subserviency of woman to man. Her heroine's happiness is destroyed and life marred by blindly yielding obedience to the will of a domineering, selfish, and arrogant brother. She also touches incidentally the subject of marriage and divorce.

ADRIFT WITH A VENGEANCE. A Tale of Love and Adventure. By Kinahan Cornwallis. This is certainly a sensation novel "with a vengeance." It is in the form of an autobiography, in which the author first introduces himself to us as a child of unknown parentage, and in the most unfortunate circumstances. He passes through dreadful scenes, among not the least of which is witnessing the murder of a man and subsequently assisting in disposing of his body by dissolving it in boiling potash—a novel suggestion, by the way, to murderers who are troubled how to dispose of the "body." The end of the book finds him, however, happily married, and no less a person than the "Earl of Huntingdon, of Huntingdon Park, Gloucester," England. It seems that this ambitious writer could find no position in this country sufficiently elevated to satisfy the cravings of his aspiring nature, so he is welcome to his earldom if its shadowy possession is any gratification to him.

THE CLOVEN FOOT. Being an Adaptation of the English Novel, "The Mystery of Edwin Drood," to American Scenes, Characters, Customs, and Nomenclature. By Orpheus C. Kerr. Of all the plottings, plannings, surmises, and imaginings which the unfinished state of "The Mystery of Edwin Drood" has been the occasion of, this is the most amusing, if not the most plausible. It is undeniably witty, and is not unworthy the pen of one of our best American humorists.

From CHARLES SCRIBNER & Co., New York, through LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

WONDERS OF BODILY STRENGTH AND SKILL, in All Ages and Countries. Translated and Enlarged from the French of Guillaume Depping by Charles Russell. With numerous illustrations. In these days, when "muscular Christianity" is so popular with nearly all classes of people, a book which treats in systematic form of bodily strength and skill will find abundant favor. The book gives a history of wrestling, boxing, etc., from earliest times down to the present, with accounts of feats of strength and skill. The last third of the volume is devoted to the "Skill of the Eye and Hand."

From SHELTON & Co., New York, through LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

WITH FATE AGAINST HIM. By Amanda M. Douglass, author of "In Trust," etc. An entertaining American novel, by an author who is fast acquiring favor with the public. This is her last and best work.

From DODD & MEAD, New York, through D. ASHMEAD, Philadelphia:—

LABOR STANDS ON GOLDEN FEET. A Holiday Story. By Heinrich Zuchokke. Translated by John Yeats, LL. D. "This little work," says the preface, "exhibits, with characteristic energy and fidelity, the development of those principles which Zuchokke believed to be the basis of all true civilization. The influence of home training is powerfully portrayed; in the history of a family through three generations, individual and social progress are happily illustrated; the purpose and scope of national instruction are clearly shown; manual labor is seen at issue with machinery; throughout the work maxims of prudence and precepts of piety are interspersed, such as an old man of seventy-five—a patriot, poet, philosopher, and historian—was willing and anxious to bequeath to posterity."

From NATIONAL TEMPERANCE SOCIETY and PUBLICATION HOUSE, New York:—

HOW COULD HE ESCAPE? A Temperance Tale. By Mrs. Julia McNair Wright, author of "John and the Demijohn," etc. A story which, while it will entertain the reader, cannot fail to exert an influence for good.

From MUNN & Co., New York:—

THE UNITED STATES PATENT LAW. Instructions How to Obtain Letters Patent for New Inventions. By Munn & Co., Solicitors of Patents, No. 37 Park Row, New York.

From J. S. REDFIELD, New York:—

THE USES OF WINES IN HEALTH AND DISEASE. By Francis E. Anstie, M. D., F. R. C. P., Editor of the London Practitioner, Assisted by the Editorial Staff.

From ROBERT CARTER & BROTHERS, New York, through ALFRED MARTIN, Philadelphia:—

HYMNS OF FAITH AND HOPE. By Horatius Bonar, D. D. Three series. Doctor Bonar enjoys a wide reputation among Scotch Presbyterians as a hymn writer, and we are glad to see these three little volumes. Some of the hymns are familiar to many; such as "I lay my sins on Jesus." In this season of gift books, it is well that those who prefer religious to secular literature should have an opportunity of giving and receiving enjoyment such as is offered to them by the publications of the Carters.

CHRISTIE ELWOOD AND HER FRIENDS.

ROSE'S TEMPTATIONS. PINKIE AND THE RABBITS. These two belong to the "Floweret" Series, by Joanna H. Mathews, authoress of "The Bessie Books."

From ROBERTS BROTHERS, Boston, through LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

ESSAYS WRITTEN IN THE INTERVALS OF BUSINESS; to which is added, an Essay on Organization of Daily Life. By Arthur Helps, author of "Friends in Council," etc. These essays are divided into two parts. The first part includes among its subjects, "On Practical Wisdom," "Aids to Contentment," "On Self Discipline," and others, all relating more or less to self and individual training. Those of the second part refer more particularly to business life, and intercourse with business men.

TEN TIMES ONE IS TEN; The Possible Reformation. A story in nine chapters. By Colonel Frederick Ingham. A story involving lessons of Christian life and labor, written at the persuasion of the late Doctor Wayland, of Brown University.

JOHN WHOPPER, The Newsboy. With illustrations. A wonderful story of the adventures of a newsboy, which will amuse young and old alike. Let every one read it and laugh over it.

PUCK'S NIGHTLY PRANKS. Translated from the German of Ludwig Bund. By Charles T. Brooks. Illustrated by Paul Konewka. The little poem which this book contains is amusing, but the chief feature of the volume is its silhouette illustrations, which, for beauty and grace of outline and composition, exceed anything of the kind we have ever yet seen.

ILLUSTRATIONS TO GOETHE'S FAUST. Designed by Paul Konewka. Those who remember among the holiday gifts of last season the graceful silhouettes of Konewka for the "Midsummer Night's Dream," will welcome a new series of similar illustrations from his pencil. The book now before us is in every respect a more considerable volume than its predecessor. Instead of the tricks and frolics of elves, it deals with the joys and sorrows of men. Faust and Margaret, Mephistophiles and Martha, Valentin and Wagner, are marvellously represented in the black outlines, so that we hardly miss the expression of the eye, upon which most painters so much rely. The pictures of Mephistophiles singing, of Margaret after her betrayal, and of Valentin, are especially fine. The typography and binding of the book combine to render it a most beautiful present for the holidays.

POEMS OF LOVE AND CHILDHOOD. By Jean Ingelow. This new volume by our favorite poetess will no doubt find thousands of readers and admirers. We have spoken of it at length in the "Editor's Table" (see page 190). We need only say here that it is got up in Roberts' Brothers best style with luxurious type and paper.

From LORING, Boston, through PORTER & COATES, Philadelphia:—

THE WONDERFUL BAG, AND WHAT WAS IN IT. By the author of the "Fairy Egg." Illustrated by C. G. Bush. The third volume of the pretty little series of books called "The Fairy Folk Series."

From LEE & SHEPARD, Boston, through TURNER & Co., and PORTER & COATES, Philadelphia:—

DOUBLE PLAY; or, How Joe Hardy Chose his Friends. By William Everett, author of "Changing Base," etc. As the best description of this book, we quote the author himself: "I won't keep them long. It is just to explain why I don't make my boys all the time on the strain with fearful sensations and hair-breadth escapes; where lads, aged eight, plunge head first in the water, and save a rich stockbroker's rosy-cheeked daughter; or build them a boat out of kindlings and slabs, in which they make voyages and catch soft-shelled crabs, and lay the foundations of fortune and glory—I know that's the style of the popular story; but it's not in my line, and I humbly submit that it's not like the life of our youngsters a bit. The boys that I know, all have lessons to learn, geography, figures, and Latin, in turn; and if I'm to write about boys and their ways, I prefer to describe how their actual days are passed, and the troubles they really go through, and not awful sensations to make you turn blue."

PRUDY KEEPING HOUSE. By Sophie May, author of "Little Prudy Stories," etc. The prettiest, most entertaining, and amusing book for the little ones we have seen this season, as those who are familiar with the "Little Prudy Stories" will not need to be told.

LOST IN THE FOG. By James de Mille, author of "The B. O. W. C." etc. Illustrated. The third volume of the "B. O. W. C." series, an entertaining set of books for boys.

THE TONE MASTERS. A Musical Series for Young People. By Charles Barnard, author of "Mozart and Mendelssohn," etc. Illustrated. This volume puts in story form the lives of Handel and Haydn. It is the second of the series.

From HENRY HOYT, Boston, through CLAXTON, REMSEN, & HAPPELFINGER, Philadelphia:—

INTO THE HIGHWAYS. By Mrs. C. E. K. Davis. CHARITY HURLBURT. By C. C.

SNAIL-SHELL HARBOR. By J. H. Langille.

Three pleasant moral and instructive stories for young people. Their outward appearance is exceedingly attractive, and the books are every way well suited for holiday gifts. We trust they were not overlooked during the past holidays.

From NOYES, HOLMES, & Co., Boston, through PORTER & COATES, Philadelphia:—

EVERY DAY. By the author of "Striving and Gaining," etc. A quiet, attractive story of home life, possessing, perhaps, no remarkable degree of literary merit, but then, on the other hand, equally free from blemishes, either in style or sentiment. It is a book for a quiet hour.

Godey's Arm-Chair.

FEBRUARY, 1871.

OUR FEBRUARY NUMBER.—Our steel plate—"The Fight Interrupted"—tells its own story. Seven figures in our colored fashion-plate, an improvement on our former plates. A beautiful design in patch-work printed in blue. And to show our patrons the difficulty experienced in procuring them the fashions, we present them with a picture of our Paris balloon. We will not attempt to particularize our other novelties; our readers can see for themselves.

THE JANUARY number of GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK is worthy of these, the best days of that veteran of magazines for women. The literary contents are good, of course. But too much cannot be said in praise of the fashion articles, and the various departments concerning fancy work, household work, receipts, etc. etc. The illustrations are numerous to bewilderment. There is also a "Supplement of Gulpure Netting," presented to the subscribers, which will set thousands of them to work at the pretty business.—Philadelphia Bulletin.

THE Transatlantic is the title of a magazine published in this city. The contents are the cream of the English magazines; the skim milk is left. The selections are truly excellent, and show remarkable taste in the editor. We recommend it highly, and to give our readers an opportunity of procuring this admirable magazine at a cheap rate we offer it and the LADY'S BOOK for $4, which is a saving of two dollars.

WEDDING parties in New York complain that churches are so crowded when the wedding is celebrated. It is their own fault. Why do they give the flash papers notices when and where the wedding takes place?

A FOOD TREASURE FROM THE SEA.—Editors, physicians, and newspaper correspondents in all parts of the country seem to have investigated the merits of the SEA MOSS FARINE (made from pure Irish Moss or Carrageen) pretty thoroughly. It has been subjected to the experimentum crucis in numberless kitchens, and to the criticism of numberless epicurean palates, and the result, as far as we can judge, is a universal verdict in its favor. It has been placed, so to speak, in the front rank of our food staples, and all that has been said of it by the patentee (Mr. Rand), and the Company interested in its sale appears to be approved and confirmed by public opinion.

THE Philadelphia North American holds forth follows:—

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK.—The Christmas GODEY comes with a title where the open-portal church in the distance, swallowing many, yet leaves a crowded foreground for traffic in holly and evergreen; Santa Klaus upholding his immemorial tree on one side against laughing children on the other. A Berlin bird, as many-hued as Jacob's coat, screams among flowers, challenging committal to wool. A great page of shining fashions; a little one of the benevolence popularly attributed to the occasion: costumes, hair-dressing, music—these and others like preface the stories, and sketches, and poems, and receipts, and crowded work-department, and literary notices, and arm-chair, and juvenile games, and architecture, that will furnish amusement and edification to hundreds of thousands. Godey has fairly trumped his own hand this time, and closed the eighty-first volume so that every possessor will hasten to secure the eighty-second.

"MICHAEL EDMONDS, of Moundsville, Va., claims to be the oldest freeman in the United States. He is one hundred and four years old, and has constantly used tobacco for ninety years."

What are we coming to? Used tobacco for ninety years, and lived to one hundred and four! The London Lancet, the great medical authority of Europe, has come out decidedly in favor of tobacco. Another question arises. How long would the old gent have lived if he had not used tobacco?

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK.—Godey launches into the new year with great vigor and freshness, considering the fact that it has been queen of the fashion world for well towards half a century; and still everybody says, long live Godey.—Herald, Dubuque, Iowa.

In the next number we commence our new department of "How to Make Children's Clothes." This will be very useful to mothers.

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK is, as usual, fully up to the standard of a Superior Magazine. The splendid engravings, Colored Fashion Plates, Costumes, Music, etc., together with its high toned literary character, make this the cheapest and most interesting Magazine in this country.—Pioneer, Leon, Iowa.

DRAWING LESSONS and MODEL COTTAGES will, as usual, be given throughout the year. Our receipt department is considered the most reliable for families. A lady writes us: "The cake made from your LADY'S BOOK receipts took the premium at our county fair."

BEAUTIFUL PICTURES.—We continue to get numerous orders from our subscribers for the three large and splendid steel engravings, "BED-TIME," "THE ANGEL OF PEACE," and "THE WREATH OF IMMORTALITES," pictures of a class and excellence that range in price from $5 to $10 each at the print stores, but which, by special arrangement with the publishers, we can send to the LADY'S BOOK subscribers at $1 each. We have already sent away a large number of these charming pictures, and in all cases they have surprised and delighted those who received them. They are high-art pictures in all respects.

NEBRASKA, December, 1870.

DEAR FRIEND GODEY: You see I have moved from Illinois, away out to this "western wilderness;" but I have not forgotten you nor your Book. I do not send you a club this time, but have given my name to a young lady who will send it. I commenced taking the LADY'S BOOK in 1856, and have been a subscriber every year since. Two years in that time I presented it to friends, but had the reading of it; the rest of the time I took it in my own name, and I don't mean to live a year without it. I consider the editorials worth the price of the Book; then the tone is of so much higher and finer grade than any other ladies' magazine published. I wonder every year what we shall do if your broad shadow would disappear. So, my dear sir, take care of yourself, and live for ever, as you certainly will in the hearts of your friends. Wishing you many happy New-Years, I remain yours, truly,

R. A. H.

INDIGESTION is the remorse of a guilty stomach. Why is an overworked horse like an umbrella? Because it is used up.

FROM present appearances, GODEY will be ahead again this year. This is a compliment to the veteran of forty-one years.

WE ask your attention to our advertisement for 1871, published on the cover. It is but an outline of our intention. Our resources are ample, and we shall continue our efforts to make the LADY'S BOOK—what for forty years it has been—the leading Book in America.

"THE Boston police have an alleged 'German Count' in custody for such a small matter as neglecting to pay hotel bills, and having bricks instead of clothing in his trunk."

That is one thing decidedly in favor of the count—that he carried his bricks in his trunk and not in his hat.

WE have received a large number of letters and newspaper notices about the beauty and worth of our December and January numbers. They are two numbers that any publisher may be proud of—pictorial or literary. We think this number is equally as good as its two predecessors; and it is in our power, and we mean to make as good numbers throughout the year. That is one advantage that our subscribers have: they do not get one or two catch numbers during the year, but all are good. An experience of forty-one years has taught us that ours is the best policy.

A CORRESPONDENT asks where she can find a woman who practises going out by the day to cook or make pastry. We shall be glad to have this answered, as such a person is much wanted in this city, and, if a good cook or a good pastry maker, she could find constant employment.

CLUB RATES WITH OTHER MAGAZINES.—Godey's Lady's Book and Harper's Magazine, one year, $5.50. Godey's Lady's Book and Arthur's Home Magazine, one year, $4.00. Godey's Lady's Book, Arthur's Home Magazine, and Children's Hour, one year, $5.00. Godey's Lady's Book and the Children's Hour, one year, $3.50.

In Massachusetts the band at "horse trots" now concludes the proceedings by playing "Old Hundred."

Would not 240 be more appropriate?

THE commencement of the story on page 207 is inserted as an advertisement.

OUR MUSICAL COLUMN.

HOLLOWAY'S MUSICAL MONTHLY for February.—This is a beautiful number, containing a very attractive list of music, arranged for the piano, and for the piano and voice. Two fine songs are given, as well as three piano pieces, a spirited march, a waltz, and an exquisite little fantasia, An Alpine Farewell, by Riche. There is always something in the Monthly for players and singers of every grade, and its variety and adaptiveness are only equalled by the elegance of the publication. With the January number the Monthly entered upon its ninth year, and it is now the oldest and best musical periodical published. Every music buyer should give it a trial for 1871. We have reduced our club terms for this year as follows: Single copy for one year, $4. Two copies, $3.50 each. Four copies, or over, $3 each. Single numbers, 40 cents. January and February numbers, as samples, for 75 cents. Premiums as follows:—

Music given away.—We repeat the liberal offers of last month. For every subscription for 1871, at $4, we will send by return mail $1 worth of new music from our catalogue. Subscribers will state the kind of music wanted, whether easy or difficult, or vocal or instrumental, etc. For every two subscriptions at $4 each, we will send $5 worth, the persons forming the club to select the music to suit themselves from our catalogue, which we will send on receipt of the money for the subscriptions. For every club of three, at $4 each, we will send ten dollars' worth on the same terms. For every club of four, at $4 each, we will give the extraordinary premium of sixteen dollars' worth of new music, thus giving two dollars for one—the amount of the premium equalling the principal. Stamps to the amount of 34 cents must accompany this club to prepay the postage on the music. This offer we make for a short time only. Get up your clubs at once.

Holloway's Musical Monthly Free.—Any one ordering direct from us six dollars' worth of sheet music, will receive as a premium the Monthly for the entire year free. A fine opportunity to get the best musical periodical in the world for nothing.

RURAL WEDDING IN SWEDEN.—I will endeavor to describe a village wedding in Sweden. It shall be in summer-time, that there may be flowers, and in a southern province, that the bride may be fair. The early song of the lark and of chanticleer are mingling in the clear morning air, and the sun, the heavenly bridegroom with golden locks, arises in the east, just as our earthly bridegroom, with yellow hair, arises in the south. In the yard there is a sound of voices and trampling of hoofs, and the horses are led forth and saddled. The steed that has to bear the bridegroom has a bunch of flowers upon his forehead and a garland of corn-flowers around his neck. Friends from the neighboring farms come riding in, their blue cloaks streaming to the wind; and finally the happy bridegroom, with a whip in his hand and monstrous nosegay in the breast of his black jacket, comes forth from his chamber, and then to horse and away towards the village where the bride already sits and waits. Foremost rides the spokesman, followed by some half-dozen village musicians. Next comes the bridegroom between his two groomsmen, and then forty or fifty friends and wedding guests, half of them perhaps with pistols and guns in their hands. A kind of baggage wagon brings up the rear, laden with food and drink for these merry pilgrims. At the entrance of every village stands a triumphal arch, adorned with flowers and ribbons and evergreens; and, as they pass beneath it, the wedding guests fire a salute, and the whole procession stops. And straight from every pocket flies a black jack, filled with punch or brandy. It is passed from hand to hand among the crowd; provisions are brought from the wagon, and, after eating and drinking and hurrahing, the procession moves forward again, and at length draws near the house of the bride. Four heralds ride forward to announce that a knight and his attendants are in the neighboring forest, and pray for hospitality. "How many are you?" asks the bride's father. "At least three hundred," is the answer; and to this the last replies: "Yes, were you seven times as many, you should all be welcome; and in token thereof, receive this cup." Whereupon each herald receives a can of ale; and soon after the whole jovial company comes storming into the farmer's yard, and, riding round the Maypole, which stands in the centre, alight amid a grand salute and flourish of music. In the hall sits the bride, with a crown upon her head and a tear in her eye, like the Virgin Mary in old church paintings. She is dressed in a red bodice and kirtle, with loose linen sleeves. There is a gilded belt round her waist; and around her neck strings of golden beads, and a golden chain. On the crown rests a wreath of wild roses, and below it another of cypress. Loose over her shoulders falls her flaxen hair; and her blue innocent eyes are fixed upon the ground. Oh, thou good soul! thou hast hard hands, but a soft heart. Thou art poor. The very ornaments thou wearest are not thine. They have been hired for this great day. Yet thou art rich; rich in health, rich in hope, rich in thy first, young, fervent love. The blessing of heaven be upon thee; so thinks the parish priest, as he joins together the hands of bride and bridegroom, saying, in deep, solemn tones, "I give thee in marriage this damsel, to be thy wedded wife in all honor, and to share the half of thy bed, thy lock and key, and every third penny which you two may possess, or may inherit, and all the rights which Upland's laws provide, and the holy King Erik gave." The dinner is now served, and the bride sits between the bridegroom and the priest. The spokesman delivers an oration, after the ancient custom of his fathers. He interlards it well with quotations from the Bible, and invites the savour to be present at this marriage feast, as he was at the marriage feast of Cana of Galilee. The table is not sparingly set forth. Each makes a long arm, and the feast goes cheerily on. Punch and brandy pass round between the courses, and here and there a pipe is smoked while waiting for the next dish. They sit long at table; but, as all things must have an end, so must a Swedish dinner. Then the dance begins. It is led off by the bride and the priest, who perform a solemn minuet together. Not till after midnight comes the last dance. The girls form a ring around the bride, keep her from the hands of the married women, who endeavor to break through the marriage circle and seize their new sister. After long struggling they succeed; and the crown is taken from her head and the jewels from her neck, and her bodice is unlaced and her kirtle taken off; and, like a vestal virgin, clad all in white, she goes, but it is to her marriage chamber, not to her grave; and the wedding guests follow her with lighted candles in their hands. And this is a village bridal.—Longfellow.

THE following has been sent to us, and as it may possibly be of use, we publish it:—

HINTS TO PERSONS USING SEWING MACHINES.—MESSRS. EDITORS: It is a fact known to all who use sewing machines that the prevailing difficulty is the breaking of the thread. Nearly all other little disarrangements that occur can usually be overcome by any person of ordinary ingenuity, even though they have had but a few weeks, or, perhaps, days' experience in the use of a sewing machine.

This breaking, which is mostly with the upper thread, may occur from an imperfect adjustment of the tension. With new machines this is invariably the cause; but with those that have been in use several months, the breaking (when the tension is right) is produced by the threads wearing into the guides, so that when a swelled place in the thread reaches the narrow groove which is worn to the exact width of the regular size of the thread, not being allowed to pass through, the thread breaks.

Of course, this break may take place anywhere from the point of the needle back to the grooved guide which caught it. As it is usually at or near the end of the needle, the real cause is very generally overlooked. Many have been so troubled with this continual breaking that it has been necessary for them to lay aside their machines, when, if this cause had been known to them, by simply smoothing the guide holes with a small round file, their trouble would have ended.

No doubt, sewing machine manufacturers are on the lookout for the first Yankee invention of a guide which will not be worn by the passage of thread through it. If this can be accomplished, a monopoly of it would probably be of but little less value than that of a needle with an eye in the point. OBSERVER.

INSTANTANEOUS PHOTOGRAPHY.—Nothing can be more lightning-like than the manner in which one lady will catch the dress of another, even when simply passing in the street. Here is something like it, only this young person had the whole time of church service at her disposal:—

"Mary, my love, do you remember the text of this morning?" Mary—"No, Pa, I never can remember the text, I've such a bad memory." Mother—"By the way, did you notice Susan Brown?" Mary—"Oh, yes, what a fright! She had on her last year's bonnet, done up; a pea-green silk, a black lace mantilla, brown boots, an imitation Honiton collar, a lava bracelet, her old ear-rings, and such a faw, O, my!" Mother—"Well, my dear, your memory is certainly bad."

HOW TO LIVE WELL.—"How does she live?" inquired one laundress of another. "She lives very well, I can tell you." "Ay, indeed?" "Yes, indeed. She has half a pint of beer every day at dinner."

WHAT IS THE difference between a man who is cold and a hot dog? The former puts on his coat and the latter pants.

SILHOUETTES CUT IN BLACK PAPER.

THESE silhouettes are cut out of black glazed paper, with a fine pair of scissors, and partly with a sharp penknife. They form ornaments for albums, the tops of boxes, etc.

DIAMONDS.—It was thought that the great discoveries of gold in California and Australia might lessen the value of that precious commodity; but it can scarcely be said that the result has justified the opinion. Will the multiplication of diamonds materially affect their price? The political changes and commotions on the Continent may throw many of these gems into the market, and, as after the first and second French revolutions, they may sell for smaller sums. At this moment we have not only in operation the causes just referred to, but another in the extraordinary reports which reach us from South Africa. The Asiatic says that an officer in her majesty's service, having obtained leave, visited the "glittering" country, and on his return, highly delighted, formed a partnership with three friends, resigned the service, and by the last accounts the party had $125,000 to their credit. Mention is made of a cottage plastered with mud which was found to be studded with diamonds. In another direction are to be seen one hundred and thirty diamonds grouped to be photographed; and we have scarcely feasted our eyes upon these when up comes a "native doctor" with a stone weighing 100 carats, which is forthwith valued, by judges on the spot, at $200,000. Great numbers of persons are flocking to the scene of action, and large quantities of diamonds are being found. The writer of a late letter gives an animated description of the favored locality, and states that "for the outgoing month the fourth share of the diamond finds which falls to the society amounts to something like $3750. Diamonds, I have reason to believe, are being turned up in the vicinity of the great camp daily, but persons and parties are becoming more reticent; you won't hear, as heretofore, when and where diamonds are found." Whatever "society" is meant, its affairs are in a flourishing condition.

From another graphic description of the scene we learn that all are not equally fortunate, that the operation of diamond hunting is laborious and dirty, and that it is doubtful whether the health of the workers will not suffer. Meanwhile, it is certain that the finds have been plentiful enough to create a sort of diamond fever, and multitudes are rushing away to the banks of the Vaal, where, in the wilderness, has been trodden under foot by wild beasts and savage men from untold ages. May the diamond seekers be abundantly successful!

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK.—Its double page steel fashion plate is the prettiest that we have seen. GODEY is filled brim full of good things for the ladies, which we should think they duly appreciated, by the way they look for it from month to month. They can hardly wait until it makes its appearance. GODEY is acknowledged the leading magazine of the day, and it deserves it.—Mercury, Richfield Springs, New York.

CAN THIS BE TRUE?—The Cornhill Magazine says: "The Duke of Wellington was not precisely stupid, but no man, who can fairly be called great, ever had a narrower escape from stupidity."

SHUT UP IN PARIS.

In the front of the Book will be found an illustration showing the manner in which some of our fashions have been procured by correspondents. We are assured that the following articles came through by balloon post:—

PARIS, November 15.

A SCHEME has been devised and set on foot by which to obtain some sort of answers to our letters—an object impossible up to this time, and I need not say how longed for by us prisoners of Paris. The scheme is an ingenious one; but, as it depends in great part on the safe return of the carrier pigeons, we must be very sober in our hopes; for, besides the enemy's shot and hawks' talons, the dangers of the winter season now array themselves against these our poor little messengers, the sole means we have of obtaining news from without. The air is often too cold, too misty, or too damp for the birds to fly, and the strong winds either make them so suffer from thirst that they stray from their course to seek water, or so tired that they drop, wearied out, before they reach their home in the Boulevard Montparnasse. There, at No. 92, is a gate and a garden, which two bull-dogs ferociously guard from all invaders, which might prove hostile to pigeons. At the end of the garden rises a splendid pigeon house, in which every pigeon comfort abounds; and there, when the tired travellers arrive from their journeys, with the governmental despatches under their wings, they are fed, and petted, and caressed not a little, as you may imagine. Several times the birds have returned wounded, and the pigeon which brought the last despatch from Tours (one full of good news) was covered with blood when it folded its poor drooping pinions on the sill of the dovecot. The accomplices of the greatest number of journeys during the siege is a bird named Gambetta, a fine gray pigeon of Belgian origin, and the winner of several prize medals. The owner and rearer of these carrier pigeons is M. Cassiers, who, on hearing that the Prussian armies were marching towards Paris, immediately left Brussels, where he was residing, to put himself and his pigeons at the service of the government. M. Cassiers went off in a balloon with some of his pigeons a few weeks ago, and since then his daughter is chief ministrant to the birds' comforts in the Boulevard Montparnasse. At the back of the pigeon house is a little watch tower, where a watcher is constantly stationed in expectation of the birds' return.

But I must revert to the letter scheme, which I was about to explain to you. On Saturday last a balloon left Paris, the aeronauts bearing with them carrier pigeons as usual, and a large number of private letters, in each of which were written four questions, numbered in order, and to which the word "Yes" or "No" would be sufficient answer. Also, in each letter, which was very thin, was introduced a thin card, bearing the name and address of the writer, the name of the person who is to return the answer, and four numbered compartments in which the recipient is to write the answers, "Yes" or "No," to the four numbered questions in the letter. At the back of the card is a short printed paragraph, which tells the recipient that when the answers are written he is to post the card, paying a franc for it, to the chief of the post-office at Clermont-Ferrand. There, when the cards are collected, the name, address, and answers on each will be reduced by photography to an almost imperceptible speck, so that the whole of the answers will stand together on a single slip of paper, several copies of which will be confided to several carrier pigeons. Directly one of these papers arrives in Paris the writing on the slip will be enlarged again by photography, and the answers copied off and sent round to those awaiting them. Thus, if the balloon passes over the Prussian lines in safety, and if but one of the carrier pigeons returns to us duly here, many thousand people will have four answers to four questions, which they can make as precious as they like; but all depends on the if, and I fear we have learnt lately not to be too sanguine. However, a pigeon returned yesterday from Tours with a slip of paper an inch and a half square, on which two hundred and twenty-six private despatches had been microscopically photographed!

Before the 8th of this month our postal balloons had taken up more than 10,600 lbs. weight of letters; and, although the carrier pigeons, with which all are accompanied, have only brought us back news of the safe arrival of five out of the twenty-four balloons, yet, on the other hand, we have only heard of one having fallen into the Prussian lines, so we may fairly hope that a large proportion of our missives have reached their destination. We are told, too, that, even when the bags are opened by the Prussians, and the letters perused, the private ones are sent on, with the words "opened by the enemy" stamped upon them; but of this last rather improbable fact you must know more than we do.

The balloons are made in the station of the Northern Railway, where big waiting rooms and bigger luggage rooms are but too disposable. On entering the courtyard one distinguishes through glass doors to the right huge yellow balls looming dusky; in the salles d'attente a little further on are piles of cotton cloth and rows of sewing machines; and further still, past sleeping engines, empty carriages, solitary platforms, immovable signals, silent bells, useless telegraph wires, and shut-up pay places, are luggage rooms and more waiting rooms, where balloons are being cut out, sewed together and varnished, and their network of cordage fabricated. A balloon is made of 800 yards of stout calico (the silk, which is far better, is not procurable in Paris), cut into thirty-nine uniform pieces, which are sewn together by the sewing machine; it is then varnished inside and out, and inflated with air to dry, during which operation it lies on its side like a Titanic prize gooseberry. The drying completed, the air is expelled, and the balloon is then ready to be furnished with valve, car, and cordage, to be filled with gas, and then En route, sachez tout!

Another building turned by the siege to anomalous uses is the Ecole de Droit, of which the lecture theatres are occupied by tailors and cutters shaping and sewing military clothes, the examination rooms filled with piles of thick boots, and the passages crowded with Mobile and National Guards in quest of the military jackets, cloaks, and trowsers, which are being turned out from them by the hundred.

Several theatres and concert societies have presented cannon to the Défense Nationale. All these guns have been christened; that of the Porte St. Martin, which won the gold for it with Hugo's verses, is gratefully called Châtiment; the Société des Gens de Lettres has named its gun Châteauguin, after the little town that fought and fell so valiantly; and another, made from the profits of a splendid concert, is called Beethoven. Then come Phalsbourg, Populace, Belleville, and many others, presented by different companies of the National Guard. One company subscribed alone 12,000 francs for new cannon—it is true that it was formed of the gros commerçants of the environs of the Bourse; and the society of the working hatters of Paris have supplied the guns of an entire battery. Touching the National Guard, I have in hand a note which is worth transcribing: the sentinel who, musket in hand, stood on guard the other day at the Porte Montrouge, was the father of the Marquis de Moustier, the ex-Minister of Foreign Affairs.

There has been no notable change in the external aspect of Paris since I wrote to you last. The cafés may now remain open until eleven or twelve, provided they burn no gas after ten o'clock. This, of course, is a step; but let any absent one with whom a lounge on the boulevard was a pet occupation, and an hour at one of its cafés a pleasant habit, imagine to himself the splendors of the Grand Café and Café Riche illumined with oil, and a dismal notion of the change in Paris will not fail to descend upon him immediately. In the houses no gas will be allowed to be burnt at all after the 20th of this month; and, successful as the dramatic entertainments at the theatres have proved, it is by no means owing to the quantity of light which beamed upon them.

With this forced economy of gas, the streets of Paris are still as far as ever from their old brilliance, especially in the dreary evenings November brings us now and then; evenings so dark and wet and windy, that as one looks out one thinks shudderingly and often of the uninured National Guards pacing the ramparts, and the Mobiles in their wooden huts on the spongy ground, feeling very glad to remember that the former have been provided with big sheep-skin coats, and the roofs of the latter with bituminous cloth. The great new household difficulty and terror, now that the cold is increasing so rapidly, is the dearth of fuel. Of charcoal there is none whatever. The little coke and coal that are to be procured are sold monstrously dear, except at the gas-works, where the prices remain the same, but where the coke is sold but in very small quantities, which must be carried away by the purchasers. So all day long there extends from the gates a formidable queue of men, women, and children, provided with sacks, baskets, pails, scuttles, wheelbarrows, and trucks wherein to bear off their small portion of hardly won fuel. Wood can be had anywhere, but it is terribly expensive to use, and very few of those who crowd at the gas-works can possibly afford to burn it. The office of the kitchen stoves, which in Paris are lighted with charcoal, is now almost a sinecure. Some ladies, as the wood burns in their salons, have the braise (pieces of charred wood) carried into the kitchen as it falls; but this requires a great deal of patience and a great deal of wood, and, in general, people have recourse to portable American stoves. Indeed, these have of late been much used in addition or instead of the charcoal stoves; and in all the new houses of the Haussman era, patent stoves, which can be heated by coke, coal, or wood, are put up in the kitchens.

As to provisions, everything except bread and wine is either rising in price or diminishing in quantity, or both, with terrible rapidity. Potatoes are sold at eight francs (6s. 5d.) and onions ten francs (8s.) a boisseau, which is equivalent to a peck and a half. As for beef and mutton—veal has been tasted by no one in Paris for two months—a family of seven grown persons can only obtain a pound and a half every four days. But horse meat, as I have said, is now eaten in great quantities, and very willingly; and, seriously, sirloin of horse, stewed after being mariné—that is, pickled in vinegar and spices for three days—or roasted, is very good. Donkey has been found to be so much like veal that it is in tremendous demand—indeed, very difficult to procure at all. Sparrows are sold at 10 sous a piece, and that is the only game we have this season, except a few stray and solitary partridges, which now and then make their apparition at the market, ticketed at 15 or 20 francs. But my most horrible tale is to come; cats are sold at 4 francs a piece, and even dogs, it is said, find purchasers!

I went yesterday to witness for myself the havoc done to our beautiful Bois de Boulogne, and was startled far beyond my expectations. In place of fair acacia and horse-chestnut avenues, woods, shady paths, and sweeping drives, a flat dismal heath, covered with stumps of felled trees, dead branches, the blackened traces of camp fires, and here and there a solitary iron seat, stretches out to the lake, to Passy and the distant hills. The fortifications around, once masked with grassy mounds and groves of young trees, stand out all bare, exposing to view hideous earthworks, chevaux-de-frise, and cannon. Winding lanes and pretty horsepaths, which used to plunge down through the wood, can hardly be traced here and there by their whiter lines among the dead leaves. Cavalry officers rode from time to time across the new-made, cheerless heath, and over the whole extent hundreds of men, women, and children were picking up the dry wood and staggering away under enormous bundles of it. The most picturesque bits were the circular thatched roofs, which stood up in the Bois like huge parasols, for horsemen to take shelter under during the rain. Dried branches had been heaped up so as to inclose the interior, where groups of soldiers sat smoking and warming themselves round big wood fires. The pine-wood on the right bank of the lake is left standing, and even to the left, a thin veil of trees had been spared close to the water's edge, so that the lake still looks fair enough; but we could not refrain from a somewhat bitter laugh at seeing two little broughams and an open carriage rolling in solitude along the Drive, as if hugging some vague illusion of no change. At the entrance of the Bois the ornamental gates and pretty lodges are razed to the ground, and a restaurant where the petite bourgeoisie was wont to celebrate its gay wedding breakfasts, is the headquarters of a corps. As we returned past the huge barricades, and over the drawbridges of the Porte de Neuilly, an admiral and a colonel of the National Guard rode up with their staff, and the civic soldiers and cirandiers on guard at the gates excitedly mustered to salute them in due form. Then we had to wait while a long train of hay carts, bread carts, and ammunition wagons passed out towards the outlying camps, and for the passage in of a large collection of our lagot-pickers from the Bois; and a minute later we stood back as a litter came slowly on, borne by six soldiers. On it a poor Mobile lay stretched, his blue cloak thrown across him and over his face; he was either very badly wounded or dead.

At Versailles, Monsieur de Bismarck, I am told, is established in the elegant little house now the property of Mlle. Augustine Brohan, and once, as the L's and D's interlaced in the ironwork of the balcony attest, the pretty retreat of Madame Dubarry. There, at the beginning of last summer, our elegant actress of the Franchette tastefully disposed her household gods, and made a most charming dwelling of the little Louis Quinze villa, with its pretty garden in front, ornamented with grass plots, flower beds, statues, and fountains, greenhouse of rare plants, walls covered with creepers, and shady allée des soupers; its terrace garden at the back, as high as the first floor of the house; its staircase, with its marvellously beautiful ironwork; its salons, which Mlle. Brohan has hung with flowered Louis Quinze silks, and luxuriously furnished with Venetian mirrors, Sevres vases, porcelain lamps, and buhl tables; its marble bath-room; its bed-rooms, fitted with pearl-gray satin and furniture of white and gold; its study, stored with rare books and carpeted with panther-skins; its marble busts and pretty portraits.

FASHIONS BY BALLOON.

"What will be worn in Paris this winter?" asked a thoughtless young girl of Madame de L—.

"Sackcloth and ashes," was the bitter reply.

Madame de L—, the star of a small but brilliant Parisian coterie, is celebrated alike for her literary talents and excellent taste in dress, a somewhat rare combination. Formerly remarkable for her costly and elegant toilet, she is now conspicuous for her self-sacrifices in the cause of her unhappy country. Amongst the many sad sights to be seen in the French capital are the Tuilleries Gardens. There the hum of children's voices and their bursts of merry laughter are silenced, and none but grave, bearded men occupy the seats. The avenues, so beautiful in their many-hued autumn garb, are filled with artillery wagons and horses; la guerre is the sole topic of conversation, la toilette is for the moment in abeyance. But—

"Men must work, and women must weep, And there's little to earn and many to keep;"

so some of the most enterprising milliners and dress-makers in Paris have contrived to send away to more favored cities a large number of elegant costumes for the season. We will select a few for description from a splendid wedding trousseau recently forwarded from Paris to Vienna. The bridal dress was of rich white silk, exquisitely embroidered in bouquets of orange-blossom and lilies of the valley; veil of Brussels lace. The ornaments to be worn by the bride on her wedding-day consisted of a brooch, ear-rings, bracelet, and necklet of costly diamonds set in flagee silver; they were presented to her by the bridegroom elect, and made expressly from his own design. The bridesmaids' dresses were white silk, with tulle tunics trimmed with silver fringe and bouquets of scarlet poppies and silver wheat-ears; vells and wreaths to correspond.

The travelling costume for the bride consisted of a skirt of pearl gray taffetas with nine small flounces, edged with violet fringe, casaque of violet velvet lined throughout with quilted white satin. Bonnet of white chip, trimmed with water-lilies, and a large violet velvet bow.

Some original and beautiful muffs and collars have recently been introduced; they are made of feathers from the blackcock, pheasant, peacock, and various fancy birds. These muffs are light and warm.

The new color for winter is a rich shade of red, which, in spite of its repulsive name, sang de Prusse, promises to become very popular.

If your lips you would save from slips,

Five things observe with care;

Of whom you speak—to whom you speak—

And how—and when—and where.

AN Indiana man has effected a strategical combination against the potato bugs. He planted a grain of corn in each hill of potatoes. The corn came up before the potatoes, which, of course, cheated the little pests into the belief that it was a corn-field, and they never went near the potatoes until it was too late to do any damage. His crop of the esculent is, therefore, the envy of his neighbors.

WHY are good husbands like dough? Because women need them.

A MODEL RESIDENCE.

Drawn expressly for Godey's Lady's Book, by ISAAC H. HOBBS & SON, Architects, 809 and 811 Chestnut Street, formerly 436 Walnut Street, Philadelphia.

THE above design is a one story and French roof building, suitable for the Southern country; it is provided with sufficient height to admit of an air space between the roof and second story. The design can be built in wood for about $3000, and be very comfortable and convenient. All of our designs are beautiful, because they are well proportioned, and not merely the style or order of architecture to which they belong. We will make full drawings, specifications, and bills of quantities for seventy-five dollars, or two and a half per cent upon our statement of cost. We have facilities for supplying orders from all parts of the country at shortest notice. We guarantee to please in our designs, which are always made full size, and also by the perfect manner of our detail work. Many new improvements are incorpo-who propose to erect buildings, as they contain all the materials necessary to the erection of a first-class residence, and those desiring to build without the aid of an architect, will do well to procure them.

OLIVIA, the very lively and spirited Washington correspondent of the Philadelphia Press, says, in an article about fashions:—

“Why are not all feminine eyes directed to prim, elegant Philadelphia, the home of blessed old GODEY, and the cradle where Fashion was rocked in the infancy of our Republic?”

THE FLOWER GARDEN.

AMONG the attractions of the Flower Garden, drawing-room, and conservatory, are the many beautiful designs of Rustic wood work, such as hanging baskets, stands, vases, and other adornments, which are now so popular, and appropriate for the introduction of Plants. In the principal seed stores and floral establishments of Philadelphia may be found the most elegant and elaborate specimens of this work, which are sold at a comparatively low price. Any one, however, with a little mechanical ingenuity and taste, can, with the aid of a saw, hammer, small nails (known as finishing nails), a strong knife, and a few crooked sticks and roots (the roots of the laurel are the best), make up a basket or stand, which, when nicely filled with plants, will look nearly as well as the most elaborate; for the receptacle of the plants, the wooden bowls and dishes are used, which are now so generally found in every household for culinary purposes, to which handles or feet of crooked sticks are fastened, and the outside of the bowl nailed over with pieces of roots and plants, which should be first soaked and scraped before nailing on; afterwards give a coat of copal varnish; if the color is too light, stain with burnt umber. Your basket or stand now being ready, the next thing is to fill it. The following varieties can be raised from seed, which we will mail to any address for one dollar. We would also state that February or March is the proper time to start the seeds, so as to have the plants ready when spring arrives. Lobelia, varieties; Mimulus, Musk Plant; Petunia, varieties; double Portulaca, Tom Thumb Nasturtium; for vines, Kenilworth Ivy, Maurandia, and Thunbergia, varieties.

One dozen plants of the following varieties, suitable for the above purpose, can be sent by mail for two dollars: Glecoma rotundifolia variegata, Torenia Astatica, Agrostis, new ornamental grass; Vinca elegantissima variegata, Saxifraga Portunifolia, Acorus Variegata, Lycopodium, Senecio Scandens, Tradescantia Zebrina, Irish Ivy of Sorts. For centre pieces, Coleus, Begonia, and Geranium of sorts; these can all be propagated from cuttings stuck in damp sand. The soil for your baskets should be a sandy loam, enriched with well rotted manure and leaf mould from the woods. The running vines, like the Kenilworth Ivy, Maurandia, Thunbergia, Irish Ivy, and Vinca, can be trained over the handles, or to hang over the sides.

To all who desire further information on Plants or Seeds, we refer to DREER'S GARDEN CALENDAR for 1870, containing select lists of Seeds, Plants, and every other requisite for the garden. His address is,

"A POMPOUS fellow made a very inadequate offer for a valuable property; and, calling the next day for an answer, inquired of the gentleman if he had entertained his proposition. 'No,' replied the other, 'your proposition entertained me.'"

There was once a pompous fellow in this city fond of boasting. He was met one morning by a friend, who said: "Why, C—, you don't look well this morning." "No," he replied, "I was up all night gambling, and lost as usual. One hundred and thirty-five dollars was the amount, but that is not the worst of it—thirty-one cents of it was in cash."

We are told that at a party recently given in this city a lady appeared with a train upheld by a colored person. We are sorry that this is true, for the lady's sake, for, although she knew it not, she was the subject of censure the whole evening.

Florence.—Gloves should never be removed in church.

Maria.—Confidence and ability to talk only come by mixing in society.

Nellie.—It is better to be too retiring than too forward.

Edith.—Men are capricious as well as girls; but where a girl has a number of lovers, and loses them all in turn, it is a pretty sure sign that it is through some fault of temper or arrogance. Pretty girls are very apt to flirt, and sensible men do not care to put up with flirting, nor do they care to submit to the airs of a spoiled pretty miss who trusts more to personal attractions than to the effects of amiability and common sense.

Delia.—You are not "an old subscriber," or you would not have asked questions which have been answered over and over again in the LADY'S BOOK.

Julia.—There is no "harmless" remedy. Those that are advertised remove the hair for the time; so will a razor, but it returns again. Nothing will remove the hair without injuring the skin.

Mattie.—You seem to think that every gentleman who looks at you is in love with you. Too much vanity.

Ella and Dudu.—Questions entirely too trivial to answer.

Horsey.—We believe it runs thus:—

"The rule of the road is a paradox quite,
To the right you are wrong, to the left you are right."

Mary B.—You will find all the anniversary weddings in our April number, 1870. This is another "old subscriber" making inquiry.

Leah.—There is nothing that will actually take away the scent of onions after you have eaten them. A small piece of orris root kept in the mouth somewhat disguises the disagreeable odor.

Annie L.—Cut the velveteen either in a short sacque or basque; long sacques are not worn. Bind with satin, and finish the neck with a rolling satin collar.

Flossy.—Bouquets are not carried except to parties.

Madge.—A swindle. No one but a person devoid of sense would send thirty-five cents to the fellow. His name shows what he is.

E. L. T.—Scraped carrot put upon warts is said to cure them.

Truth.—We do not give any opinion on matters of a theological kind: it is not within our province, and as our Book goes among all denominations, you will see the propriety of withholding remarks and opinions where they could not be beneficial, and might be obnoxious to many of our readers.

NOTICE TO LADY SUBSCRIBERS.

Having had frequent applications for the purchase of jewelry, millinery, etc., by ladies living at a distance, the Editor of the Fashion Department will hereafter execute commissions for any who may desire it, with the charge of a small percentage for the time and research required. Spring and autumn bonnets, materials for dresses, jewelry, envelopes, hair-work, worsteds, children's wardrobes, mantillas, and mantelets will be chosen with a view to economy as well as taste; and boxes or packages forwarded by express to any part of the country. For the last, distinct directions must be given.

Orders, accompanied by checks for the proposed expenditure, to be addressed to the care of L. A. Godey, Esq.

No order will be attended to unless the money is first received. Neither the Editor nor the Publisher will be accountable for losses that may occur in remitting.

Instructions to be as minute as possible, accompanied by a note of the height, complexion, and general style of the person, on which much depends in choice.

The publisher of the LADY'S BOOK has no interest in this department, and knows nothing of the transactions; and whether the person sending the order is or is not a subscriber to the LADY'S BOOK, the Fashion Editor does not know.

When goods are ordered, the fashions that prevail here govern the purchase; therefore, no articles will be taken back. When the goods are sent, the transaction must be considered final.

VARIOUS KINDS OF HEMS.

A few remarks on the different ways of working hems will, no doubt, be acceptable to some of our readers. We will first say a word on the turning down and folding of hems, which our different figures show, both broad and narrow. For every hem a turning is first necessary, which, according to the more or less close or loose texture of the stuff, may be either narrower or broader; then the hem requires to be evenly and exactly folded down a second time to the width desired.

Fig. 1 shows a hem that is run. To do this, the needle with the thread in it is to be put through at small and equal distances to the under side of the hem (being the right side of the work), passing through all the folds of the stuff, and working from right to left. This is the most expeditious way of doing a hem where great neatness and strength are not required, for if the material be soft, several stitches may be taken on the needle at one time before drawing it out.

Fig. 2 shows a hem really hemmed. For this a stitch is taken through the single material very close to the hem, and taking up as few threads as possible, that the stitch may look neat on the right side of the work. The needle is brought through the lower edge of the folded hem. The stitches must be in a slanting direction from right to left, and, according to the nature of the material, closer or wider apart. Very close stitches are especially necessary for things that have to be often washed, such as shirts and other under garments, pocket handkerchiefs, etc.

For table linen the hem seen at Fig. 3 is peculiarly fitted. By folding back the hem towards the right side of the work, after it is completely turned down, two parallel edges are created, which are to be closely sewn together like a seam, as shown in the illustration.

Figs. 4 and 5 are the slipped-stitch hem, so much used by dressmakers for crape and other trimmings. This is run with single stitches, that are so managed as not to show on the right side of the work. The inside turning of the hem is caught by the stitches, which are visible only at the back, as in Fig. 4; the needle being put through again exactly where it was previously taken out, as shown in Fig. 5, the stitches catch the inner fold and the back only, and do not appear in front.

Fig. 6 is a stitched hem. For this the hem must be turned down on the right side of the material. Having brought the needle through to the front of the hem a very little above the edge, a small stitch must be taken back in a straight line, going through all the folds of the material, and the needle brought out at such a distance in front as will make a stitch of equal size when put through again where the first stitch was commenced.

Fig. 7 shows a narrow single hem stitch. This is generally worked only on fine lawn or cambric for pocket handkerchiefs. The term narrow is applied here, not to the breadth of the hem itself, which may be of any width desired, but to the threads drawn, the number of which vary, according to the quality of the material, from two to six. To commence the stitch, the needle must be brought through the lower edge of the folded hem; then take up with it, according to the quality of material (as before observed), from two to four of the perpendicular threads, draw out the needle, and put it in again through the edge of the hem, as shown in Fig. 7, then take up the same number of the perpendicular threads as before, and repeat.

In a similar manner the broad double hem stitch, or open-work insertion, represented in Fig. 8, is to be worked. A variety of patterns of open stitches may be worked in the centre of the drawn threads. On what is threads in both instances, by which means regularly divided groups of threads are made for the open stitches, as seen in Fig. 8. The way in which the lower edge of the drawn threads must be secured is the same as for the upper, only that in taking hold of the edge of the material itself the needle is passed downwards instead of upwards, which is also shown in the illustration, Fig. 8.

Fig. 9 shows the tambour stitch. For this the material must be stretched in a frame, generally formed of two hoops fitting one over the other, and, according to the thread, cotton, or silk to be used for the stitch, a more or less fine crochet hook is necessary instead of a sewing needle. The cotton or thread, being wound, remains under the frame, and is brought through the material in a loop by means of the crochet hook. By the motion of the crochet needle up and down through the stuff, giving it a slight turn from left to right, the loop, as shown in Fig. 9, is easily made round the hook. This loop, which is brought up through the stuff at the same opening by which the hook went down, remains on the needle while the latter is advanced a little, following the direction of the pattern (which must be traced on the stuff), and again goes through the material in order to take up the thread for a fresh loop or stitch, which, being brought through the centre of the former one, takes its place on the needle. This work, after a little practice, is very quickly done.

CHITCHAT

ON FASHIONS FOR FEBRUARY.

As weddings are very fashionable at this season, a few hints on style of dress, etc., will, we think, not be objectionable to our fair brides elect.

Where a handsome dress is desired for a bride, white Ottoman silk, rich and heavy, with reps as thick as a knitting needle, is the fashionable fabric. Its soft, creamy whiteness is more universally becoming than the lustrous sheen of satin, which is now only worn by blondes of the purest complexion. Fine white faille, and soft poult de soie are also in favor this season. Gros grain makes a handsome wedding dress. Where as good a silk cannot be afforded, a plain dress of white silk Irish poplin is both ladylike and handsome, and much prettier than a poor silk loaded with trimming to make it appear handsome. Tulle and lace flounces are worn, and even flounces of the same material as the dress. The latter fashion we do not altogether fancy; in our eyes it makes a stiff trimming for a wedding dress. The short skirt with a square court train, is the favorite fashion for elaborate wedding dresses. If the skirt is not cut so, it is trimmed with a tablier to simulate a court train. Low necked corsages are most worn by brides this season. The front and back are sharply pointed, or else the front only, and the back finished by a Postillon basque. In the first case, the waist is laced behind; in the latter, it is buttoned in front. The neck is cut exceedingly low, and finished out to the proper height with Grecian folds of tulle, edged with a vine of orange blossoms and narrow point lace. The Grecian drapery is a revival of an old fashion, very becoming to slender figures, as it gives an appearance of full bust and shoulders. It is a succession of five or six small overlapping folds of tulle, arranged straight around the corsage, and pointed slightly lower in the centre of the front, where it is completed by a strap of folds and a bouquet of orange flowers. The sleeve is a simple short puff of tulle arranged in position on stiff net, and gathered to a band of satin and lace. When high corsages are preferred, they are pointed in front, and have Postillon back. The neck is open very low down the front, but the opening is not wide, and is finished by a lace frill and delicate vine of orange buds. The sleeves are the Duchesse, of simple coat shape, rounded at the wrist, open up the outer seam to the elbow. The opening and wrists are trimmed with lace and flowers. The trimming most used for Irish poplin dresses is a thick cord of white velvet around the skirt and basque, with lace at the wrists and sleeves. Dresses of this material are made with high corsage as described. Widows and brides who are no longer young wear pale pearl tinted silk or poplin made in this way. There is no change in bridal veils. They are still made of fine tulle, four yards wide, and three and a half yards long. The lower corners are rounded, and the entire veil may have a two-inch hem, sewed with silk floss, and dotted with orange buds. The veil falls over the face below the chin for church weddings, but does not cover the face during the ceremonial at home weddings. If the bridal reception is given the day of the wedding, the bride wears her veil; but never wears it after her wedding day. Widows do not wear veils on the occasion of their second marriage. The wreath of orange flowers is a coronet, high in the centre, with sprays at the sides. Gloves are of white kid, long wristed; when worn with short sleeves, reaching almost to the elbow. The shoes are plain untrimmed gaiters, either laced or buttoned, and made of the same material as the dress. Pearl or diamond jewelry is the only kind of jewelry allowed; the latter only when it is the present of the groom. White tulle and tarlatane are worn by the bridesmaids, the corsage made to correspond with the bride's; colored flowers and jewelry are worn by the bridesmaids.

A cashmere overdress with a silk skirt, or else an entire suit of Irish poplin of purest sardonyx, or gray or brown is chosen for the travelling dress. Silk costumes are little worn for travelling at this time of year, even when the bride is married in her travelling outfit. The round hat or gypsy bonnet is of shaded velvet and ostrich tips, matching the dress in color. The gloves of the bridal pair match the bride's dress in color.

For wedding invitations, a single large note sheet, without cards, is used this season in preference to the elaborate styles lately in fashion. At the top of the page is a white embossed monogram of the combined initials of the bride and groom, followed by the invitation in script. Inclosed are two cards; the larger contains the bride's name near the bottom; a smaller card, with the groom's name, is placed on this card above the bride's name, and fastened with a tiny bow of white ribbon. This is all that is necessary when the bridal pair leave the church to go on a tour; but when there is a reception on the day of the wedding, the hour of the reception and number of residence are given on the ceremony card. After quiet weddings at home, or when the newly-married pair have returned from their tour, it is customary for them to issue cards announcing their marriage, on a note sheet, inclosing a card designating reception days.

Lace is more than ever fashionable as a trimming; it is white for evening dresses, and black for dark colored dresses or mantles. Small jackets of white or black gimpure, of a very graceful shape, look exceedingly pretty over low silk dresses, and are a very tasteful finish to a dinner or small evening party toilet. Casques of black lace, fitted to the waist by a sash, and trimmed round with a deep lace flounce, are also in very good taste. They are made of Chantilly, black silk gimpure, or blonde. Some are of white lace, but are much more dressy. They are pretty for a married lady for a small evening company, worn over a light silk dress, which otherwise might not prove new and nice enough. Dentelle des Indes is also very fashionable. Every one cannot afford to wear a real lace tunic, and the fine woollen lace is far preferable to any imitations of Chantilly or other valuable lace. Its patterns are extremely handsome, and when of good quality, it is soft to the touch, though firm enough not to crumple easily, and makes up beautiful draperies as tunics. For the evening, a tunic of either Chantilly or dentelle des Indes is a great desideratum. For ladies who go out a great deal, or receive company at home, and yet do not care to be always in grand toilette, the black lace tunic will prove especially useful, as they can wear it with any low colored silk. The tunic has a high bodice, or sometimes one that is high at the back only, and open in front in a square, or en châte; it is rounded or pointed off in front, upon the skirt, and draped and looped up into a puff behind. The sleeves are wide and open. Sometimes they fall into long lappets from the shoulders, leaving the arm quite bare. With a few jewels to brighten it up, and natural flowers in the hair, this makes up a very nice demi-toilet for the evening. To wear with light colored silk or thin dresses, we very much admire the new fichus of plaited tulle or clear muslin, trimmed with Mechlin or Valenciennes lace.

Evening mourning dress is always rather a difficulty, and therefore we think the following description of an extremely tasteful demi deuil evening toilette may prove useful to some of our readers, although it is very simple. The dress is of black silk gauze over white faille silk; it is trimmed round the bottom with a plaited flounce, not above four inches deep at the back, but nearly twice that depth in front. The basque of the bodice, forming a sort of short upper skirt, is trimmed with a deep border of Bruges lace, and draped on either side with bows of fringed-out black gauze. The bodice is high on the shoulders, but very low both in the front and the back; it is trimmed with a deep border of Bruges lace, headed by three corded rouleaux of black satin; inside this there is a low chemisette of fine white crape, plaited like a fichu. The sleeve is finished off at the bend of the arm with a flounce, trimmed with Bruges lace, and a fluting of crape shows underneath. A necklace and large cross of cut jet, and bracelets to match, look well with such a dress, and ear-rings and coronet of cut jet might also be worn. A white rose or camilla would be a suitable ornament for the hair.

A new style of Grecian ceinture seems likely to supersede sashes for evening wear. It is a richly gilt ribbon, adapted to the figure by an entirely novel fastening, which admits of its being tightened or loosened at pleasure.

For children we have some very pretty costumes to note. For boys from five to seven we saw complete suits of dark blue cloth, composed of straight waistcoats, buttoned all the way down; half-fitting jackets, with seams in the back, and Knickerbockers. Velvet Scotch caps complete the costumes; these are becoming to some boys, but not to all. Yachting hats of gray felt, trimmed with dark blue silk braid, may be worn instead. Complete suits of black velvet are also very elegant for little boys. The jacket is short and loose, with rounded sleeves, a little open; the waistcoat and Knickerbockers are the same as those of cloth costumes. Some suits are braided and some plain, according to taste. With Knickerbockers stockings should be worn; while with the loose, short trowsers socks look best. But it is now generally understood that it is best for boys to wear woollen stockings in winter. The plaid stockings are very nice, and the bright scarlet, if of good quality, will keep their color a long time, on condition of being washed in lukewarm bran water without any soap.

For a little girl from three to four years old we noticed a very lovely dress of French blue poplin. It was made like an out-of-door pelisse, high, and buttoned all the way down with blue velvet buttons. At the back there was a rounded basque; this basque was trimmed with a handsome pattern, partly in appliqué of blue velvet, and partly in blue silk braid-work. The same pattern went round the pelerine or large cape. This sort of dress is very nice for putting on a little girl for going out over the little dress with low bodice and short sleeves, which is worn in the house. For the same we saw some very charming jackets of white Cashmere, double-breasted, and loose both in front and behind; they are ornamented with braid-work in black, red, or blue, and edged with white woollen fringe. There are small revers, which may be turned down, or else turned up and buttoned, if the jacket is preferred to come quite high in the neck. To wear with the blue pelisse described, we saw a very pretty hat of the Tyrolean shape, of fine dark gray felt, trimmed with blue velvet ribbon and a blue feather, both matched to the pelisse.

In crinoline the skirts are worn about two yards round at base, with very large tournures. These skirts are much more graceful looking than the very small skirts which have been worn.

In ladies' boots there is a great variety this season, as every shoemaker likes to adopt a style of his own; but all agree in advising the plainest kid or pebbled leather boots, with very little, if any, ornamental stitching, and with heels an inch and a quarter high. The white fan stitching bows and tassels on the boots and very high curved French heels are passé. The shape is the three-quarter Polish boot, rather higher than those worn in the summer. Buttoned and side-laced boots are both worn. The newest idea is to have the lacing begin at the foxing, and curve upward, giving ample room for a high instep. Evening shoes are invariably gaiters, slippers being confined to morning negligés. White satin or kid boots are most used, as they will suit with any dress. Children wear pink or blue kid gaiters to match their evening dresses.

MY WIFE AND I; OR, HARRY HENDERSON'S HISTORY.

BY HARRIET BEECHER STOWE,
Author of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," "Minister's Wooing," etc. etc.

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTION.

It appears to me that the world is returning to its second childhood, and running mad for stories. Stories! Stories! Stories! everywhere; stories in every paper, in every crevice, crack, and corner of the house. Stories fall from the pen faster than leaves of autumn, and of as many shades and colorings. Stories blow over here in whirlwinds from England. Stories are translated from the French, from the Danish, from the Swedish, from the German, from the Russian. There are serial stories for adults in the Atlantic, in the Overland, in the Galaxy, in Harper's, in Scribner's. There are serial stories for youthful pilgrims in Our Young Folks, the Little Corporal, the Riverside, the Youth's Companion, and very soon we anticipate newspapers with serial stories for the nursery. We shall have those charmingly illustrated magazines, the Cradle, the Rocking-Chair, the First Rattle, and the First Tooth, with successive chapters of "Goosy Goosy Gander," and "Hickory Dickory Dick," and "Old Mother Hubbard," extending through twelve, or twenty-four, or forty-eight numbers.

I have often questioned what Solomon would have said if he had lived in our day. The poor man, it appears, was somewhat blase with the abundance of literature in his times, and remarked that much study was a weariness to the flesh. Then, printing was not invented, and "books" were all copied by hand, in those very square Hebrew letters, where each letter was about as careful a bit of work as a gravestone. And yet, even with all these restrictions and circumscriptions, Solomon rather testily remarked: "Of making many books there is no end!" What would he have said had he looked over a modern publisher's catalogue?

It is understood now that no paper is complete without its serial story, and the spinning of these stories keeps thousands of wheels and spindles in motion. It is now understood that whoever wishes to gain the public ear, and to propound a new theory, must do it in a serial story. Hath any one in our day, as in St. Paul's, a psalm, a doctrine, a tongue, a revelation, an interpretation—forthwith he wraps it up in a serial story, and presents it to the public. We have prison discipline, free trade, labor and capital, woman's rights, the temperance question in serial stories. We have Romanism and Protestantism, High Church and Low Church, and no Church, contending with each other in serial stories, where each side converts the other, according to the faith of the narrator.

We see that this thing is to go on. Soon it will be necessary that every leading clergyman should embody his theology in a serial story, to be delivered from the pulpit Sunday after Sunday. We look forward to announcements in our city papers such as these: The Rev. Dr. Ignatius, of the Church of St. Mary the Virgin, will begin a serial romance, to be entitled "St. Sebastian and the Arrows," in which he will embody the duties, the trials, and the temptations of the young Christians of our day. The Rev. Dr. Boanerges, of Plymouth Rock Church, will begin a serial story, entitled "Calvin's Daughter," in which he will discuss the distinctive features of Protestant theology. The Rev. Dr. Cool Zephyr will go on with his interesting romance of "Christianity a Dissolving View," designed to show how everything is, in many respects, like everything else, and all things lead somewhere, and everything will finally end somehow, and that therefore it is important that everybody should cultivate general sweetness, and have the very best time possible in this world.

By the time that all these romances get to going, the system of teaching by parables, and opening one's mouth in dark sayings, will be fully elaborated. Pilgrim's Progress will be nowhere. The way to the celestial city will be as plain in everybody's mind as the way up Broadway—and so much more interesting! Finally, all science, and all art, and all business will be explained, conducted, and directed by serial stories, till the present life and the life to come shall form only one grand romance. This will be about the time of the Millennium.

Meanwhile, I am going to furnish a serial story for the Christian Union, and I choose the subject that is in everybody's mind and mouth, discussed on every platform, surging from everybody's tongue, and coming home to every man's business and bosom, to wit:—

MY WIFE AND I.

I trust that Miss Anthony, and Mrs. Stanton, and all the prophetesses of our day, will remark the humility and propriety of my title. It is not I and My Wife—oh, no! It is My Wife and I. What am I, and what is my father's house, that I should go before my wife in anything?

"But why specially for the Christian Union?" says Mr. Chadband. Let us in a spirit of love inquire.

Is it not evident why, oh, beloved? Is not that firm in human nature, which stands under the title of MY WIFE AND I, the oldest and most venerable form of Christian union on record? Where, I ask, will you find a better one—a wiser, a stronger, a sweeter, a more universally popular and agreeable one?

To be sure, there have been times and seasons when this ancient and respectable firm has been attacked as a piece of old foggism, and various substitutes for it proposed. It has been said that "MY WIFE AND I" denoted a selfish, close corporation inconsistent with a general, all-sided, diffusive, universal benevolence; that MY WIFE AND I, in a millennial community, had no particular rights in each other more than any of the thousands of the brethren and sisters of the human race. They have said, too, that MY WIFE AND I, instead of an indissoluble unity, were only temporary partners, engaged on time, with the liberty of giving their month's notice, and starting off to a new firm.

It is not thus we understand the matter.

MY WIFE AND I, as we understand it, is the sign and symbol of more than any earthly partnership or union—of something sacred as religion, indissoluble as the soul, endless as eternity—the symbol chosen by Almighty Love to represent his redeeming, eternal union with the soul of man.

A fountain of eternal youth gushes near the hearth of every household. Each man and woman that have loved truly, have had their romance in life—their poetry in existence.

So I, in giving my history, disclaim all other. Look not for trap-doors, or haunted houses, or deadly conspiracies, or murders, or concealed crimes, in this history, for you will not find one. You shall have simply and only the old story—old as the first of Genesis—of Adam, stupid, desolate, and lonely without Eve, and how he sought and how he found her, and how they fared together thereafter.

This much, on mature consideration, I hold to be about the sum and substance of all the romances that have ever been written, and so long as there are new Adams and new Eves in each coming generation, it will not want for sympathetic listeners.

So I, Henry Henderson—a plain Yankee boy from the mountains of New Hampshire, and at present a citizen of New York—commence my story.

My experiences have three stages.

First, my child-wife, or the experiences of Boyhood.

Second, my shadow-wife, or the experiences of my Youth.

Third, my real wife, where I saw her, how I sought and found her, and how we fared together.

In the course of these experiences, my good friends, you will find that we take occasion to discuss all sorts of modern and exciting topics, and to keep up with the spirit of this discussing age, when there is nothing which may not be considered an open question.

The above is the introductory chapter of a new and most charming tale by Mrs. Stowe, commenced in the Christian Union, and to be continued during the year 1871. For sale by all newsdealers. The publishers, Messrs. J. B. FORD & Co., 39 Park Row, New York, offer to send the paper to subscribers two months FREE; that is, all subscriptions sent in for the year 1871, shall be credited from the beginning of this story fully up to January, 1872. The price of an annual subscription is three dollars. Following this is the prospectus of the paper. To every new subscriber is presented Marshall's superb "Household Engraving of Washington," a work which has made the artist famous over Europe and America, and has never been sold for less than $5. With such a combination of attractions, it is not surprising that the Christian Union is taking the very front rank among religious newspapers.

Do you know what day to-day is?

Mother, 'tis our wedding day!

"Just as now, we sat at supper

When the guests had gone away;

You sat that side, I sat this side,

Forty years ago to-day!

"Then what plans we laid together;

What brave things I meant to do!

Could we dream to-day would find us

At this table—me and you?

"Better so, no doubt—and yet I

Sometimes think—I cannot tell—

Had our boys—ah, yes! I know, dear;

Yes, He doeth all things well.

"Well, we've had our joys and sorrows;

Shared our smiles as well as tears;

And—the best of all—I've had your

Faithful love for forty years!

INVESTING MONEY.

SEVEN-THIRTY GOLD LOAN.

In its First Mortgage Gold Bonds the Northern Pacific Railroad Company furnishes to the public an Investment Security which combines the ready Negotiability, the Convenience, and the high Credit of a first-class Railroad Bond, with the Solidity and Safety of a Real Estate Mortgage on Land worth at least twice the amount loaned.

These Bonds, which, after full investigation, we strongly recommend as a reliable and unusually profitable investment, and which now stand among the solid and favorite securities of the country, have the following leading features:—

They are a first and only mortgage on the Road, its Equipments and Earnings, and also on a Land Grant, which, on the completion of the Road, will average 23,000 acres to each mile of track; they bear interest at the rate of 7 3-10 per cent.; both principal and interest are payable in gold, the principal in 30 years from 1870, and the interest semi-annually (January and July), at the banking house of Jay Cooke & Co., New York.

They are exempt from U. S. tax, and are issued of the following denominations: Coupon $100, $500, and $1000; Registered $100, $500, $1000, $5000, and $10,000. They are at all times receivable at ten per cent. premium (1.10) in exchange or payment for the Company's Land at the latter's lowest cash price. The proceeds of all sales of Lands are required to be devoted, by the Trustees, to the purchase and cancellation of the First Mortgage Bonds of the Company, or to the payment of interest thereon, if required. The Land Grant of the Road, exceeding Fifty Million Acres, thus constitutes an immense Sinking Fund, which will probably cancel the principal of the Company's bonded debt before it falls due.

All marketable Stocks and Bonds will be received at their highest current price in exchange for Northern Pacific Seven-Thirties. EXPRESS CHARGES on Money or Bonds received, and on Seven-Thirties sent in return, will be paid by the Financial Agents. Full information, maps, pamphlets, etc. etc., will be furnished, on application, by any agent for the Loan, or the Financial Agents of the Company. There are agencies for the sale of the Bonds in nearly every city and important town in the country. Investors can, at their option, order the bonds through their local banker, or directly from Jay Cooke & Co.

With the same confidence with which they have recommended United States Government Bonds to the public, the undersigned now recommend these securities to all classes as an investment combining a profitable return with absolute safety.

LOUIS A. GODEY
PHILADELPHIA

The Only Lady's Book in America!! . . . Forty-First Year!

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK.

1871. Volumes 82 and 83. 1871.

The Cheapest of Ladies' Magazines, Because it is the Best!

EDITED BY

MRS. SARAH J. HALE, AND L. A. GODEY.

FORTY-ONE YEARS' experience in catering for the tastes of the ladies of this country has enabled the publisher to place his magazine far above his contemporaries. In fact, the magazine has

NO EQUAL IN EUROPE OR AMERICA!

It has always been the care of the publisher to combine in its pages whatever is useful, whatever is elevating, whatever is pure, dignified, and virtuous in sentiment, with whatever may afford rational and innocent amusement. For its Literary Department, in past years,

THE BEST WRITERS IN THE LITERARY WORLD

Have contributed, and will continue to furnish articles for the year 1871. The names of such authors as

MARION HARLAND, LOUISE S. DORR, INO CHURCHILL, METTA VICTORIA VICTOR, MRS. C. A. HOPKINSON,
S. ANNIE FROST, MRS. DENNISON, and Others,

Cannot be found on the Prospectus of any other magazine. They have a reputation in the literary world unsurpassed!

ARTISTIC AND BEAUTIFUL STEEL PLATES

Form another prominent feature of the Book. Executed by one of the best steel engravers in the world, they have won the praises of the best judges of the art. We give fourteen of them every year.

OUR FASHION PLATES

Have a reputation for correctness the world over. If we receive anything new from our European correspondent after the preparation of our colored plate, in order to furnish everything up to the latest dates, we always give it in a wood engraving in the same number.

Original Music, Drawing Lessons, Model Cottages, Embroidery Sheet, Tinted Engravings, and a Juvenile Department.

Another useful department, and one that we were the first to make an object of interest to the public, is the publication of Invaluable Receipts upon every Subject. These receipts are of great value to the Boudoir, Nursery, Kitchen, House, and Laundry.

Ladies' Fancy Work Department.

The illustrations in this department consist of EVENING, WALKING, MORNING, AND BRIDES' DRESSES, HEADDRESSES, HAIR-DRESSING, CAPS, BONNETS, CLOAKS, MANTILLAS, RIDING HABITS, ROBES-DE-CHAMBRE, UNDERSLEEVES, SLIPPERS, WRISTS, COLLARS, CHEMISETTES, EMBROIDERY, KNITTING, NETTING, TATTLING, CROCHET, and FANCY ARTICLES of all kinds.

And everything new, as soon as it appears in Europe, is at once transferred to Godey. Some of these designs are printed in colors, in a style unequalled.

WHO STOLE THE BIRD'S NEST? FOR THE JUVENILES.

BY MARIA L. CHILD.

To-whit! To-whit! To-whce!
Will you listen to me?
Who stole five eggs I laid,
And the nice nest I made?

Not I, said the Cow, Moo-oo!
Such a thing I'd never do,
I gave you a wisp of hay,
But didn't take your nest away.

Not I, said the cow, Moo-oo!
Such a thing I'd never do.

To-whit! To-whit! To-whce!
Will you listen to me?
Who stole five eggs I laid,
And the nice nest I made?

Bob-a-link! Bob-a-link!
Now what do you think?

Who stole a nest away
From the plum-tree to-day?

Not I, said the Dog, Bow-wow!
 I wouldn't be so mean, I vow;
 I gave hairs the nest to make,
 But the nest I did not take.
 Not I, said the dog, Bow-wow!
 I wouldn't be so mean, I vow.

To-whit! To-whit! To-wheel!
 Will you listen to me?
 Who stole five eggs I laid,
 And the nice nest I made?

Bob-a-link! Bob-a-link!
 Now what do you think?

Who stole a nest away
 From the plum-tree to-day?

Coo! said the DOVE, Coo-coo!
 Let me speak a word, too:
 Who stole that pretty nest
 From little yellow-breast?

Not I, said the SHEEP, oh, no!
 I wouldn't treat a poor bird so,
 I gave wool the nest to line,
 But the nest was none of mine.
 Baa! Baa! said the sheep, oh, no!
 I wouldn't treat a poor bird so.

To-whit! To-whit! To-whee!
Will you listen to me?

Who stole five eggs I laid,
And the nice nest I made?

Caw! Caw! cried the CROW,
I should like to know
What thief took away
A bird's nest to-day?

Cluck! Cluck! said the HEN,
Don't ask me again.

Why, I haven't a chick
Would do such a trick!

We each gave her a feather,
And she wove them together.
I'd scorn to intrude
On her and her brood.
Cluck! Cluck! said the hen,
Don't ask me again.

Chirr-a-whirr! Chirr-a-whirr!
We will make a great stir!
Let us find out his name
And all cry "For shame!"

I would not rob a bird,
Said little Mary Green;
I think I never heard
Of any thing so mean.

'Tis very cruel, too,
Said little Alice Neal;
I wonder if he knew
How sad the bird would feel?

A little boy hung down his head,
And went and hid behind the bed.
For he stole that pretty nest
From poor little yellow-breast;

And he felt so full of shame,
He didn't like to tell his name.

GETTING ON IN THE WORLD.

BY MARION HARLAND.

PART II.

HALF-WAY.

"I SHOULD think Sara Stringham would feel wretchedly out of place in an institute where most of the girls dress so handsomely. I am often sorry for her. She is actually shabby."

"I don't believe she cares much about dress. She is contented to be intellectual, and brilliant in conversation, and all that," said another of the coterie of girls clustered about the great radiator in the middle of the school-room.

Estelle Wells smiled in lofty superiority. "Dress is one of the fine arts which no one—certainly no woman—can afford to neglect."

She did not point the remark by a downward look at her own tasteful attire, but the glances of the rest wandered involuntarily to the purple silk skirt and black velvet basquine; the muslin apron, with its be-ribboned pockets and crimped frills; the pearl brooch and ringed fingers. And after this furtive survey, the bright eyes of the budding women passed, as naturally, to the object of Estelle's criticism, a girl in plain dark merino, and black alpaca apron, leaning against the frame of a distant window, and talking animatedly in French with Madame Marcelle, the Lady Principal of the school.

A tall young lady who was walking slowly up and down the floor, within hearing of much of her schoolmates' conversation, stopped opposite Estelle, and leaned on the back of an empty chair, in an attitude that had in it much of the easy insolence of her address.

"Perhaps," she said, staring straight into the censor's face, "perhaps if her mother had been a factory girl, she might think it necessary to cultivate this and other showy arts to cheat people into forgetfulness of the fact that she was not born to the purple. As it is, she knows her standing cannot be questioned."

School girls are cruel tormentors; pitiless, let us hope, rather through levity and ignorance than malice. If this open assault was to Estelle like the sting of a knotted lash, the ill-suppressed amusement of her companions, and the smiling silence following the affront, were so many poisonous pin-pricks. She had felt so comfortable, so pleasantly at ease, a moment before. It was agreeable to know that she was the best dressed, if not the prettiest girl in the room; and that she received the tribute of respect and admiration from her fellows due these advantages. The desire for popularity was with her a thirst, and she felt that she had within her the means of compassing this end; that she had tact, wit, spirit, and generosity; and that outward circumstances favored the exercise of all these. The coveted good had never seemed nearer to her than on this autumn noon. She had held a sort of court, sitting there in an arm-chair, a dozen girls about her, two on the rug at her feet, their arms crossed upon her lap; another perched on the elbow of her chair, winding one of Estelle's golden curls about her finger; the arm of yet another about her neck. All listened to her serious remark with deference; to her sallies with applause. They liked to look at pleasant pictures, and the wearer of fine clothes is always a person of influence in a feminine assembly, provided she understands how to bear them off well, a faculty that was born with Estelle Wells.

But at Maude Stuyvesant's rude and unprovoked retort, all this adventitious importance fell away from the rich man's daughter as Cinderella's fairy gauds changed to dusty rags at the stroke of midnight. The arm about her shoulders was lax and drooping; the ringlet dropped back to her cheek; and, if she were to judge from the aspect of other of her courtiers, they would have cheered her enemy had not common politeness restrained them. The sight of all this; the chill that seized her soul in the discovery; the keen smart of wounded feeling more than outraged vanity, drove the blood in a red rush to her temples, imparted a tremor to her voice. She was caught off guard, and much as she would have given to conceal her discomfiture, the tokens were but too evident.

"Something more than birth is required to make the true lady," she said, rallying.

"Nobody denies that. Blood must be kept pure by thorough breeding. You cannot make a lady by any other means, least of all, by money and gay feathers," rejoined Maude, still leaning nonchalantly upon the back of the chair, her coolness finding a foil in Estelle's heat and uneasiness. "There is a branch of education which is not easily bought. Sara Stringham gets this in her home. Wealth cannot purchase it, thank Heaven! any more than it can furnish a suitable assortment of noble ancestors. The fence about our really good society is not quite broken down. Sara is inside the pale, let her dress in calico or velvet."

"That is your opinion," Estelle replied, weakly, with a poor feint of disdain.

"It is the opinion of everybody who knows how to value her antecedents. She belongs to one of the oldest families in America; one that can prove by its register its connection with noble English houses. Her father was, in turn, a Judge of the Supreme Court, member of Congress, and Governor of his native State. Her mother, however reduced she may be in fortune, is a lady, by birth and breeding, with the manners of a queen. These are points in one's family history of which she may well be proud. Only the ignorant and purse-proud underrate them. It is time parvenus received right instruction concerning such matters; time they were taught what high social rank means, and that all the money-bags in creation will not raise illiterate mechanics and their families to this grade."

She was in earnest now. The insult was premeditated and strongly delivered; but her pale complexion did not glow; her voice did not rise. Only in the expressive steadiness of her gaze, and more deliberate utterance, was there evidence of her intention to crush the other to what she considered was her proper level. The patrician blood was better managed than the fuller, quicker tide in the veins of her opponent—or victim. Estelle's cheeks burned until they throbbed, and the tears were hardly kept back.

"One would suppose, to hear Miss Stuyvesant declaim, that she held the keys of Castle Society as tightly as St. Peter does those of the Catholic Church," she said, rising, with a forced laugh, mirthless and unmusical. "I will not come between the wind and her nobility, although the encounter was not of my seeking. It is hard to breathe in an atmosphere so overcharged with aristocracy."

"You will do well to remember that," was Maude's parting shot, carelessly delivered, and she resumed her saunter down the room.

Nobody joined her, but neither did a single one of her late companions approach Estelle when she went back to her desk and pretended to busy herself with an exercise until recess was over. The group about the radiator talked in lower tones, stealing a look now and then at the disputants, that showed the current of their gossip. Maude was royally indifferent to their comments, yet she was too shrewd not to surmise that their sympathy was with her, rather than with the mechanic's daughter. Not one of them had dared speak a word in defence of the parvenue's pretensions, although several of the number could boast no higher descent, or present rank in the social scale. "Stuyvesant" was a name of power, before which they bowed in true republican awe. Estelle had stood no chance of maintaining her ground from the first, but her rout had been ignominious and unpitied. She acknowledged this to herself. Her heart was sore; her self-respect torn to tatters; and there was no redress. But her predominant emotion was a burning sense of injustice. Why should she have been singled out as the mark for the Stuyvesant's scorn? She had always treated Maude with the consideration her position demanded; never tried to force herself upon her notice. She was proud, as were many of her mates, to mention to outsiders that the Misses Stuyvesant were Madame Marcelle's pupils, feeling that the circumstance gave tone and fashion to the establishment.

"She talked as if she hated me! had some personal grudge against me!" she thought, her chest heaving, and hand shaking, while she tried to see through the mist creeping between her and the paper. "She and Sara Stringham are not particularly intimate. I don't believe they even like one another; so Maude need not consider herself set for the other's defence. And to expose me before all the girls! I shall never hold up my head again. As if it makes any difference whether my father is a mechanic or a lawyer, so long as I am fitted by education to be their associate!"

But in her soul she felt that it did make a difference; that Sara Stringham, in her year-old merino, and whose mother lived in a cottage on a cross street, with only one servant, stood at an immeasurable height above her, whose father's "mansion" faced a fashionable square; who rode in her carriage to and from school in bad weather; and who had six bonnets a season, with an unlimited allowance of new dresses.

Mrs. Wells could not afford to dress her children as plainly as Mrs. Stuyvesant did hers. They were part of the advertisement of her husband's wealth; one of the stepping-stones by which she was climbing! climbing! how toilsomely nobody but herself knew. Estelle had begun to understand the process and the pain better of late. She no longer regarded her stand in the world as assured; noted, as she never used to, the wan, anxious look that often marred her mother's pretty face when she was not in "company," and likened it, in her own mind, to the solicitude of one treading a quagmire, whose only safety is in passing on; never standing long enough in one spot for his foot to sink in.

"We belong nowhere in particular," she said to herself, bitterly. "We will not go back, and there is a combination to keep us from going forward."

Her cousin, Fanny Clark, walked home with her that afternoon. She had not been in the school-room during recess, but a rumor of the scene with Maude had reached her.

"They tell me you and Maude Stuyvesant had a 'spat' to-day noon," she said, eagerly curious. "What was it all about?"

"She told me that fine clothes, money, and education, could not make a lady of a mechanic's daughter," said Estelle, in a hard, sullen tone. "And I think she was about right."

Fanny laughed, tossed up her muff in the air, caught it as it came down, and whirled around on one toe—a pas seul learned from a popular ballet dancer.

"She shouldn't make laws for me! I'm as good as she is any day, and as much of a lady as I ever want to be. They're stiff as buckram, that set; and proud as Lucifer! almost too proud to keep themselves company. Who cares for a pack of old dead and buried forefathers? They're like potatoes—the best part under ground. I wouldn't mind her talk if I was you. Though, to be sure," with complacent recollection, "my father isn't a mechanic. He is a merchant. They stand higher, of course."

"Perhaps you would prefer not to be seen in the street with me?" interposed Estelle, shortly.

Fanny laughed again. "What a silly! I don't cut my relations that way. Your mother is my own aunt, you know."

"I ought to feel grateful for your condescension." Estelle was in a towering passion. "But, knowing, as I do, that my mother is more of a lady, and moves in better society to-day than yours ever can, to say nothing of my father being able to buy and sell yours three times over, I must decline your patronage. Good-day!"

She signalled a passing car, got in, and was a block off before Fanny recovered her wits. She was quite satisfied with her place in life, take it altogether. Her associates and neighbors were, in general, on a par with herself in tastes, habits, and means. Their fathers had made their own money, and there was no appreciable difference in their wives' and daughters' manner of spending it. They liked gorgeous furniture, and ostentatious entertainments, and expensive toilettes, and handsome equipages, and so long as they were not distanced very far by their compeers, they held up their heads jauntily and accounted themselves leaders of ton. Mrs. Wells had, as her daughter stated, arisen to a more elevated plane, and seeing further into the shadowy land of worldly dignities and honors, was proportionably discontented. Social distinction was the summum bonum she craved for herself and posterity. The charmed region in which dwelt the Stuyvesants, and Roosevelts, and Stringhams, was, to her, the very land of Beulah. Until she, with her train, passed the confines of that blessed country, yet, alas! so far away, she must know no rest or peace. She had never told Estelle in definite language that she looked down upon the sister she had once envied, as inferior to herself in person and refinement, in station and in aim; but the quick-witted girl had divined the sentiment and shared it.

"Let Maude Stuyvesant say what she will, my mother's ladyhood is innate, if she was a factory girl. I wish I had never known that. Grandma told me four or five years ago, and it cuts down into the quick whenever I think of it. I can easily believe that Aunt Fanny was a milliner, for she acts and talks like one, now. She is essentially vulgar, with her loud tones and laugh, her slang phrases and her incessant quotation of prices—how much this, that, and the other cost. Uncle Clark is simply unbearable, and Fanny is a would-be 'fast' girl, empty-headed, vain, and volatile. They have no taste for anything that truly cultivated people delight in—books and pictures, and statuary, and music, and travel. I should be ashamed to introduce them to my best acquaintances. I can see why they should be excluded from polite society. But why mamma?"

She sprang from the car at the corner of the street in which she lived, and walked on rapidly, gnawing her lip with the passion of the thought she had not dared put in shape to herself. She did not question the wisdom of her mother's aspirations; the reality of the good for which she strove. In disgustful impatience at her own destiny, she was the more disposed to exaggerate the benefits that would follow her introduction into the world she panted to enter. And at the suggestion of the impracticable nature of her hopes, she flew out at Fate, bruised herself against the unseen fetters that bound her, and foamed at the uselessness of her efforts.

"Halloo, young woman! What's your hurry? Can't you stop for company?"

She had not heard footsteps in pursuit, and fast as her father walked, he did not overtake her until she reached home, and turned to go up the front steps.

"I've been chasing of you ever since you got out of the car," said Peter, putting his hand upon his idol's shoulder, all the love of his big heart in his honest eyes and broad face. "How them little feet of yours did scutter along, to be sure! You ain't got wings on 'em, be you?"

Here was her thought in visible form. She had tried to hush the unfilial whisper that the man now before her was the one inseparable barrier to the advancement upon which her mother's happiness and her own depended, but his appearance and salutation brought the truth home to her with a shock that threatened to kill her love on the spot.

An illiterate mechanic! Maude had not stated it too strongly. No amount of smoothing and gilding would ever make this great, good-natured animal—who hated gloves and tight boots, who trod heavily, and talked like a sea-captain in a gale—presentable in the Stuyvesant system. He had become burly and ruddier than ever with the steady march of his prosperity. "Stout," Mrs. Wells sighed, plaintively, as each year added breadth and rotundity to the figure which had formerly "really been tolerably good." "Fat, and getting fatter every day!" pronounced his old acquaintances, who had not unlearned the habit of calling things by their names. He looked like an elephant to Estelle in her recoil from his touch; in the sickness made up of self-reproach and something she was loath to call aversion, at his familiarity.

"What's the matter, chick? Have I scairt you?"

"Yes!"

"I'm sorry, dear. I didn't mean to." Without in the least comprehending the meaning of her emphasis, Peter's countenance fell, and his apology was made humbly. "I wouldn't worry you in any way for the world," he added, unlocking the door.

Unable to speak, Estelle flew past him up the staircase.

"Bless my soul! What ails you, Stelly?
You pretty nigh knocked me over!" cried the grandmother, against whom she ran in the upper hall.

Mrs. Lane had lived with her daughter for twelve years, an honored inmate of her luxurious home, and a help to mother and children in many ways. Estelle had never suspected, until this miserable day of awakening, how hopelessly vulgar she was.

"She will wear old-fashioned clothes, is always preaching economy, and she couldn't open her lips without betraying her lack of education and breeding. Where's the use of trying to swim with two millstones about one's neck? Maude was right," muttered the girl, tossing her books into a corner and dropping in a heap to the carpet; she put her face between her hands, and sobbed stormily.

The tempest was at its height when her mother knocked at the locked door.

"I want to speak to you, my daughter," she said, kindly, but decidedly, as Estelle delayed obedience to the summons.

The bolts were drawn back reluctantly, and the discolored face of the weeper was revealed.

"Your father said you did not seem well, and sent me up to you. 'What is it, my love?'" inquired Mrs. Wells, drawing her child to her bosom.

It all came out—the mortification, the anger, the longing, and the despair—an incoherent relital, broken by bursts of emotion, at which the parent did not smile as causeless or excessive.

"You think me a foolish baby, I know, mamma," said Estelle, finally, struck by her silence, and, raising herself to look at her, saw that she was very pale, and her eyes were full of tears.

"I do not, my dear. But I feel just now as if I could have died to save you from what you have borne. I know all about it—all the struggle, and the anguish, and the discouragement.

She had hoped, however, that my children"— she stopped, and finished the sentence with a sigh.

"Now," she resumed, more cheerfully, after a brief pause, "wash your eyes, and dress for inner. Your gray poplin was sent home today," opening a wardrobe, and displaying the silvery sheen of the drapery. "I am quite anxious to see how it fits."

The ruse succeeded. Estelle was fond of dress, as are most young ladies who have been carefully inducted into its mysteries, and she chatted away blithely, as her mother helped her on with her new robe, adding a stroke here and a touch there, speaking gently, loving words—unobtrusive sympathy that was very sweet.

"You are very lovely, my darling," she said, when the toilet was completed. "You have never worn anything more becoming."

"I ought to be lovely if I am anything like you," answered Estelle, putting her arms about her, and nestling in her embrace as she had in her babyhood. "All the sneers of the aristocracy cannot deprive me of this consolation, my pretty, pretty mamma."

Mrs. Wells wore mourning for her youngest child—a lustreless black silk, with jet ornaments, that made her fair skin look girlishly fresh and pure. Her blue eyes were soft and clear, her teeth perfect, and her hair still held the gold and gloss.

"I am glad I am a comfort, my pet. And I am very proud of my daughter. Do not let ill-natured people persuade you that you are not fit for any station, however exalted, Estelle.
You have sense, beauty, wealth, accomplishments, and these will do their work if we are patient and brave. The time will come when those who look down upon you, now, will be glad to welcome you as an equal."

Estelle's lids drooped. "But, mamma, it is tiresome, hateful work. Will the end pay for it all? I am weary with striving and straining. Are people never happy as they are?"

"They ought not to be so long as they are beneath their rightful station. I should be ashamed of you were you satisfied with less.
It has been the dream of long years with me that I should live to see my children take their places among the highest in the land."

There was still something upon the girl's mind. She hung back as her mother moved to the door, expecting to be followed.

"Mamma," coloring deeply, and looking only at her own nervous fingers, "I dislike to think, much less say it, but how is it that papa is so different from you? Will it always be so?
Was it so from the first?"

The blush in the mother's face rivalled the questioner's. She shut the door, and spoke low:—

"I understand what you mean, and you are old enough now to appreciate certain of the trials of my lot, of which I have never spoken to another creature. Papa and I, dearly as we love each other, are not agreed upon some, upon many points. His desires are simple;
his ambition is to succeed in business, rather than to shine in society."

Estelle could not help smiling.

"You are quite right," continued the wife, calmly. "It is a preposterous idea. I used to try, before I learned wisdom through failure, when we began to rise in the world, to remodel his tastes, and correct his habits of speech and manner, with what success you do not need to be told. He will remain plain Peter Wells to the day of his death. These solid, phlegmatic natures resist new impressions with stubbornness temperaments like yours and mine find it hard to bear with. I wish, for his children's sake, that it were not so, that he would have exerted himself while he could. But talking will not mend the evil. We will try to overlook everything that pains us in consideration of his real excellence, his kind heart, and open hand. It might have been much worse."

"I don't see"—began Estelle, impetuously, then checked herself with a frightened look.

Mrs. Wells took in her meaning as clearly as if she had said outright: "I do not see how you could have brought yourself to marry him."

"We were more congenial once." She said it very composedly, as if the contemplation of the change no longer gave her a pang. "In view of the good to be gained for my children by such a course, I have taken great pains to improve my mind and deportment since it seemed likely that they would occupy a more honorable position than that in which their parents were born. But we have talked enough upon this subject now, dear. Discussion will not alter facts."

She talked well, moved well, played the lady well—this daughter of the people, the factory-girl, who had found Paradise in three rooms in the days when she scouted the suggestion that money could bring happiness in its train. Quick to see, and deft in practice, she had brought, likewise, to the study of the rules governing the sphere in which she aspired to move, a steady purpose and stanch faith in herself. It was easy to reach and pass Fanny—"poor Fanny!" she usually called her to herself. She had sunk nearer her husband's level, instead of attempting to raise him; contracted many of his ways of speaking and more of his habits of thought and action.

"If he would not go with me, I would leave him," Ellie had said, long ago, seeing Fanny's declension, and in the resolution she had never flagged. She meant to mingle upon equal terms with accomplished women, to converse upon themes that engaged their attention in such terms as came easily to their lips, and she took private lessons in belles-lettres, French, music, and writing, much to Peter's amusement, then to his utter mystification.

"Why, you're the smartest, cutest woman in the world already, duckey," he ventured, when she announced her intention. "But, if you're a mind to study how to parleyvous and play the planner, I'll pay the piper. If it pleases you, it's all right. I promise to foot the bills without a word."

They had grown rich fast. Not in a day or a year, for Peter stuck like a limpet to his legitimate line of business, and abhorred wild speculations. But he was a born machinist, and he had improved upon other men's patent with ingenuity that brought in rich returns. He was both honest and enterprising, and, in whatever mine he quarried, he found wealth. He enjoyed the pursuit of it, less for the money's sake than for the excitement of the work. Every man is an enthusiast in something. His business was his pride and joy. There his was the master mind, and guided the vast concern with a master's hand.

"An ignoble ambition," his wife deemed it. "He thinks of, cares for nothing but heaping together riches. What they will procure is a secondary consideration."

Sometimes she was very tart with him on this point. If he really loved her, he would be interested in her pursuits, co-operate with her in her endeavor to make for the family a name and a place in the gay world. And Peter did try, to his own and her misery. He squeezed himself into a dress-coat, bandaged his fingers with white kid, and went faithfully and un-murmuringly to the wedding-receptions and crush parties, whereby the parvenues sought to imitate the painful follies of the real upper ten; bought high-priced tickets to operas, and concerts, and matinées; stared through his iorgnette at ballet dancers, when the men about him did so, blushing himself blind with bashful indignation he dared not express, while Ellie looked smilingly on. He displayed his portly figure at her side in her phaeton, or in the spacious "Clarence," where he felt so much like a fat goldfish in a globe that he reminded other people of the same; and took the frosty air in the family sleigh, still in attendance upon his spouse, at hours when conscience and inclination said he should be at his work. He even tried, at her solicitation, to learn how to drive, and was upset thrice as the reward of his self-devotion. He did not beg off. Ellie excused him, at last, after a trying novitiate. Not in appreciation of his earnest desire to serve and please her, but in hopelessness.

"You will never be anything but a business machine," she told him, plainly.

"I am afraid not, dear," assented the patient husband. "It's the thing I was brought up to, you see. I know I am a mortal dull scholar."

Then, she left him, as she had said it was Fanny's duty to do by her money-maker. Plain Peter was abandoned to his plainness, and his wife pushed upward. "For her children's sake," she said. She had two, now. That was "her number." She did not see what people wanted with more than a pair, a boy and a girl. This and more cant of the same stamp she had learned from modish mothers, the law of whose conduct and conversation was, "Suffer not little children to come unto me." But the best-laid schemes even of pattern matrons may "gang aley," and when Arthur, her second-born, was ten years old, a third child made his appearance, greatly to the mother's chagrin and the father's secret exultation. Mrs. Wells was "really ashamed, so mortified she could hardly look her acquaintances in the face at this atrocious failure of her arrangements." The unwelcome baby flourished apace, winning all about him to love and admiration, even the discomfited mother, and, at the age of four, was, Peter was ready to attest upon oath, the finest child in town, a miracle of beauty and sprightliness. "The image of his father," the grandmother did not scruple to declare. Mrs. Wells did not see the resemblance. The thought that her bonny boy could ever be fat and red-faced was not pleasant to her maternal vanity. He was already distinguished in person and bearing, and Peter was the opposite of distinguished-looking. Master Clarence had undoubtedly inherited his father's sunny temper and generous disposition. He loved everybody with all his might, and shone so warmly and brightly into every corner of heart and home that nobody ever dreamed of shadow until it fell. He sickened suddenly one night, struggled fearfully for a few hours in his father's arms—no others were strong enough to hold him—and breathed his last upon that father's lips as he bent for a farewell kiss.

Peter's notions about the funeral shocked the undertaker, who could hardly trust the evidence of his own ears when the rich man explained his wish to be for a private interment; that the remains should be taken to the cemetery in the family carriage, attended only by the parents, and be met there by a clergyman and the necessary workmen.

"Tisn't a time for parade and a crowd, 'cording to my way of thinking," said the social heretic.

"If you please, we will consult Mrs. Wells," replied the diplomatic mortuary agent, and had reason to felicitate himself upon his wise thought.

The funeral was a spectacle in its way. Such a profusion of flowers, such elegant and tasteful decoration of parlors and coffin, such an aristocratic disposal of the waxen image in the white satin niche of the casket, were rare in any circle. Mrs. Wells was evidently a woman of culture and æsthetic tastes, decided the fashionable rector who conducted the services; and certain of his flock, who, out of respect to Peter's wealth and the value of the same to the parish, crossed the threshold of his dwelling that day for the first time, began to debate the propriety of "taking her up." The mother dated at least three of her most desirable acquaintanceships from the visits of condolence paid within a few days after her boy's burial.

That was eighteen months ago. Estelle was now in very slight mourning, and Mrs. Wells had laid aside her crepe. The tide of worldliness, stayed for a brief space by the short mound, now shadowed by a chaste and costly tomb, had increased and prevailed until she went upon the face of the waters. She still drove out to the cemetery, at stated seasons, to lay flowers upon the baby's breast—oftenest in winter, when the exotics, strewed upon frozen earth or snow, told the passer-by that the dust beneath had sprung from a stock nurtured with gold.

"It may seem useless and extravagant to those who cannot enter into a parent's feelings," she would say, while dropping the fragile, shivering blooms upon the hallowed spot. "But it is all we can do for him now—our lost darling!"

Peter never mentioned the child's name voluntarily.

"I do not believe he has ever seen the grave since the day of the funeral," Mrs. Wells lamented to her chosen intimates. "So few gentlemen can read the depths of a mother's heart."

Peter did not reply when she upbraided him in like terms. She did not ask what he did with the Sunday afternoons he used to spend at home—why it was that neither storm nor heat could hinder him from taking the long walk from which he returned more grave, but gentler than when he set out, and he was never stern or irritable. His wife did not vex her brain with noting these symptoms of softness in the "business machine," received unthinkingly the fond kiss he imprinted almost reverently upon her lips when he came in. If Estelle were down stairs, he would ask her to play sacred music for him in the twilight—"to lull him to sleep," she and her mother laughingly agreed, for he would seem to listen for an hour without speaking or moving, sitting in an easy-chair, his head bowed upon his hand.

"I can't put things into words," Peter had said, eighteen years before, to his bride on the first Sabbath evening they passed in their own home. He liked the music-room better than any other of the first floor apartments, and for a singular reason.

"I like to have the door shut while you play, my dear," he had said once to Estelle. "The parlors seem so out-of-doors-like."

"As you please, papa, but when the halls are as warm as the rooms, inner doors are of little use."

"It's just one of my old-fashioned notions, I suppose," was the meek rejoinder.

He had not the "words" in which to tell her how the closed doors reminded him of the snugness and sacred privacy of his first, his only real home, when Ellie had time to sit by him, after the day's work was done, her hand in his, her head upon his shoulder—the Sabbath nights, when it came to her, as it did to him, how much they had to be thankful for. Decidedly Peter had low tastes. He was conscious that this was so, much better aware of his shortcomings than his wife imagined, for she had, as she thought, wasted breath in trying to prove to him the absurdity of not conforming their style of living to their means.

"You wouldn't have me live in a second-story 'flat,' and slave myself to death doing my own work, would you?" she argued, petulantly.

"Certainly not, dearie. I want life to go as easy with you as money can make it," he responded. "But you say, yourself, that servants are a nuisance, and that you never find time for anything you want to do, and you do seem to be driven to death all the while."

"It is unavoidable," said Ellie, imprudently. "No woman with the care of an establishment like this can attend to her social and domestic duties as she should without being overworked in body and mind. I am often so weary when I lie down at night that I cannot sleep for hours."

"Just so." Peter looked troubled. "The main thing I wanted to make money for was that you might be comfortable and happy. And it hain't done it. It bothers me awful. I wonder sometimes—but I ain't a judge of such things. You've got more brains than me, any day, and know better what ought to be. I did use to hope—there's no sense trying to say it, and maybe I'd as well leave it alone. All I want is for you to have what you like and be contented, little girl. If I knew how to make it easier for you, I would. It does look as if you had it kinder hard."

He could afford to give her plenty of money, and she spent it freely as she received it. In charities, as in household and personal expenditures, she was lavish, often as a means to an end, and that end her own aggrandizement.

"I cannot find time, amid the pressure of my manifold duties, to work for your cause," she would say, pleasantly, to lady-directors and collectors for benevolent objects. "But I esteem it a privilege to give."

She did find time to take a stall at a grand bazaar for the benefit of a great popular charity; furnished her wares from her private purse; and struck out so many charming novelties as to make her stand the principal attraction of the hall. It was a proud moment when, at a meeting of the managers, held in Mrs. Stuyvesant's library, that lady being President of the Board, Mrs. Wells modestly, but with perfect self-possession, passed over to the Treasurer a larger amount as the proceeds of her sales than was paid in by any one else, and gracefully "begged leave to supplement her returns" by a handsome check, bearing her husband's signature.

"You have done nobly, Mrs. Wells," the president said, graciously. "You deserve the thanks of the board and of the community."

At the next election of officers and members, they made her a directress of the institution, which throve in consequence of this stroke of worldly wisdom.

"A remarkable woman for one in her station," was the verdict of her superiors in rank. She guessed how they talked of her behind her back, from their patronizing demeanor to herself, but she saw, also, that her wedges were slowly making their way.

"I met Mrs. Lamson in the street this morning," observed Mrs. Lane, that day at dinner. "She asked most particular after you, Ellie, and why you never come to see her nowadays. I wish you could make it convenient to call there some day. 'Twould do her a power of good."

"I cannot call upon everybody, mother; and I do not feel that Mrs. Lamson's claims are strong."

"She was a friend to me and mine when we hadn't many," said Mrs. Lane, in a whimpering, childish way. "Many's the time she's come in and sot by the day with you children when I was out working."

"It was true, then!" ejaculated Master Arthur, with a shrill whistle. "Beg pardon, mother," seeing her reproving look, "but I flogged Syd Stuyvesant the other day at school for saying, when I pulled out my new watch to see what time it was, that that was a jolly turnip for a fellow to carry whose grandmother was a washerwoman. And such a trouncing as I gave him! It wasn't just on the square, it seems, hey, father?"

"You'd ought to have been sure you were right before you went ahead that time, my son," answered the father, smiling, in spite of himself, at his comical perplexity, while Estelle muttered something about the "Stuyvesants' impertinent meddling."

Mrs. Wells had improvised an errand to take the servant in waiting out of the room as soon as her mother began to whine. She had to be continually on the alert to avoid inconvenient disclosures.

"I think we can find some more suitable topic of conversation at table than school-riots," she said now, dryly.

The boy took the rebuke in good part. "It's hard to make school-boys gentlemanly, ma'am. Charley Burt, the head boy in our department, is the only one I ever knew who is never rough. But he's a brick, through and through. And, by the way, mother, I would like to bring him here some evening. He told me once that he used to know you when you lived in James Street. His father is a grocer, I believe."

"Burt! I don't remember the person."

The waiter was back in the room, and Mrs. Wells' languid indifference was a study.

"You're getting old and forgetful, Ellie," fretted Mrs. Lane. "They lived over the store. It was jist opposite your house. I mind him well, and his wife. She sat up with you one night soon after Stelly there was born, and you was so sick. A proper nice woman she was, and well-to-do in the world 'longside of what you was then. But times is changed. Ah, well! well!"

"I wish you to be very careful about your associates, Arthur," said his mother, warningly. "They may influence your whole after-life."

"Couldn't have a better mentor than Burt, ma'am. And he has a perfect genius for mechanics, sir; is a capital draughtsman. You'd like him ever so much."

Mrs. Wells' signal for a change of courses, and her weary look, checked Peter's reply. She was displeased as well as tired. Husband, son, and mother were in combination against her. Was not her task heavy enough by reason of fightings without? Must she also combat domestic treachery?

Peter followed Arthur into the street when the meal was concluded. "I think the more of you, my man, for standing up for your friend," he said, confidentially. "And I'd like to have you bring him to the shop." Peter often forgot to say "factory" when his wife was not by. "We've some grand machinery there he'd like to examine. His mother was a good woman and a kind neighbor. I've faith to believe she's bringing him up all right."

"A house divided against itself!" Estelle repeated, seeing the two walk off together. "How has mamma borne with her lot all these years? This union reminds one of the fable of the clove and the flower—the higher she rises, the further away she is from him. He doesn't see or feel this, but it must be a living sorrow to her. Poor mamma!"

MAIDEN WITH SOFT LOCKS OF GOLD.

BY ESPT.

MAIDEN with soft locks of gold,
And soft eyes of blue,
Fairest gems this earth does hold—
Which most fair to you?

Smiling, Maiden answered me:
Heart—set in pure Truth,
Soul—from every sin full free,
Love—the gem of Youth.

Maiden with soft locks of gold,
And soft eyes of blue,
In thy lover, lo! behold
Those gems prized by you.

INFINITE toil would not enable you to sweep away a mist; but, by ascending a little, you may often overlook it altogether. So it is with our moral improvement; we wrestle fiercely with a vicious habit, which could have no hold upon us if we ascended into a higher moral atmosphere.—Helps.

ALMOST.

ONE of the dreariest of the punishments allotted to the sinful souls in Hades was the endless endeavor of Sisyphus, that melancholy type of the Almost—that emblem of those whose doom is failure following on endeavor. Poor, baffled, striving ghost, he wrought his best to get the stone safely lodged at the top of the hill, whereby, on his succeeding, his pains were to be ended and the order of his release from anxiety and trouble was to come; and Hope, which never dies even in the Hades of sorrow, kept him to his task in spite of his monotonous persistency of failure. And his doom is repeated in our daily life with terrible frequency. The almost is so much more common than the attained! and the baffled struggle of strength with that which is stronger, is far sadder to bear than the forlorn effort after success in that which was ordained failure from the beginning.

Men spend their lives in this toilsome labor in vain—this almost, which is never quite. They live full in view of success, but never reach it; when they make sure that now, at all events, they are going to grasp it, it eludes them at the very moment of possession, and they find, like Ixion, that they have only clasped a cloud when they thought to have attained the Juno of their desires. Their hopes have duped them, and their powers betrayed them; and no one can tell exactly where the failure lies. Men who seemed to have every requisite for success, who are quick, clever, brilliant, facile; men who have far more brains than A., B., or C.; who have got to the top of the tree without much effort—for lack of something, fall in the whole; and every endeavor they make is only a Sisyphæan cast, with the stone coming down on their own heads as the result. These men and women of aspiration beyond attainment, of almost success that is never quite fulfilled, are great only to their friends, who see their good qualities at so short a range that their deficiencies are covered, and who, witnesses of the earnest efforts which seem to deserve success by virtue of their very sincerity, find it hard not to believe that they must one day obtain it. But these friends are not the public, and private praise is not popular acceptance, as the poor victim of self-delusion and misleading admiration finds when he gives to the lions what has hitherto been purred over by tame cats only, and critics have to judge in cool blood what lovers have applauded in warm. But to those lovers it will remain an unanswered puzzle for all their lives after, why the friend and lover failed when so many other men, so infinitely inferior, have succeeded; and on what plea it could have been that the public would have none of that which had so charmed them all. One by one they go over the roll-call of his pretensions, and ticket off his qualifications in a kind of debtor and creditor account with fame and merit; and, do what they will, they can never make their account come right, or balance the big ledger of failure to their own satisfaction.

It is with books as with individuals. We sometimes get hold of books, more especially poems and novels, which are almost up to the mark, but not quite, yet of which it is exceedingly difficult to say where the failure lies, and why they are not really good all through. They are so good in parts, so excellent in certain qualities, so graphic in certain passages; they have cleverness, insight, a wide range of reading—all valuable qualities in themselves—and yet the mixing up of these ingredients is as unskilful as the Frenchman's Christmas pudding, and the result is a failure, where, by all the rules of logic, it should have been a success. Meanwhile, other works, with not half the real excellence of these, strike the public fancy in the very centre, and achieve a success at which the author himself is maybe the most astonished of the audience. Every one knows of writers who have gone up in a blaze of glory on a very short allowance of powder; while others who have tugged and strained to mount aloft, as earnestly as ever Sisyphus tried to "put" the stone, have never succeeded, though their rockets were fully charged and their set pieces well designed. They have almost done it, but never quite; and all they have to show as the result of their labors is a collection of half-burned sticks, and scattered fragments of spoiled paper. If we could put our finger on the cause of the failure, it would be no longer a failure, but it is just the indefiniteness of the want, the uncertainty of cause, which makes improvement impossible, and success a dream destined never to be realized. It is the same with beauty. How often we see a woman who is almost beautiful, who ought to have been very lovely, yet who has scarcely attained good looks. No one knows why she is so plain when she ought to have been so beautiful. She has good features and a pleasant manner; but what is it that spoils her? Who can tell? If you can distinctly formulate the why, you have got rid of the almost, which is failure by a negation, by an unexpressed want, and have come to the analysis of causes, which is failure of a positive kind.

This failure by the almost is the curse of men. A more distinct want would prevent their trying to put themselves into wrong places, to bend impossible bows, and take an unattainable aim. But it is the almost which leads one so far astray; which makes one toil and toil so unsatisfactorily; which makes one strive to fix oneself securely in the square hole when one is as round as a Suffolk punch; which makes one go through unheard-of efforts to fit into the round hole when one has as many points and angles as a polygonal crystal. It seems such a small thing that is wanting to make all straight! Surely, by a little squeezing, and paring and patting, we can manage it! So we lose our time and strength in trying to do that against which nature herself has set an unalterable decree, and we ignore the differences of shape and size in our insane desire to attain the practically impossible and the seemingly easy. Cinderella's sisters almost got their feet into the glass slipper, but they failed somewhere, either in the toe, or the heel, or the side; and the almost, though near the quite, did not secure the young prince as a husband. All these hazy conditions are tiresome to the soul of man; all just-reached heights more wearing to the spirits than good, honest failure, which never had a chance of getting to the top from the moment it set out. And yet it is better to try, with failure as the result, than to be content with grovelling infirmity; though, on the other hand, it is better to do the work that lies before us, and that we can do with such facilities as we have, than to go off on a life-long expedition to Sisyphean stone-rolling, without the chance of getting to the top, or doing that for which we are trying.

Can any one tell why we do not thoroughly like some people, who yet are very worthy folks, and with certain qualities by no means to be despised? We think of these qualities and we admire them; we see our friends and we dislike them. We are ignorant of the cause why we do so much dislike them; and, if we have any conscience or power of self-reproach, we take ourselves to task for our prejudice, and resolve not to give way to it again. But we never conquer the feeling, and to the last remain conscious of a want, a something which we cannot explain, yet which throws us off from anything like real cordiality. It is negative throughout. A little more of something, and we should actively like them; a little more of something else, and we should as actively dislike them. As it is, the balance hangs so evenly that we lose the positive in the almost, and are none the happier for the vagueness.

Hard to bear in all things, the almost of faith is pain unmitigated. "Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian;" but that word was a barrier as impassable as the highest Alps. Those who have drifted away from the creed of their childhood, and have got hold of none other—who yet are anxious to be something, to have a definite and distinct faith, who are almost, but not quite converted—are of all men the most miserable. All the arguments of friends and relatives shake, but do not convince. It would be better for them to think as they are bidden, and they almost do so, but not quite; for the soul can no more attain the perfectness of completed faith by will than Sisyphus could roll that rock of his up hill and pitch it where it would hit and stand firm. If faith was to be had by the wishing to believe, we should do better; but though endeavor is the sole method whereby spiritual light as well as worldly success, is obtained, a clear spiritual insight does not always come by taking pains and striving after; and "almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian" is the cry of many an undecided spirit beside that of Agrippa, he who could not get beyond the vague to the positive, nor pass from the region of the almost to that of the quite.

TO MY MOTHER.

BY L'ÉCLAIR.

DEAR mother, I am thinking, as the twilight gathers gray,
Of friends who knew and petted me in childhood's happy day,
Of pleasures dead and buried, of sunny hopes that smiled
Beyond the bright horizon when I was but a child.
The great book of the by-gone lies open in my hand;
And, as I turn its pages, I seem again to stand Beside you, darling mother, scarcely higher than your knee,
Looking at your busy fingers making something nice for me.
I can see my little brother, too, the one that's gone before,
With all his pretty playthings at your feet upon the floor;
How he tossed them all behind him, when he tired of his play,
And crowded for you to take him in his pretty, baby way;
Then you put aside your sewing, rocked your little one to rest,
While I kissed his chubby fingers as they lay upon your breast.
Many years beneath the violets his sunny head has lain;
I can never kiss his darling, little, dimpled hand again.
Beside my older brother, who had been the first to go,
They laid your precious "Tommy" gently, tenderly, and low.
I remember, too, the letter saying grandmamma had died—
And father read it to you, sitting on the steps, and cried.
She had left a little daughter, eight years old, the letter said,
And they wanted you to have her, now that grand-mamma was dead.
She came—you called her "Betty," as you kissed her childish brow,
And told me I must love her as an older sister now;
When we grew and played together through many varied years—
Some hours bright and golden, some embalmed in precious tears.
Ah! those visions of my childhood, how they crowd about me now,
As memory's hand is sweeping back the shadow
from my brow!
I love to think upon them, love the dreamy light they cast
About the silent chambers of the unforgotten past.
I cannot tell you, mother, all the burning thoughts that come
And fill my heart, when thinking of my childhood's happy home.

The friends that now are scattered, who in youth were gathered there,
One by one they glide before me, like sweet spirits in the air;
They come around me lovingly, and bear my spirit back,
So gently and so tenderly, along the olden track;
They carry me, dear mother, to the old house on the hill,
With its quaint, old-fashioned parlor—how well I love it still!
I see again in memory the bright and happy throng
Around the old piano, joining in the evening song.
There "Mary" sang the sweetest, and 'woke the deepest thrill
Of all the youthful voices that floated o'er the hill.
Poor "Mary!" how we loved her, with her bright and laughing ways;
Her spirit steals upon me now, a "light of other days."
But trouble came upon her from the day she was a bride,
Though she never, never murmured; of her silent grief she died.
And he who won her from us sleeps in death beside her now—
Spring flowers bright are blossoming above his icy brow.
Two little orphan children, playing 'round the cottage door,
Recall their mother's childhood from the happy days of yore.
My father's younger brother, scarcely older than the rest,
Is wedded to the playmate that I always loved the best.
"Betty" married and is widowed, she is childless and alone—
Her path was strewn with roses that are faded now and gone.
Ah! life is full of changes, full of partings and of tears,
While time is slowly filling up the graves of early years.
Our happy band is broken, we are scattered far and wide,
For time has borne us onward with its ever-rushing tide.
I, too, have wandered, mother, from the place I loved so well,
To wear another name, and in another's home to dwell.
I know he loves me dearly, and my heart is full of joy
When I gaze upon my husband and my laughing baby boy.
Life's sweetest draught I've tasted when the cup was running o'er,
But I often wish, dear mother, I could be a child once more.

TRUTH is the bond of union and the basis of human happiness. Without this virtue there is no reliance on language, no confidence in friendship, no security in promises and oaths.
—Collier.

GIVE not thy tongue too great a liberty, lest it take thee prisoner. A word unspoken is like the sword in the scabbard, thine; if vented, thy sword is in another's hand. If thou desire to be held wise, be so wise as to hold thy tongue.

AFTER DARK.

BY LOUISE BARTON.

KATHIE EVELYN leaned from the carriage window at the railway station for a last glimpse of the towers of Evelyn Court upon their wooded hill. It was through blinding tears that she looked back; for this was her first parting from the home which had been hers since her childish days of orphanhood, and from the aunt and cousin, who had been mother and brother to her. Something dearer than a brother, Rumor whispered, was or would be Arthur Evelyn. Kathie herself would have been at a loss to confirm or to deny that statement of Dame Rumor's. But the tears beginning to drop behind her hastily-lowered veil, when distance snatched away those towers, testified to a regretful heart looking back, and a heavy heart looking forward to this duty visit. She was bound for an island hermitage off the Scottish coast, and she had no mind for hermit-life, nor did she consider its horrors diminished by being shared with her mother's invalid sister, whom she could hardly remember having ever met. To be sure, the island had its lord also—the stepson of her Aunt MacDonald. But neither did he lighten the anticipated horrors, as she now glanced up at him—that dark, stern man opposite, who, after offering her a number of Blackwood, bent over a review a moment, then, with a suppressed sigh, dropped it, and, drawing his hat down over his brow, sat there apparently lost in thought, his arm flung over the back of his seat.

Utter oblivion such as this she was not accustomed to, and over the pages lying open in her lap she hurled at his bowed, careless head all the mental scoffs which arose in her memory—from Ronald Dhu to "wild John Hieland-man," and

"The kilted clan of high-born beggars, MacLeans, MacDonalds, and MacGregors."

But Black Ronald was unmoved by these unuttered sneers, and hardly stirred till hours after they were whirled past a glimpse of sea-green water glancing in the sunlight.

"Solway Frith," he said. "We are on the Scottish border at last," and his eyes brightened, and presently, "and this is Gretna."

"Gretna!" Kathie's eyes brightened, too, with eager curiosity, and she turned toward the window, which MacDonald opened wider for her.

"There! there is the traditionary harmonious blacksmith," he said, and pointed out the overgrown, florid Hymen, who stood there, as is his wont, at the incoming of the over-the-border trains. He was peering about among the passengers for some young couple needing his assistance in the welding of those fetters which made up the most important business of his forge. He soon espied the two who were leaning together in the window, their gaze fixed on him as though they were just awaiting the stopping of the train—so closely they leaned together, and so earnestly gazed out, while traces of tears yet lingered upon Kathie's blushes, that the little sharp eyes twinkled.

He stepped forward as if of set purpose. But Kathie drew back hastily, and blushed and laughed as she met her companion's smile.

There was no fugitive bride that day, but the ice was broken from Kathie's heart, and the sun was shining more cheerily as miles went by. Then gloaming and distance snatched away the gleams and glooms of Solway, of the Nith, that so long followed up in smiling friendly wise, the road—of the great mountains to the right, and last of gloomy Ayr.

For Ayr was glooming when they quitted the railway, and, after a rapid drive of some miles along its banks, passed the town of Ayr, and touched the coast of the Frith of Clyde, where a well-manned barge was in waiting to convey the travellers to the island home.

MacDonald lifted Kathie to her seat, and remarked that the night was mild and the sea smooth, and the three miles would speedily be passed. But to Kathie the waves seemed rolling to engulf her, and the sea-breeze blew so chill to her—inland valley-bred as she was—that she shivered beneath her shawls, and MacDonald wrapped his boat-cloak round her. She shivered yet, however.

"I am so afraid," she said, with chattering teeth, as he bent down toward her.

"Will you not trust me to take care of you?" he smiled in return.

Arguments and declarations of safety would not have reassured her like that smile. So well did it succeed that fear gave place to exceeding weariness, and ere very long her head had dropped beneath its weight of sleep; and, after nodding uncomfortably and dangerously several times over the side of the boat, it found its rest on MacDonald's ready shoulder, much to her consternation when the grating of the boat's keel on the pebbly island beach awoke her. She started up unsteadily.

"How cold, how dreary it all is!" she murmured, with a shiver, as she sprang ashore, and faintly descried the crag which overhung the beach. Above her, against the black, starlit skies, beside a more modern square building, rose a single gaunt, dilapidated tower through the jagged rent in which twinkled a single star, as if to light its darkness.

"How cold, how dreary!" she was ready to repeat, when on MacDonald's arm she had surmounted the formidable cliff. But she did not give voice to the words. For he held out his hand, as if to welcome her to her new home, and was saying in a low tone:—

"Miss Evelyn, bear with us for the six months you must be here, even though you find us little cheerier than this, your first glimpse.

Your aunt is frail in health and—temper, and it is at best a dreary sojourn for a young girl. But it will not be altogether dreary to look back upon, if, when you leave us, you know that you have left some brightness to our invalid's dull life."

Without pausing for reply, he threw open the outer door, and, guided by a faint glimmering of light beneath an inner threshold, led her across the hall, and unclosed another door.

A more cheerful scene now presented itself. A broad open hearth, the glow from which, although the fuel was peat, lit up well-filled book-shelves, which lined the walls, and gleamed upon a few old pictures, a table strewn with books and papers, and the three or four sofas and easy-chairs which completed the simple but comfortable furniture of the apartment. But Kathie hardly noted anything save a sofa wheeled before the hearth, on which reclined a woman wasted beyond trace of beauty, who held out a languid hand, and almost whispered:—

"Ronald, have you brought her? Katharine, is it you, my love?"

Those latter days of June had faded to November's earlier ones. November's bleakest, grayest evening sky swayed downward toward the ancient chapel on Inch Fruin and its bleak, bare churchyard, where the winds would hardly suffer the old yews to keep their footing, and wrenched and blasted them, until they were almost as rugged and blasted as the cliffs themselves. Among the crosses and the old gray stone sarcophagi, which marked generations after generations of the MacDonald, lay a mound, whose sod could not yet show one blade of grass, a sod whereon the tears of yesterday were hardly dry. And more fell now. A young girl in deep mourning knelt, her brow bent on the clasped hands resting on the grave. Her slight frame shook with quick, convulsive sobs, and her tears dropped like rain. Now and then she lifted herself up wearily, and pushed the damp hair from her brow, and let her dimmed eyes rest upon the sea, while she moaned, half-aloud:—

"Aunt Jean! Aunt Jean! Oh, if you had but lived, had kept me with you." Then she wrung her hands anew, and hid her face again.

Yes, underneath this sod lay Jean MacDonald. The feeble life-flame, which had flickered almost out, then up again so many years, and in its feeble and uncertain fitfulness had cast a gloom around, had for a brief period burned brighter in bright Kathie's presence, and then suddenly, with scarce a warning quiver, had died out. All the fitfulness was forgotten when the two only mourners—Kathie Evelyn and Ronald MacDonald—side by side stood, and listened to the hollow fall of earth on earth. Only the memory of her last faint smile, and words choked by the death-rattle, as she held the strong hand and the little one together in her slackening clasp, remained. And Kathie to that memory was weeping even now. But other thoughts than those of Jean MacDonald, and other tears than those which fell for her, far other moan than that for poor "Aunt Jean" was Kathie struggling with, and trying hard to lose in the solemnity and coldness of this place. Yet even here they would come back, make themselves heard, and—

"Kathie! Miss Evelyn! you here?"

She started and rose trembling to her feet. What had she said? Were her wild thoughts but uttered in her own heart's depths, or sobbed forth in the raging of the winds? She could not recollect. Her heart beat fast and loud, and she was fain to let him draw her arm through his.

"My little cousin must not brave so wild a night," he said. Then, very softly: "Little Kathie, could she speak now, she would bid you shed no tear for her. It would but mar her longed-for rest to see you grieve. And, when you look your last to-morrow on Inch Fruin, remember that your presence lent its dreary shores a light which they can never lose. Right faithfully have you fulfilled your task."

She could not answer, and he drew her on, nor paused until they gained the castle. Once, when with a fierce blast the wind swept by, he wrapped his plaid about the shivering figure. But no word was spoken till they stood together on the library hearth.

She sank down on the chair he wheeled there for her, sank down, dropped her arms before her listlessly; while he leaned upon the mantel, his face turned toward her in a watching attitude. All at once he started, and put his hands across his eyes, with a heavy groan.

Kathie sprang to her feet. He was so deathly pale her very heart stood still. What could it be? She glanced around wildly, and caught sight of a decanter of wine upon the table near. She poured out a glass, and held it to his white lips, putting her other hand entreatingly upon his shoulder, as he stood there with closed lids.

He drank, as she wished him, and then his eyes opened, and he put out his arm as if to take the glass from her, but he did so strangely, almost gropingly. And, when he attempted to place it on the mantel, it was with so uncertain a touch that it fell and cracked upon the hearth.

"Are you ill?" Kathie asked, breathlessly.

He strove to smile. "Not ill, little friend. Only that which I have feared for months and months has come to pass. Not ill, only blind."

"Blind!" the word broke from her in a walling cry. "Blind! Surely, surely, you cannot mean it?"

"You are but a faint, vague shadow to me, Kathie. I shall never see you more."

"It is but dizziness," she cried out, eagerly. "It will pass over, and"— "Nay," he interrupted, calmly. "It is no new, no unexpected thing. The surgeons told me, even before I saw you first, that I had much to fear, that all their skill might avail nothing. It is a paralysis of the nerve. A touch of this I have had before, but not to this degree."

"Oh, I cannot, cannot understand this!" she moaned. "It is so sudden."

"Nay, not sudden, Kathie. Strange that you have never observed it. In your knowledge of me, have you seen me once do more than idle over the pages of a book?"

"I—I thought you did not care to read," she said.

His smile was all his answer.

"But you walked, you rode"—she began.

"Yes. Until to-night I certainly saw 'men as trees, walking.' But to-night even that is gone."

"You do not see me?"

"Just a shadow, nothing more."

She caught his hand in both her own, and led him to the chair he had placed for her. She stood beside him, great tears pouring down, but a wondrous light shining through them—a light which, could he have seen it, would have been the fairest of all rainbows of promise, and the surest pledge that no flood of anguish could sweep over and lay desolate his whole dark life. But her lips refused to form one word of comfort. Only one thing would they utter had they dared. If they must not entreat to stay beside him, if they dared not presumptuously say she could be eyes and light in the dark that had fallen upon him, they would not speak at all.

He spoke, however, presently. Her journey on the morrow was that which he touched upon, and whether she was sure beyond a doubt of meeting Mrs. Evelyn at Ayr. She hardly found voice to reply with a satisfactory affirmative. Then he said:—

"And now, dear Kathie—may I not so claim you as a cousin?—go and finish your last preparations. You need rest, I know, and I, too, as, of course, I cross with you to-morrow, and put you myself in Lady Evelyn's care. Nay, not one word—is it other than a pleasure to me? One last charge—do not think over these, our troubles, but go to rest early, 'as thou lovest me.'"

Swift blushes swept across her face, but left her paler than before. She hesitated, then said, oh! how softly:—

"Do not send me from you. Let me stay."

"That cannot be," he said.

"My—my aunt will come," she returned, hurriedly.

While she hesitated, embarrassed, he replied, in tones so cold that shame took away her very breath:—

"I need neither aid nor pity, Kathie. What I have to bear, I have long borne in anticipation, and am able to bear, even to the end. And now good-night!" he said, more gently. "Give me thoughts sometimes, not regrets. I shall do very well, believe me."

She merely touched his extended hand, and hastened from the room, hardly able to keep down the stifling sobs until she gained her chamber, and flung herself upon the bed, where all night long she moaned and sobbed.

Neither did sleep touch those darkened eyes below. All night he sat there in his place, nor stirred, while the red fire faded there before him.

Mrs. Evelyn ascribed Kathie's pallor and absent manner to the death-scene she had gone through and the dolefulness of the past months. Therefore, while Arthur was finishing his collegiate course, she determined Kathie's mourning season should be spent in travel on the Continent. The winter passed before Kathie again set foot on British shores, and then, to Arthur's exasperation, it was not to return to the old quiet. No, Mrs. Evelyn had brought back two young cousins from a Paris pension. Evelyn Court was given up to a round of gayeties, and Kathie's excessive politeness—acquired, she declared, laughingly, in France—would not grant Arthur a ride, a walk, or twilight chat, apart from the guests. Instead, she adroitly threw the prettier of the French cousins upon Arthur's mercies, shrewdly de-vining that those mercies would become tender, when once he should be convinced of the indifference of his cousin-german. He had not yet found an opportunity to put that question to Kathie which Rumor had answered for her a year before, and it was no wonder time lagged at Evelyn Court for him. For Kathie also. In vain she longed for tidings from Inch Fruin. She grew restless and more restless, and when, one day, Mrs. Evelyn proposed a jaunt before the London season, neither she nor Arthur cared to oppose. Indeed, she presently came out in quite a new character—as an artful schemer, and managed in a most underhand way that the indefinite jaunt should lead into Scotland. Once in that "land o' cakes," she insidiously labored to inspire an ardent enthusiasm for Burns and his haunts in the bosoms of the Paris-bred girls, and in consequence had the satisfaction, one evening, of wandering down "the banks and braes o' bonnie Doon" to where that river emptied into Clyde, within sight of Inch Fruin.

Within sight, yet there yawned the sea, like the gulf between Paradise and the parched and yearning soul gazing over in torments beyond. So Kathie thought, as she paced the shore, and watched the sun aslant on the smooth frith. A yawl, with sails as silvery white as the gull's wing, was drawn up on the beach, and a fisherman had just sprung out. Kathie saw, and dropped her longing eyes; but Elise cried out:—

"Voilà, ma cousine! De grâce, one little sail!"

Mrs. Evelyn looked, and seemed pleased.

"But Kathie—she is so timid on the water," she demurred.

"Kathie and I will stay," began Arthur, eagerly.

"Why, Arthur, are you dreaming?" cried his mother. "Do you think we are any of us going to trust ourselves without you?"

"Kathie," he began again.

"But, indeed, indeed, Kathie is not afraid," that damsel answered, eagerly. "Just see! The sea is smooth as glass. I am not such a wretched coward as all that."

Mrs. Evelyn was speaking to the boatman; and engaged his willing services. And Kathie knew—so set the friendly wind—that they were bound one way—her way.

Afraid! The blood beat high in heart and cheek, as she sat with her eyes fixed upon the north-west point, where Inch-Fruin appeared—a gray blur on the brightness of the Frith. After the first, it seemed quite natural that two or three curious voices should inquire what here was to see on yonder island, and receiving the information that there was a very ancient chapel well worth seeing, should agree to visit it.

"But," hesitated Mrs. Evelyn, "it is surely not a desert island, and, perhaps, we may intrude."

"Deil a fear o' that, my leddy. The laird is blind as ony stane, and bides a' days at hame, folk say. Forbye that, he is a gentleman vha'll no grudge ae blink o' his bit kirk—nae nair bit, or sup, or gear, that I mysell ken icht weel."

Stone blind! Poor Kathie's face lost all its color, and she only constrained herself to almsness, when she heard Arthur's voice attempting to dispel the fears of sea-perils which, he fancied, caused her pallor. She forced herself to reply, to laugh, to jest, but what a mockery it was!

At last the boat keel grated on the beach. Arthur sprang out, and once more her foot pressed the dreary strand which night and morning she had longed for, since she last had tood there. But she could not look on the familiar scene. She seated herself on a rock, and begged her aunt and the cousins all, to go upon their antiquarian explorations; they would find her here on their return.

Her aunt blamed herself anxiously for having ventured on the trip, but Kathie made light of it, and, as her color had returned in a degree, she soon prevailed on them to leave her.

They rounded the promontory, beyond which the road led upward to the chapel-crag. And as they passed, Kathie, swiftly as the wind, fled in the opposite direction. Away she went, over the beach, and up the old hewn stairs within the crag. She rushed on, blind with haste, and hearing only the wild beating of her heart. Deaf to sounds of slow approaching steps, at a sudden corner in the wide stairs she rushed against an old white-haired man descending.

"Why, Duncan, is it you?" she cried, recognizing an ancient servitor of the house.

"Hech sirs! Miss Kathie!" he ejaculated; then struck dumb with amazement, until Kathie said, breathlessly:—

"Your master, Duncan, I have heard that he is blind, and I am come to see him."

"Blessings on your bonny face, lassie; bonny, and gude as bonny. Eh, but he'll be sair, sair grieved not to see it."

"Will he, Duncan?"

"Will he? Hear till her! What for no, when he just sits his lane! the dreel gloaming, and mair than once when I hae hearkened, he wad gi'e a 'Kathie! Kathie!' in siccan a sigh. But gude sakes, lassie, dinna greet that gate. Come ben; he's out by the crag yet, but I'll 'een fetch him in."

"Don't tell him I am here," said Kathie, the tears pouring down her white cheeks.

"Na, na, I gang a' days to fetch him when the gloaming falls."

She went into the library and sat down in her old familiar seat, just opposite his, close by the table. Moments of silence to her lengthened into hours. Then came footsteps—Duncan's, and one more uncertain, wavering yet, than Duncan's. Then the old man's quavering tones, saying:—

"Will ye no speer after my news, MacDonal? I'll gi'e it ye, then, ony gate. Miss Kathie's hame again fra' oure the seas, and gaed by, twa sennights past, wi' a blithe party for the far Hielands. I'se uphaud it for a shame that she suldna gi'e a flitting blink at auld Inch-Fruin."

"Stop, Duncan," his master interrupted, sternly. "Inch-Fruin and its master have no claim upon Miss Evelyn."

"No claim!" Poor Kathie! And her heart beat so, while Duncan closed the library door upon him, and she saw him slowly grope his way by wall, and chair, and table, till he came and leaned, as he was wont, in the old place against the mantel.

Ah, how changed! Not only the dim eyes dropped down beneath the heavy lids, but there were threads of gray through the dark hair; there were hard lines of pain around the firm set mouth; there was an air of resolute endurance, of unending strife with some fierce pang. This the girl felt, looking up into the face unmasked to her. While she looked, the anguish deepened there. The lips unclosed with a hard breath:—

"Kathie! My God! altogether forgotten!"

She could bear it no longer. Her lips parted, but no word would come. She rose up shivering—so near, the little hand outstretched touched his, clenched on the marble. He started violently.

"What is this? Who is this? This hand, surely!"

He had grasped it. She found her voice at last.

"I have come back to you," she said, unsteadily.

"Kathie!"

The thrilling, broken cry, it went straight to her heart. And she forgot the friendly speech she had prepared to say to him. She forgot everything, save that she loved, he suffered. She drew nearer yet. She laid her head upon his breast. He held her fast there. The strong broad breast was heaving, and it was a moment before he could master himself sufficiently to speak.

"Is it my Kathie?" then he said, almost in a hoarse whisper.

"Yours." Her voice was clear and passing sweet.

"Yet stay," he said, more firmly, though with effort. "If it is compassion which has brought you here!"

"Ronald!"

"Oh, my darling, mock me not. Shall not I, blind though I be, know it? If you do not love me, Kathie, go. I shall still remember this hour as the best and brightest of my life, which never can be wholly dark again, since my one love has lightened it."

He loosed his clasp. His arms fell at his side. But a soft hand caught his and held it to her beating heart.

"Ronald, if you cannot see, then feel what brought me here."

PONDROUS PAPERS—NO. 3.

STOCKTON is sometimes called the city of windmills; and, when we come in site of it, and saw all the windwheels a-whirlin' in all parts of it, like great white wings, it seemed as if by a little enchantment the city might fly away as fast as we approached it. It made me think of something I read in the "Arabian Nights" when I was a girl. But it remained steadfast enough, and we rode through the streets jest as the sun was goin' down.

We stopped at a tavern—there! John told me I ought to call it a hotel, but I keep forgettin'. Anyway, it was big and grand enough to make me feel very lonesome. I was pretty tired, and was jest restin' me on a sofy, when a lady came in. "Well, now," thinks I, "I wonder if that's the new-fasherned waterfall that Mrs. Farnham has been yearnin' for, and I wonder if it wouldn't cure her to see it?"

For the lady's hair was done up most on top of her head, and stuck out amazin'ly. She had a little hat on, but her hair crowded it clear down most to her nose. All to once I noticed her dress skirt had got unfastened; she had on a little sack, so I couldn't see how, whether 'twas ripped or unpinned, but I wondered she didn't notice it, for it was draggin' as much as a foot and a haff on the floor. I was frightened, for plenty of ladies and gentlemen were walking round in the hall and out on the balcony, and I thought they might be in any time. So I run up to her, and whispered:—

"Oh, miss, your dress skirt has got onpinned or something; it's all droppin' off, anyway. Sha'n't I help you fix it up before anybody comes in?"

She looked startled, and clapped both her hands under her sack a minit, and then said, quite haughtily:—

"Why, there's nothing the matter with it; it is all right, madam."

"The Lunnun to boot!" says I. "But it's all draggin'."

She looked me all over from head to foot, and then how she did larf, just the pleasantest, ringing voice she had.

"Where did you come from, you dear woman?" says she. "Didn't you know that trains had been in fashern two or three years?"

"Trains!" says I.

Then she took off her sack, and walked across the room, to let me see how she looked.

"Oh, yes!" says I. "Like Queen Elizabeth and them pictures of old English times, and Queen Esther in my Bible?"

"That's it. But how surprised and bewildered you did look."

"I'm jest surprised all the time," says I, "like Rip Van Winkle was when he woke up," and then I told her about my life and where I lived.

"I don't wonder things look odd to you," says she.

"Everything does," says I. "I'm surprised the whole durin' time. Do I look outlandish myself?"

"Well, your bodist waist does look a little queer," and she smiled real harty. "Oh, dear!" says she, "I do wish Carrie would come in, so you could see her. I ain't dressed in the latest style by enny means. I think I hear her voice, now," and she run to the door and called somebody.

I jest braced myself, determined not to be startled; but, there! when she come in, I couldn't help it. She had a gay shawl all swaddled round her shoulders in the most awkward way; she took it off and her hat, too, but didn't look much better. Her hair was frizzled in front, and pouched out behind—such a big, heavy-looking bag of it. Her dress was pretty short and ruffled, so many ruffles, and so many bows, loops, and ruffled ends at her back, with a piece of ruffled cloth puffed out under them. It was a panyer, they told me. I was glad when she went out walkin' so queer on her high-heel shoes.

Miss Spencer, the lady I first met, was real kind. She said I must take a magazeen when I went home. 'Twould be real company for me, and then I would know what was going on in the world. She thought fasherns changed too often now-a-days, she didn't try to keep up with them. All her newest dresses were made short, though; they kept so much cleaner.

About nine o'clock, when I was jest thinkin' of going to bed, she came and asked if I didn't want to go into the ball room. I wasn't brought up to dance, but I told John, bein' as we was out sight seein', we would go in a little while, 'specially as I never see a company dancin'.

We got in jest as the men in the gallery was a-tunin' their fiddle. Pretty quick the gentlemen begun to go round the hall to the ladies, and bow very low, and drop their arms strait down before, and ask them to dance. And in a minit they was all a-hoppin' round like a passle of snow-birds. I couldn't see no sense in it, though they looked kind of pretty.

Most of the girls were dressed real neat, though a few had their dresses too low in the neck. One of 'em came next to me to rest herself. Her dress was so very low that I said to her, says I:—

"You poor child, you hain't no mother, I guess, to tell you how bad you look with such a low-neck dress on. Do take this shally scarf and throw over you."

"Thank you, ma'am, I don't want none of your shaller scarfs, nor your shaller speeches either," and she whirled away with her face red as could be.

I guess she thought she would be revenged, for she sent a young man to ask me to dance.

He bowed dreadful low, so I could see over the top of his head.

"No, I can't dance," says I. "But if you'll set down a minit, I'll tell you what to put on your head to keep the hair from fallin' out. I see it's getting awful on top for such a young man. Now, you jest git caster oil, and rub plenty!"—

"Really, madam, you're too kind."

"Well, now, perhaps I'm too unkind, for, come to look at you, I don't b'lieve you'd make fun of a poor body like me, unless you was put up to it. You do remind me of some one; now set down, and tell me your name."

"Charles Gordon, Jr., at your service."

"Do tell! Now there was a schoolmate of mine named Amelia Clark, she married a Charles Gordon."

"Amelia Clark Gordon is my mother's name, and she is here to-night, right over opposite us; that one with a brown silk dress on. Come over and see her."

"Oh no; I am such a humbly old-fashioned woman I don't think I will."

"I guess she'd be glad to see you," said he, hesitatingly.

"No, I don't mean to resk it, but you can tell her I'm here, and then she can come and see me if she likes. She used to know me as Jane Mason."

Bime by I see him talkin' to his mother, and she looked at me, but never came a nigh me. She looked very young for her age, and had an ostrich feather in her hair. It set me thinkin' how, when we was girls together, I took my knittin' and went over to see her one day. She was up chamber, and had been sweepin' the rooms, and was pickin' up the feathers that had got shook out of the pillows and feather beds, and was savin' them in a little bag. She said all she got that way was her own, besides, she had all pickin' of the geese once a year, and she thought she'd have a lot of extra pillows time she was married.

I told her I never thought of such a thing; my mother had all the feathers for spare beds. She said I didn't know how to look out for myself, and I'd always be as poor as Job's turkey. Now I s'pose she thought I was too poor to speak to. I soon got tired of the dancin' and went off to bed.

Next morning Mr. Pondrous and I was goin' out to buy some things, and Miss Spencer said she'd go along with us if I'd like to have her. I was real glad to have her, so we went to a milliner's first to git a bonnet. I asked for one, and they showed me a little lace diamond shaped thing, with roses in the center, and some long ribbons to it.

"What's that?" says I.

"A lace bonnet," says the milliner. "Here's a straw one if you prefer, very stylish; just suit an elderly lady."

"No it don't suit me," says I. "It has no hind part or front part, or scarcely any middle. I 'bout as leve go bearheaded and done with it."

"I'll tell you what to do," says Miss Spencer. "Git a small sundown; that'll be good to travel in."

"Small sundown?" says I.

"Oh dear! dear!" says she, "I never shall git used to your bein' Van Winkle. I mean a hat like those over there when I say sundown."

She and John was dredful pleased at my talk, and I larft with 'em, told 'em I should learn after a while, but I thought I was too old to wear a hat; I was sure of that, enny way.

"No, you're not too old," says Miss Spencer. "Everybody wears hats now-a-days, and you'd soon git to like it, would look well, too; you've got nice hair if you only wouldn't twist it quite so hard."

Then she put the hat on my head and made me look in the glass. I didn't like it, but 'twas better than the bonnets, so I took it. Then we went to another place to git some dresses and a shawl. When I took out my money to pay for them, there was some six or seven copper cents with it, that I'd had ever since I'd been in Californy.

"Good gracious!" said a young man who had come up to talk with Miss Spencer. "Excuse me, madam, but I have not seen a copper before for ten years; makes me think of home. I'll give you haff a dollar if you'll let me have them."

"That would be cheatin' yourself."

"No, I shall donate them to a ladies' fair to be held here next week. They'll sell for—I don't know how much. Folks will buy them jest because they'll remind them of home."

"Well," said I, "I'll donate them, and you can go and buy one with your haff dollar."

"Very well," said he, as I gave them to him. "Miss Spencer will tell you how much they bring if you are not there yourself."

Come to think it over, I concluded to stop to the fair, then I could go to church on Sunday. Miss Spencer said she had nothing to do, and she would help me make up a dress; it could be made plain without bein' so old fashioned as to attract attention. I got some black silk to make a sack, so by Sunday Miss Spencer said, jokingly, that I looked quite nice, and she'd let me go to church with her.

How glad I was to go, nobody can tell unless they've been kept from it as long as I had been. I found afterwards, as we went on our journey, that many families live as far from church as we did; and some women were heartsick to go, and some cared nothin' about it.

I had a real good time at the fair, too. I saw all my coppers sold for "four bits" apiece. Miss Spencer larft when she had to tell me what four bits meant. There was lots of curious things there; pincushions made of big tree bark sold for a dollar apiece. Miss Skinner told me I could get bigger ones when I went to the Big Trees.

We visited the Lunytic Asylum, which looks real pretty on the outside; plenty of shade trees and flowers, but it makes a body's heart ache to see the poor creeters that have to be kept there.

The court-house is a nice brick buildin', with grounds laid out around it, though the trees ain't very large yet. It seemed as though Stockton had too much sluggish water, with lots of footbridges built over it. But the city will always look lively with its windmills, any way.

SADNESS.

Is there a sun? Where, then, is hid his shining?
The evening growth chill, and dark, and gray;
And wintry nimbus clouds, with jagged edges,
Frown fiercely on the slowly dying day.

Is there a sun? Where, then, his warm caressing?
The Borean wind is sweeping 'cross the moor:
The angry sea makes wild and strange commotion,
And darkling billows break upon the shore.

I'm sitting with my shawl wrapped close around me
(Yet shivering still, in this cold winter time),
Near by a palm-tree that, in days departed,
Came floating here from some far distant clime.

'Tis out of place, this child of tropic regions,
Here where grim rocks rise darkly from the foam;
And out of place, one warm and tender-hearted,
Among the cold and stern ones of my home.

'Tis thus I come to wander on the sea-shore,
Though darkly threateneth the dull gray sky;
With naught to cheer in all I see around me,
Save some white sail that passeth slowly by.

I love them better than my home's sharp accents,
The bleak winds' wailing and the billows' roar:
I love them better than its look of coldness,
The black rocks scattered all along the shore.

Is there a sun? Has God no smile of mercy
To comfort His sad children upon earth,
Whose pathway is ungladdened by affection,
By whom forgotten is their childhood's mirth?

Be quiet, thou sad heart; let this reflection
Still bear thee up along thy tollsome way,
That here below there may be clouds and darkness,
But there, up there, is always perfect day.

WORK is of a religious nature—work is of a brave nature, which it is the aim of all religion to be. "All work of man is as the swimmer's." A waste ocean threatens to devour him; if he front it not bravely, it will keep its word. By incessant wise defiance of it, lusty rebuke and buffet of it, behold how it loyally supports him—bears him as its conqueror along! MY COUNTRY CLOWN.

BY L. S. CRANDELL.

DEAR LITTLE ELSIE: We long to see thy cheery face in our quiet circle, and now that summer is come, we send thee our most urgent pleadings to redeem that oft repeated promise to visit us. Thy uncle bids me say, our nephew, Herbert Grave, will be here also to assist in rendering thee contented. Give our love to thy parents, and do not refuse to accept our invitation. Very lovingly, thy aunt,
 MARTHA HAYES.

This is the note that was handed me as I returned from a drive with the elegant and accomplished Conrad McLean.

"How provoking! I will not go one step!" I cried, throwing the note from me in vexation.

My mother picked it up, and, after perusing the contents, remarked, calmly:—

"Of course you will go, my daughter?"

"Of course I will not. Mr. McLean just told me he should spend the season at the White Mountains, and you know very well I could not exist without—without lively company."

"But, no doubt, Elsie, you will find Mr. Grave to be very pleasant."

"Pleasant, indeed! A great, awkward, country clown!"

I fairly shed tears at the prospect of being obliged to spend the summer in such company. But when father united his argument against me, I was obliged to yield a reluctant consent. Accordingly, one bright morning, I found myself on the platform of L— station, with only my great Saratoga and little satchel for company. I looked about for some one to claim me, expecting to behold an overgrown youth, still wearing the clothes of his boyhood, with a broad brimmed Quaker hat, and aspiring red side whiskers, who

"Trudged along, unknowing what he sought;

And whistled as he went, for want of thought."

I had not long to wait. Down the road came uncle's span, driven by a masculine representative, who must, of course, be Mr. Grave. And there, indeed, were the veritable side whiskers, under a broad brim, modified, however, in color, being black.

"This is Miss Hayes, I presume?" The bow which accompanied these words, though evincing embarrassment, was not ungraceful.

"It is," I replied, "and this is my trunk. I suppose you are Mr. Grave?"

He assented. In a few moments we were off toward "Fern Dell." I leaned back to contemplate my escort, by no means satisfied to be deprived of Conrad's refined society, and obliged to endure his.

True, Herbert Grave's manly face, in its frame of black curls, did not lack symmetry, and I could imagine, with those curious, ill-fitting clothes, exchanged for a more fashionable attire, he would be comely. Yet his whole person bespoke the country-bred man, and to me nothing could be more distasteful.

"I'll flirt with the clown, if it's possible," was my mental ejaculation.

We had preserved a solemn silence since we left the depot, and I began to think the man as grave by nature as by name, when he turned his black eyes on me and asked:—

"Have you visited this section before?"

I saw by the half hidden merriment that lurked in those jetty depths, he did possess flirtable qualities. This gave piquance to my efforts to please. We chatted coisely as we rode along, until his excellent language and innate refinement showed me I had misjudged him.

At Fern Dell I was received with open arms, deluged with kisses, and soon made at home. For a few days I missed Conrad and contemptuously avoided Mr. Grave; but, finding this would never do, I roused myself by Sunday, resolved to make a stir. My uncle's family were good "Hicksite" friends, and started early to meeting. After they had called me several times, I appeared upon the portico, robed in a dashy suit of blue satin, with other things to accord, while outside my glove flashed the diamond cluster, which sealed my engagement with Mr. McLean. No wonder my aunt and uncle opened their eyes. I saw disapprobation in their faces before aunt said, "My dear child, thee would have been more appropriately dressed in thy travelling suit."

"Oh, no, indeed! I could not think of wearing that to church," I replied, quickly.

"Our meetings, Elsie, are for the worship of the Almighty, and not for show."

I felt the rebuke, and answered, impatiently:—

"Then I will not go at all! If my wardrobe is not suitable for this place, I had better go home."

"Get into the carriage, child; I am sorry I wounded thee."

Aunt Martha's tones showed how pained and surprised she was. Glancing at Mr. Grave, I read in his eyes a stern reproof, and was heartily ashamed.

"O aunt!" I cried, blushing, "please forgive that unladylike speech. I will change my dress this minute."

"No, dear," interrupted uncle; "it is late, and, after all, if the heart is right, it does not matter so much about the dress. Only, Elsie, though thee may be able to worship 'in spirit and in truth' when thus arrayed, remember thee is apt to divert the minds of those who are not accustomed to such things, from better and purer meditations. But, come, we must be off."

Never had my conscience troubled me as it did that day. I created a stir, as I had desired, but felt that in so doing I made myself responsible for all the good seed that might be lost that day. I never saw any harm in persons dressing as they chose, but before I quitted that little brown meeting house, I ac-knowledgeed that when "one was in Rome, it was best to do as the Romans did."

Upon my uncle's farm stood an old moss-covered mill, that had not been used for many years. Strolling that way one morning, I entered, and perceiving it unoccupied, threw down my hat, tucked up my dress, and began dancing. The favorites of the ball-room followed each other in quick succession, and these being exhausted, I resorted to the fancy role. The scene must have been rather picturesque; my light curls falling to the waist, clothes tucked up to my boot-tops, and for a frame-work, the old ruined mill. As I knelt in one figure, assuming a listening attitude, I glanced upward and beheld Mr. Grave, reclining on a rafter overhead. In confusion, I caught up my hat to beat a hasty retreat, when the object of my discomfiture swung himself down in front of me.

"I am sorry to have disturbed you, Miss Elsie. Do not be displeased, for I assure you I shall never forget the pleasure you unconsciously afforded me."

Thus reassured, I could not forbear laughing.

"You must have thought me demented to rush in here, throw down my hat, and set to dancing as if for a wager."

"My admiration conquered every other emotion," was his gallant rejoinder.

"Well, the truth is, the spell was on me, and I embraced the first opportunity for its indulgence."

"I thank the fates for allowing me to be present."

"What were you doing here? I thought the old mill deserted."

"So it is by others. I came here to read."

"I regret that I disturbed you."

"I am glad. The treat was all the more acceptable for being unexpected."

"Don't you dance, Mr. Grave?"

"Not at all."

"Then you must let me teach you, and we'll begin now."

He blushed to the roots of his hair, exclaiming:—

"Oh, no, Miss Elsie! I—I—indeed you must excuse me. It is impossible."

"Nonsense! You are not conscientiously opposed to it, are you?"

"Yes; our sect prohibits it."

I saw this was but a subterfuge, and resolved to carry my point.

"Well, if that's so, just sit down here, and I'll relieve you of all religious scruples."

Enconced upon the sill of a window overlooking the dam and watercourse, I began my proselyting.

"The prejudices religious people have against dancing are separately and collectively based upon the idea of excess. I maintain that those who have good common sense are the best regulators of their own conduct, and those who have not, will never be benefited by all the rules in Christendom, sacred or secular. No one can teach an extremist moderation.

If he does not dance, he will show his propensities in other things, even more pernicious."

"You are evidently versed in argumentative logic," laughed Mr. Grave.

"Let those laugh who win," I retorted;
"but to proceed: Dancing seems to be as old as the world. All history speaks of it, and I think it very likely, when the 'morning stars sang together at creation's birth,' they danced also."

"But, Miss Elsie, you do not seem to be getting to the point. Does not this amusement, which you are endeavoring to uphold, feed vanity? expose ladies to ill-assorted company?
cultivate the taste for dress? for excitement?
and, worse than all, do not the exposure and weariness following a night of revelry unfit its devotees for the life before them during many subsequent days, and, in some cases, lead to premature death?"

"Your questions shall be answered to the best of my ability. So far as vanity is concerned, we all have a greater or less share.
Since I was four years old, I have been a dancer, and the pet of our gay circle, yet I am confident, in your Quaker community, cannot be found a young lady near my own age as impervious to flattery as myself, simply because 'familiarity breeds contempt,' and I will ask you candidly, if, with your knowledge of me, you can say I display more vanity than the girls with whom you have been bred, although they do not dance?"

"I cannot say that you do, or, in fact, so much."

"Then, for the company. No lady should attend a social gathering without being well informed as to those she is likely to meet, and any woman who has not character enough to select appropriate partners for the dance, cannot safely be trusted at a church festival, picnic, or public promenade. Any woman can draw around her such companions as she may please, and if her inclination is for the fop, it is by no means necessary she should be versed in dancing to gratify that taste. Dress and excitement are among the necessaries of life.
Women who have only home matters to occupy their attention are apt to become fault-finders."

"But, surely, you do not believe in this extravagant display so common among the fair sex?"

"No, and yes. I believe we would be better without it, but when one's social standing and influence depend as much upon dress as they now do, I think it should receive due attention. You know the 'habit does not make the priest,' whether costly or not. So far as dress is connected with dancing, let me tell you that part of my wardrobe intended for church is far more extravagant than all my ball-room attires. Lastly, the fatigue and exposure to which you refer is not half so deleterious among the wealthy as lack of exercise and proper excitement is among the poor and mediocrity."

"Then, you approve of this aimless life, with its selfish ends; this whirlpool, which engulfs so many who have not the common sense of which you speak?"

"No, I cannot say that I do. But you are taking too wide a sweep, and, as usual, embrace the excess. Still, I do approve of dancing, both as an exercise and social amusement. To me it is exceedingly invigorating. I often thank the Lord that I can dance. It is frequently more expressive than language."

"You are an odd little creature."

"Perhaps I am; but my field of observation has been large, and it does not appear right to me that, because some people carry a thing to excess, it should be cried down by professors of religion. No more than that we should cease to eat, because the medical statistics show that many persons have died from partaking injudiciously of food."

"Well, perhaps we are too strict. I confess I should very much like to have you dance for me again, although I must decline instructions in the art."

"What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander." If I can dance in moderation with impunity, so can you."

At length I conquered, and we took our places. A merry time we had. He was evidently unaccustomed to "trip the light fantastic toe." Round and round the mill I went, while he came hopping and stamping after me in such a ludicrous manner. I stopped and gave full vent to my mirth. Herbert laughed also, declaring he felt like a Shanghai looking for a rose-bug.

Every day we repaired to the mill for an hour or so of merrymaking. At length, I began to teach him the "galop." He found it more difficult than any of the others; and, after many ineffectual attempts at the round step, he wound up by stepping on his own toes, tripping himself up, and cutting a spread eagle.

I was convulsed with laughter, being just able to gasp out: "Lo! a grace subject is upon the floor."

He sprang to his feet, and with a bound was at my side. His face showed neither anger, chagrin, nor mirth, but an indefinable, powerful something that sobered me instantly. Catching me in his arms, he gazed a second into my eyes, covered my face with kisses, and left the mill.

I stood where he placed me like one in a dream. The first thing I heard was a little scream, which seemed to have been waiting for an opportunity to escape. This set me laughing, though my tears flowed copiously, and I was in no enviable state when I reached my room. There could be but one interpretation of Mr. Grave's conduct. He loved me, and I? — "I am the promised bride of Conrad McLean. There is no room in my heart but for him," I said, resolutely, answering my mental query aloud.

Uncle came to tea alone.

"Where is Herbert?" asked Aunt Martha.

"He was obliged to leave hurriedly on business, and wished me to say to Elsie here he hoped she would pardon his rudeness. I told him she wouldn't think ill of him for leaving without adieu when business demanded. That was right, eh?"

"Perfectly right, uncle," I answered, but saw much more in Herbert Grave's message than did they.

Several days elapsed, and Herbert did not return. I had avoided the mill since he left, but could no longer resist the desire to go thither. Pushing open the door, I walked in. The silence thrilled me; and, seated in the window overlooking the brook, I leaned my head against the old, worn frame, and knowing I was far out of hearing,

"I shut up the door and my ears,
And opened my heart and my tears."

"What is the matter, Elsie!" Starting, I looked up to see Mr. Grave beside me. Without waiting for my reply, he continued: "I have something to say to you."

There was none of the old bashfulness left as, seating himself beside me, he took my hand, and, touching the diamond cluster, asked:—

"Has that ring any significance, Elsie?"

If ever I was tempted to falsify, it was then; but the stern honor looking at me through Herbert's black eyes forced the answer; "Yes."

"Will you tell me what it signifies?"

Richard was himself again, and I replied, carelessly: "It shows I am engaged to marry Mr. McLean. Would you like to see his picture?"

"I would."

Drawing a "photo" from my pocket diary, I gave it to him. After a few moments' contemplation, he said:—

"Do you love this man?"

"Of course."

He gave me a searching look. "Elsie, could you love me?"

I felt the blood mount to my cheeks, as my eyes fell before his.

"You forget I am engaged."

"If you were not engaged, Elsie? Tell me how it would be if you were not engaged?"

He bent toward me eagerly, and placed his arm around my waist. The sense of probity my mother had inculcated was touched, and I left my seat.

"But, Mr. Grave, I am engaged."

He turned away. There was a moment's silence. Presently he said, advancing:—

"Forgive me, Miss Hayes. I have insulted your constancy, but you know the motive that prompted. Shall I see you to the house?"

That evening Herbert bade me good-by, saying he should not return. I grew restless after his departure, and left for New York.

A few weeks served to show me how materially my tastes had altered during the summer months. Mr. McLean did not satisfy me. The engagement was broken off, and in a short time I was forgotten for another. The winter dragged. At the first breath of June I started for Maryland. At Fern Dell I was made heartily welcome, and very thankfully I received its hospitalities.

After the first words of greeting, sunt remarked: "I am very sorry Herbert cannot be here to keep thee company, but his business in Boston will not permit him to leave." Did I care?

Early the next morning I hastened to the old mill, peered into every nook and corner, till I at length espied a ladder, before unknown. Ascending it, I found myself near the rafter from which Herbert had watched my dancing, while close under the eaves lay a book, warped and mouldy. Securing the prize, I descended to the window. It proved to be a book of poems. Upon the fly leaf was written the name of Herbert Grave, and beneath, "O Elsie! 'dislike me not for my complexion, the shadow'd liv'ry of the burnish'd sun.' The heart of the gnarled oak is sound, and yours," dated the year before.

"Dear Herbert! Noble Herbert!" I cried, kissing the faded characters, then started lest I had been overheard. But, no, I was monarch of all I surveyed, and silence my prime minister. After that the old mill became my Mecca, where I wrote, read, or sewed, as inclination prompted.

Thus a month passed. One beautiful morning, sketch-book in hand, I ensconced myself in the old window, but soon my thoughts and eyes wandered far away. A leaf came floating down the stream, and, thinking aloud, I said, dreamily: "Herbert used to call such leaves old prejudices, that were cast off, and went floating away on the stream of reason. Thus my one great prejudice against countrymen and their appearance has floated off with the current of Herbert Grave's true worth, and passed into oblivion."

Some one opened the door, and stepped within my sanctum. It was Herbert. Our eyes met. He came quickly to my side.

"Elsie, I heard what you said as I passed near the window. Is it true?"

"It is true, Herbert."

"And the ring?"

I held up my hand.

"Thank Heaven!"

The side whiskers are gone, and I have no longer cause to complain of his ill-cut clothes, now that I am the darling of the country clown.

LOVE'S TRUTH.

BY AURORA S. NOX.

My weary heart was full of woe,

My eyes with bitter weeping,

As I wandered to and fro

While all the world was sleeping;

And in my anguish loud I cried—

"All, all is false to me,

The fairest lips have sometimes lied,

And sweetest eyes smiled cruelly!"

But the sea rolled up with a long, low swell,

And clearly I heard, like a silver bell—

"Love, love is true!"

But my mournful heart no comfort found,

For my soul was full of grief,

Not even that softly ringing sound

To my spirit brought relief.

For what do they know of love,

The senseless waviest thought I;

No! God is true in heaven above,

But naught beneath the sky.

But a beautiful zephyr breathed in my ear,

With music so gentle my heart could hear

"Love, love is true!"

Next morning I still was weary and sad,

And walked abroad once more;

In vain all nature was joyfully glad,

For my heart was troubled and sore.

But a sweet, pale violet lifted its head

And looked at me with its eye of blue,

And a jilly smiled in its leafy bed,

"Fresh-washed in coolest dew."

And the loveliest echo came unto me,

A soul-entrancing melody—

"Love, love is true!"

"Oh!" cried I, then, in my misery,

"If love be true, should I not know?"

But a tender comfort fell upon me

As softly as flakes of snow.

And I threw myself on a mossy bank,

And stayed in that lovely scene,

My heart no longer in trouble sank,

And my soul became serene.

And ever I heard the happiest birds

Sing sweetly a lovely "song without words"—

"Love, love is true!"

Time passes on, and again I stand

Beside the heaving sea;

But I clasp in mine another's hand,

Whose dear eyes beam on me.

And now I know what the wavelets told,

And what the zephyr spoke,

What the lily and violet meant to unfold,

What the birds' sweet song awoke.

For my spirit joins that lovely refrain,

Eternally sung in joy and in pain,

"Love, love is true!"

CHILDHOOD does sometimes pay a second visit to man—youth never. How responsible are we for the use of a period so precious in itself, which will soon pass away, and never return!

MY FIRST CRUISE IN SOCIETY, AND ITS CONSEQUENCES, IMMEDIATE AND REMOTE.

BY NO' STARR.

THERE'S, at least, no vanity in the revelation at the top of my page; but my name was Nora, and my friends and others abbreviated it as set forth. My "introduction" is completed.

It was upon a delightful morning in early spring that Lucy Emmons, my quondam school chum, and myself were travelling the streets of one of our large cities. We had taken out a roving commission for the morning, resolving that the whole of it should be devoted to that most delightful of feminine recreations—a shopping expedition. On we went, braced by the exhilarating atmosphere, chatting gayly of the en dits of the day—of brilliant belles and agreeable beaux, of hearts lost and won, of conquests completed or pending, of the last ball, the next soirée, of what we would buy, and how it should be made, and when it should be worn, of—"Trifling!" you say. Well, what else should two girls of seventeen have been talking about? Even so, prudish lady, just such follies. We did talk about beaux—that is, of Lucy's. She was wealthy and beautiful; I was poor and plain, and didn't have any.

"Do tell me, Lucy," came up, after a brief silence and some right rapid thought, "why Charles Bland" (he was one of her most constant devotees) "has so absented himself of late?"

"I've been thinking to ask whether you observed it, and what you made of it," said spoilt, pretty Lucy. "He is to me one of the most inexplicable of mortals. The last evening he was with us I wasn't in the humor to have him harangue me from the ottoman at my feet upon moonlight, music, love, and flowers, for I preferred talking to Charlie Jones about the ride we were to take next afternoon, and so, I suppose, my young gentleman is on his dignity. Amen! This might all do very well for you, No', with your sentimentality; but the 'first winter out' never comes again, and I'm going to be epicurean enough to crowd all the enjoyment into it I can, from every source, and consider each man, woman, and child crossing my path as laid under tribute for my pleasure, in some sort."

"But Mr. Bland"—I was going to remonstrate.

"Don't tell me! I like better to hear music than to hear of it. Moonlight is better fresh from the skies than filtered through Mr. Bland's beautifying imagination and poetic phrases, and so for love and flowers in their respective places."

"Yet some most beautiful things are beautified, their exquisite points being elaborated by the really appreciative."

"Nevertheless, I tell you, this engagement—if engagement it be—is growing very irksome to one party concerned. Indeed, I must think of no gentleman—save the delectable Mr. Charles Bland, artist, poet, what not, No. — Arch Street, very agreeable, very anything, so it seems—lest I excite the jealousy of my sovereign lord and master, that is to be."

"But, Lucy, I would be one thing or the other," I urged, in my unsophisticated, provincial simplicity. "I'd be in love with him, or I wouldn't be; I'd like him, or I wouldn't like him, just as I thought he deserved, and I wouldn't be tyrannized over by make-believes. You used to be such dear friends, and, now, you somehow seem to be sacrificing all friendliness, and I don't think this pays for it."

"Well, little grandmother," said my playful pet, "I'll acknowledge to you, since you take so sober a view of things, that sometimes thoughts of the days past do rise up in judgment against me. I think, now and then, when I've nothing better to do, of the times when Charlie was much more necessary to me than he is now (he used to be so kind!), and conscience doesn't altogether sit lightly with me. I ought to be more candid, may be—but, pshaw! All women play off these tricks, and all men get over their trials thus inflicted, and, so, why shouldn't I have my fun? But, now, don't look so dignified. I reckon I'll have to take your advice at last."

"Don't say at last, Lucy; say at once. Be true."

"Oh, dear!" said Lucy, laughing one of her liquid, little, bird-like laughs. "Indeed, I thought to have left this style of thing in the school-room, and here our talk reminds me of the reign of 'Carolins and Mrs. B.,' and the old chemistry and philosophy classes. But what makes you so zealous a pleader of Mr. Bland's cause? Are you sworn friends, and has he solicited your acknowledged influence in his behalf? You'd better take him yourself."

"I don't imagine he's the sort of article to be transferred at another's bidding," I replied; "and for our being sworn friends, I believe the dozen words you heard pass between us that night on the opera of the previous evening were the most we ever exchanged. He appears to prefer gentlemen's society when not talking to you, though his manner to ladies is always deferential, I observe."

"Well, what must I do to redeem myself?" inquired this perverse little bit of fascination, looking into my face with a gaze wherein was contracted the gentle innocence of sundry pairs of turtle-doves.

"Only be true is my advice. True to yourself, to him, who was once your friend; who may yet be this, perhaps, if nothing more. Be yourself. You have told me how very sensitive he is, especially in what concerns you. He is barely aware of my existence, and yet I am sorry for him, but I am more so for you. Now, how do you like me in my new character of mentor to the 'belle of the Quaker City?'"

"Oh, well, you know I've long been used to that turn of yours at Madame Lablache's; though I, too, played the rolé of little country girl, then, in another way from you. But, since you look so solemn on the occasion, I'll make an opportunity this evening to adjust matters more to your approval, and the little artist shall be candidly informed it were best not to defer his pleasure in the classic scenes and fair skies of sunbright Italy, awaiting my motion."

Here we were at the corner of — Street, a thickly-settled colony of attorneys. Our course lay thither, and Lucy, raising her soft brown eyes, audibly read: "St. George Grey, Counsellor at Law, etc. etc." A spontaneous laugh, merry as a child's, and, then, "A most adorable saint, no doubt, a lawyer makes. I'd like to be favored with a sight of that phenomenon."

But soon we were at the emporium, and discussing gloves, flowers, ribbons, and illusion in reference to the coming evening. The Lenten times were close at hand, and Mrs. Howard's entertainment, thus late postponed, would be the ball of the season.

It was about nine o'clock on the evening of Mrs. Howard's ball that there was sitting in a handsomely-furnished apartment of one of the most fashionable hotels in the city a young man of wealth and family, holding solitary revel with the afternoon paper. The fragrant fumes of his La Norma were wreathing themselves in fantastic forms about his head, and making a gauzy drapery to the delightful dishabille he wore—a luxuriously-wadded, heavily-embroidered dressing-gown, set off by soft, gayly-blazoned slippers to match. The newspaper had fallen to the floor, and the sometime dallier therewith remained with arms folded upon his breast, and eyes listlessly following the course of those fairy, aromatic clouds curling ceilingward above him. As to whether his thoughts were en suite, we cannot determine without a key, which we shall have presently.

A gentleman in complete evening costume enters without rapping, and we hear, "Hallo, Grey! What in the world! Aren't you ready? Ain't you going? Or are you sustaining a fit of the blue devils that you sit moping here, while all the wit, wealth, beauty, and fashion of the city is congregated at Howard Park? Hurry, man! What have you been about all the evening?"

"Studying a case," replied the other, smiling, and with mock effort unfolding his arms, giving the idea of being too inert even to rouse himself to that slight task.

"Studying a case, indeed! What sort of a case is it that requires a man to form an angle of forty-five degrees with his corporeal proportions, and read his advices in a whitewashed ceiling?"

"It's the case of St. George Grey, attorney at law, etc. etc., versus a certain anonymous fair one, or rather the anonymous fair one versus St. George Grey. If you'll only sit down and be quiet, I'll tell you all about it. There! that's a good, sensible fellow. I saw them this morning—two of them—they passed my office together, and both were young, and one was beautiful," and he proceeded to tell him of their remarks. "But, Hal, old fellow, that silver-sounding voice which read my name on the shingle, and wondered 'what sort of a saint a lawyer would make!' 'Twas entrancing!"

"Ha! ha!" laughed Hal Sullivan, "another of your eccentricities, I suppose; and is this all?"

"No, no; not half. I took up my hat instantaneously, resolved, for the fun of the thing, to follow a little way, and, more than this, curious to ascertain whether any human face could correspond in beauty to that voice. 'Twasn't far, for the proprietor thereof entered Levy's—so did I. A little delay, a little anxious waiting, upon my part. Confound it! why hadn't I come to Philadelphia to try my fortunes before? but, lo! I am at peace with myself and the rest of mankind. In that crowd of femininities I descry the identical pair, and now turns full on me a face. Oh! it's like one we have all dreamed of at some time in our lives, looking at us over a pair of shining wings!"

"Well, I'll swear!" is Doctor Sullivan's (as we all know, very improper) rejoinder. "To see a man who has been as much in society as you have, so transported 'on this short notice!'"

"Ah! but not in Philadelphia society," says Grey, with tragi-comic air, adding—

"Such lustre gleams through her long silken lashes, You'd swear a soul flashed through each witching eye,
While the low tone that from her small mouth gushes, Thrills like her glance whene'er I pass near her."

"I wish I could know somebody who knew somebody who knew some one else who knew when you were in deep, sober earnest," said Harry Sullivan, in the least bit perplexed tone; not much so, for life ran very smoothly with Harry. "But is it really," he continued, "one of your humors to stay away from the ball to-night?"

"It is—one of my humors, and a cowardly humor, too; I'll acknowledge thus much to you."

"A fig for your affectation! Come on, you haven't made your début here yet, and, by the way, you may meet your beautiful inamorata, who knows?"

"Precisely. I told you cowardice kept me away; I'm afraid to meet her!"

"Oh, a lovely ogress, is she?"

"Well, just this, then: I want to enjoy my dream yet awhile; I'll soon be over it; but to meet her to-night, as I might, and, from the luminous halo of those golden curls, or, to be more to the point, from the rose and ivory of that beautiful mouth were I to hear some expression akin to the 'bad egg,' with which a New York belle once shocked my unsophisticated ear—WELL! An important conclusion, isn't it?"

"One worthy of yourself, and very well adapted to your reason for declining civilities, you Bedlamite! 'A gentle voice is a most excellent thing in a woman,' yet I'd like to hear the tones which would set me running all over the city for a half-second's glance at the lips from which they proceeded. But I must go, if you will not." And the merry young doctor and complacent philosopher went, promising a call early on the morrow.

There was, indeed, a brilliant assembly at Howard Park that night. The long suite of apartments thrown open for the reception of guests blazed with richly gilded and brilliantly lighted chandeliers, rivalled at last by flashing eyes, and the mirror-lined walls seemed presenting to view a sort of wizard world, whose inhabitants, emulous of the beauty spread out before them, caught and appropriated by some potent spell-word, the grace, the wreathed smiles which gleamed there, and to hold even song and laughter crystallized in the weird depths.

A richly filled conservatory stretched in gorgeous floral perspective beyond the spacious drawing-rooms, and fragrance like that from Oriental gardens mingled with sounds of mirth and music in the air. Instead of gas, a soft radiance from astral lamps fell upon the flowers. This was Mrs. Howard's taste, and it is believed the subdued light was in better accordance with, though scarce in anticipation of, the especial little drama being now enacted there.

A few brief notes, reader of mine, will give you a clue to what was transpiring. Enconced in one of the deep recesses, and near a bow-window, I was indulging in a sort of reverie, so Lucy said, flashing by me from her last waltz. I had declined waltzing altogether, and so must needs be something of a wall-flower, even if I had other pretensions at other times. She turned as she spoke, caressingly arranged something about my hair, and lingered. What purpose in her wandering for this brief second from the crowd of which she was the life and light? I had it! Not aware previously of Charles Bland's proximity to us, I heard in the gentlest of tones (she had really an exquisite voice), "Good evening, Charles!"

and Lucy's little hand was cordially extended. I suppose he took it by some instinct. I avoided looking toward them, for I knew that, at least, with one of the parties, this night was to be a crisis. Neither did I by eaves-dropping become possessed of the brief report which I shall proceed to give you.

"I have something to say to you, Charles," followed the greeting.

"I am at your service, Miss Lucy," rather loftily, it was fancied, and he never called her Miss Lucy when they were alone.

"It is very warm dancing," said she. "I see an open window in the conservatory; it is better sitting there than in these heated rooms; we will go," and she led the way, thus answering Charles' inquiry, "Are you not very imprudent? The night air is quite chill?"

Lucy grieved, so she told him, among other things, when she began to talk, that she had not made explanation before; that she had permitted herself to deceive him; had, in fact, deceived herself; but when she had discovered this (so she acknowledged), it was due any one, under like circumstances, more especially due him, to say so. And while recalling all she had permitted him to hope for, Lucy proffered him the affection of a devoted friend and sister. That was about the amount of it.

I knew a gentleman similarly solicited in such a case, who replied that Providence had chosen his sisters for him, and that he preferred selecting his friends himself. He sought her, the lady in question, for his wife, but if she declined the relation, there was no other vacancy.

Charles Bland said nothing of the sort, but he did say, with his fatalistic notion of love, that her word, potent as it was to him, could not unweave destiny; that it was his fate to love her, and that it was profanation of both sentiments to barter man's deep and true affection for sober, cool friendship, or some such thing, and so he declined it, forbearing, in his dignified sense of wrong, to recount the little wiles which had, one by one, beguiled him to his hopeless sorrow. He felt, then, that Lucy had wronged him (I am not going to accuse her any further than to tell, by her permission, the facts I know); and he told her that she had done wisely; that he had no connections, wealth, or influence in the world, so that even his friendship would be no gain to her; and he protested again that there was danger for her in the keen night air, offering to conduct her to the party who were enacting chaperons to us. Lucy's dreamy eyes, I think, were looking toward where the village-boy once gathered wild-flowers with her beside the wood skirting his grand mother's cottage.

"Mr. Bland," interrupted a sprightly voice from the door not far off, "have you and Miss Emmons withdrawn yourselves to moralize, contrasting the serenity of night without with the enjoyments of flirting, waltzing, and the other et ceteras of night within? Or, perhaps, you are reading her destiny in the stars?"

Such bungling work as we do, sometimes, in our attempts to be pleasant! But, fortunately, Mrs. Howard paused for no answers to her suggestions, and proceeded:—

"You see, it's my duty to veto all monopolies this evening. Besides, I've a partial promise from Lucy, and a positive promise from you, sir, of assistance in my tableaux, and as this portion of the entertainment is to be a surprise to most of the company, I will admit no substitutes. Come, they are waiting, I judge, from Mr. Howard's dumb signs."

There was no time for remonstrance. They all three entered the little boudoir at the farther end of the hall; then there was a slight confusion of tongues and of costumes; then Charlie was despatched to the gentlemen's dressing-room down the hall. I saw there was something the matter with Lucy, and I saw, moreover, that two people had never more resolutely determined to act the indifferent than were she and Charles.

"You must be in my opening scene, Lucy Emmons," urged Mrs. Howard; but Lucy persisted she must have more time for the "getting up," and so passed two tableaux. I was in one, and had no leisure to talk with her; then, as that was my only appearance, I set busily to donning my original dress to run down the hall and see the next one—Lucy's.

The crimson curtains parted—the fairy cloud of illusion was in place, and "The Guardian Angel" was announced. The girl was a perfect dream of beauty, as she stood there in the snowy, mist-like robe; her loosened tresses forming a golden halo around her, the white gossamer wings sparkling with a silvery sheen, and the gaze of tender, deep, anxious thought earnestly, almost painfully, bent upon Charles Bland. It gave her face a new loveliness I had never seen it express. He threw into his countenance that which only the artist could have conceived, of perfect abandon to the dazzling bait held forth of his "adversary, the Devil," which latter character was impersonated by a Creole visitor from the Crescent City, upon whose visage thirty-five Southern summer suns had left their impress.

"Miraculously beautiful!" passed through the crowd in almost reverential whispers, as though the scene were the creation of a spell, and a rude breath or sound might dissolve it.

A flutter of the white drapery—a tableau vivant, indeed. The bell rings, the curtain falls hastily—we hasten around. Lucy has swooned—a bona fide faint, spelt with an a. All the evening's excitement together has proved too much for her nervous system. There was no sofa convenient for fainting damsels, readers of "Children of the Abbey" and contemporary romances; so Charles Bland, as any gentleman would any lady under similar circumstances, bore her to the cloak-room, as we requested. There was a softly-cushioned divan, and there restoratives were applied, and from thence we soon set out for home. Doctor Sullivan politely proffered attendance thither, though assuring us that there was no danger; and the patient, albeit a little languid, soon commenced laughing at herself for failure in her new character.

Were I a romance writer, which I am not, I should all in proper place and time, in scientific detail, give premises, argument, conclusion, etc., of this narrative; but, being only a transcriber from a species of log-book in my possession, the reader, perhaps, will be kind enough to take my jottings down as the disorderly pages of the original edition come up to hand.

All the moralizing and philosophizing, if these chronicles be suggestive of anything so deep, must come from the reader also. It is always a thankless office to point out morals for other people. If they require them, they will derive them from data given, and it is my present business to state facts as I found them, courteously, leaving inferences to the perusers thereof. It makes no difference either whether I think Lucy was a heartless coquette or not. I loved, and love her very dearly, and I am not undertaking to prove anything. I think that an ardent desire to please, beyond what was wise, perhaps, actuated her sometimes temporarily to acquiesce in the proposed plans of others, when returning judgment uttered the negative at last; and I think that, at this time in her career, she was a sincere convert to the theory of "pleasant illusions," and the admissibility of procuring them for one's friends, even at the expense of an unpleasant awakening subsequently.

Now a little of her earlier history. The same instant of time endowed her with the earthly and her lovely mother with the heavenly inheritance, her sole guardianship devolving upon the hired nurse and an idolizing father—the latter of whom, as his only child grew older, made his pleasure to consist in the gratification of her every caprice, affection seeming blind to the ultimate result of such indulgence. At the age when other girls are in school trammels, Lucy followed uncurbed the bent of her own inclination in the disposition of herself and her time—now running wild over the whole extent of the broad lands surrounding her father's spacious and elegant country residence; now his companion, sitting before him on his horse, in long rides around the farm; now silently stringing red beans for hours together in his study, when told that she must keep quiet, or counting again and again the brass nails which decorated the old-fashioned, high-backed chair in which he always sat to write. Presently again Lucy would be gone. Where? Down in the neighboring village, making many a friend among the humble families resident there, and from these days dates her first acquaintance with Charles Bland.

Mr. Emmons looked approvingly upon the friendship forming between them. Charles was such a bright, promising boy, so he said, so obedient to his grandmother, and then he bore from the teacher the best name in the whole village school. "Come to Linwood on Saturdays," he would say to Charles, sometimes, "and see me and my little girl. We have books and pictures there, plenty; they say you are fond of such things." While Mr. Emmons' hospitality and kindness were of such incalculable benefit to the boy, eager to learn, and rise from his humble sphere in life, and with innate taste and talent for the refinements of a better life, it is impossible to say whether the simple-hearted old gentleman ever gave a thought to what might, in process of time, grow out of this association to involve the destinies of one or both of the young people. What need to think of such things? They were both such children! When, however, some years after, Charles Bland, the talented young artist, the fashion of that season (so things go in this world), did, in his own old-fashioned notion of things, solicit the old gentleman's permission to win his daughter, if he might, I am sure the privilege (even though the matter seemed to flash a new and almost blinding light into the father's eyes) would not have been more cordially accorded to any wooer descended from the best blood of Southern cavalier stock than it was to this whilome aspirant for the honors of the village school. So Edward Emmons, an old aristocrat of "the Maryland line," said: "I had almost—and very foolishly—hoped, Charles, that no one else would see, as I feared I did, my little child was growing into a woman. It must be so. I am an old man now. I was a man getting in years when I married her mother. I cannot be with her many years longer. She will love some one, will give herself to some one, and I know no man in whose charge I could more safely leave her than in yours."

But I digress. When Lucy was ten years old Mr. Emmons was summoned to England, where some moneyed interests were involved which would probably occupy a few years in the adjustment and disposal, and then came up the vexed question, which had often obtruded itself, and as often been temporized with, vaguely put off for some more welcome season, which never came, "What ought to be done about Lucy's education?" He was indulging her and himself at the expense of her manners and all womanly accomplishments, and the period of separation would be no less painful defer it to what time he might. His present foreign mission was an arduous one, and involved, probably, considerable removal from one place to another. The child could not accompany him. Arrangements were made for leaving "the Linwoods," as the village and surroundings were called, and he brought his little charge as far as Baltimore, himself en route to New York to take passage at an early day in one of the Liverpool steamers, not yet decided as to how she was to be disposed of. At Barnum's he met my parents. They were returning to Virginia, after having placed me for my third season at Madame Lablache's, near Philadelphia. Mr. Emmons and my father had been friends at college—old "William and Mary"—and had met from time to time since. My parents were directly interested in his little girl, and begged that she might be placed at school with me. So Lucy was brought to Madame Lablache's, and confided to her especial care, until her father's return, when it was supposed she would be sufficiently accomplished to take charge of a handsome city mansion, should such be her taste, or preside alternately in such a one and the old homestead at Linwood.

I remember very well the morning when another girl of my class and I were summoned into madame's reception-room to play entertainers to the young stranger; how her untrained hair looked in its wealth like "drifted sunshine," and her large eyes opened wider in undisguised astonishment at our—I must acknowledge not very well-bred—inquisitiveness as, to her advancement in "Noel et Chapsal," natural philosophy, botany, and general 'ologies and 'onomies. She finally silenced us on these points and mostly on others by averring, without disguise, that she neither knew nor cared for any "reading-book" but "Fairly Tales," and that, as long as her dear papa was gone, she didn't feel in the humor for talking. If she did not—this latter, I mean—it seems just to infer that it was the first time, as it was certainly the last after my acquaintance with her, the "humor" soon vanishing, and leaving her henceforth very sociable. Moreover, the girl not "read up" in French and "things" soon proved herself very quick at her tasks, putting us of superior training and wisdom quite out of our little self-conceit. Then she was so generous and noble. Lucy Emmons wouldn't do a mean action, and she would sooner suffer punishment herself than inform on another girl. Then for out-door sports—ball, marbles, climbing—well, as there is "a character" in every school, Lucy was the acknowledged as such in ours.

At the end of six years Mr. Emmons returned, taking the young lady, whose acquaintance has been elsewhere made, to a hotel in the city, there to sojourn and supervise with him the fitting up of the princely establishment which she had desired him to purchase. This for their winter residence; old Linwood, if they wished to be quiet a few weeks, in summer, said Lucy; so, then, of course, said her father.

We had been devoted friends, and it was a sad day to both when we parted. Lucy's "Good-by! but now don't disappoint me next winter," sounded more like a knell than the voice of hope. Handkerchiefs were waved—hers from her window in the hotel, mine from the carriage, for I was to travel farther—I turn a corner, and am well under way for my home in an eastern shore village.

"I have secured the good offices of a lady friend to chaperone our two little girls this winter, so you must bring or send yours on immediately," Mr. Emmons wrote my father. "Mine is very wilful, and will not be put off any longer, she bids me say."

However, owing to the fact of my having a promise of long standing to be bridesmaid at Belle Eyre's wedding—Belle was our near neighbor—and, as this country wedding, which brought, as we knew it would, a succession of parties and rural frolics of all kinds, did not come off until after Christmas, it was as late as the first of February that, on a snowy afternoon, I found myself at No. — Chestnut Street, the coachman ringing the bell, I retaining my seat, wrapped in furs and travelling-cloaks. I soon heard a voice not to be mistaken, though that light step bounding over the richly-carpeted stairway was not discernible.

"I knew it was No', and that she would come!" exclaimed the impulsive creature, rushing into my arms; for, instead of imperiling her slippered feet by contact with the snow, I had now darted up the steps and in at the hospitable, wide open door.

I escaped being eaten. Thin, and fragile of frame, perhaps I did not present the temptation of a very savory bonne bouche, and Lucy was not cannibalistic, though she almost bore me in her arms up to her room. Warm, luxurious, delightful, the whole in-door atmosphere. How charming she was! She had travelled in the interim between fitting up the new residence and the commencement of "the season" in the city, and there was more finish about her—shall I call it this? Something delightful, at any rate, as it seemed to me.

"Come, take off your things," she said, divesting me of them, and, "Ellen!" to her maid, "take Miss Starr's wrappings, and you may leave us; we have no need to dress for dinner. Father will not be in until late," she added, turning to me, "so we can luxuriate in carelessness and each other's society. O Nora," she broke forth—Lucy had an air about her which gave you the impression that she lived more in an hour than other people in a day or a month—"I've so much to tell you. My letters, you know, are just nothing; writing is too slow a business. But this Philadelphia is such a charming place, and I do so love the parties, and the operas, and the pretty things, and the charming people. Oh, it is enchanting! I shall go wild if you don't come and tame me with your grandmother notions. Some of madame's nicest girls are here this winter; and such agreeable beaux! The parlor is thronged every evening that I do not go out. Papa's friends, he says; but, indeed, a great part of the entertaining them devolves upon me, which is no task, to be sure, they being, for the most part, as chatty as I, which, I believe you will admit to be sufficient. And Charles Bland is here, Nora; has been living here, oh, before we came; the same Charles Bland of whom you have heard me speak as being an old friend and neighbor when we lived at the Linwoods."

I recollected very well how we used to tease her about him after she had told us of the intimacy and of himself in most admiring terms. Finally, I suppose we had new people and things to occupy us, and Charles Bland's name died out, from mention, at least. This at school, I mean. He was older; was more tenacious of impressions. Faith and Hope, in morbid excess, went to the making up of his composition, and no portion of his dreaming in regard to Lucy made itself suggestive that she might return from a six years' sojourn at boarding-school, other than the affectionate, confiding Lucy she was when they chased butterflies through the fields and green lanes around the Linwoods. I suppose that Charles Bland's awakening upon the morning of his first "call" on Lucy and her father, after many solicitations from the latter, was much like that of any other arousing from a dream, speak we either literally or figuratively, a shock more or less to the dreaming apparatus, whatever that is, and a sort of staggering attempt to bring all that has been, or we wished to be, in proper subjection to the inevitable is. Lucy had been kind to him that morning, very.

"What is Mr. Bland doing?" I asked; "practising a profession here?"

"Oh, you know I used to tell you of his aspirations to paint. He has had good masters, and with, as they say, fine genius therefore, bids fair to astonish the great art-world some of these days. And such portraits! But he is painting mine. He is a star of the first magnitude here just now, I can tell you, and papa considers him very talented. He comes to see us often, and no doubt you will like him."

All this from Lucy in her rapid narration, and I ask:—

"You do, do you?"

"Well, yes—oh, yes!" for reply. "You know I always liked him. But I tell you, it was right queer to meet him again, and think of the old Linwood days, and how I used to kiss him for lifting me across the branches when they were too deep for me to wade, and all those things. It was really desperate, as I think of it now, our attachment." And Lucy blushed. What could it mean, her blushing so.

Alas for those days of portrait painting and the idealisms of the artist! The wood pictures, the fairy scenes inwrought, the magic touches conjuring back the past, the unearthly tints of the iris-bowed future. But these are not for pen and ink to reproduce. Lucy accepted them all; she told me so presently, for she was never reserved with me.

"Well, Grey, what of the case this morning?" asked Doctor Sullivan, entering the office of his friend upon the day succeeding the entertainment elsewhere mentioned.

"Are you up for all day?" asked the other, in place of answer or conventional salutation. "I believe you said something about dropping in as soon as you breakfasted, and it's only one o'clock now. Excuse me, no clients in this morning, and it's dull. What are a man's friends for if he can't vent his spite on them upon such occasions?"

"Well," said Hal, smiling acquiescence, "now that I am here, how am I, beside in the way you signify, to make myself agreeable? by giving you the details of Mrs. Howard's 'ête'?"

"Mrs. Howard's fate, forsooth! that's all safe enough. Married, we suppose, to the man she loved, ten thousand a year, an establishment, a carriage, and an opera box; her earthly destiny is accomplished. The fate of St. George Grey, attorney-at-law, concerns me much more closely at present."

"By the way," says Doctor Sullivan, "how stupid I am not to tell you. Indeed, I saw an angel last night, and who knows but it may be the adorable object of your romantic seeking? Nothing less than such a creation as I have named could answer your requirements. How lull I was not to take your description of Lucy Emmons! I think you have seen our belle at last without knowing it. She wears golden curls, and is altogether a charming creature, is the whole world agrees. Still, I must go on and tell you. There is too much of the woman about her to admit of her standing her ground is an angel, so the events of the last evening proved;" and the young doctor narrated the case as it seemed to him.

"No apparent cause for it; dressed too lightly, in all probability. I wish our women could compare the noble outlines of the Venus de Medicis with the attenuated, waspish figures of some of the women of our day before they resolve upon a model of female beauty. My notion is, that dress was intended to embellish personal advantages, not to metamorphose what God has made."

"Sullivan on dress and female beauty!" says Mr. Grey. "Has she large, lustrous eyes—Miss Emmons, I mean, with now a don't care, now a sunny expression about them?"

"Did you see so much in an instant of time, in your ignis fatuus of a morning walk?" asks Hal, continuing. "One question at a time, if you please. You come down with such a volley of interrogatories that a man of not over-steady brain is quite overwhelmed. Had I not been the most amiably disposed of mortal men, I had left you long ago. Can't you see that I'm preoccupied? that I may have my own little private romance to ruminate upon? Ask your pardon. Eyes did you say? The idea of asking me the color of a girl's eyes! I don't even know the color of yours, or of mine. Sue White's, indeed, are blue,

'Darkly, deeply, beautifully blue'

That's the extent of my posting up in optic coloring."

"You seem possessed of a kittenish buoyancy of spirits this morning, Doctor Sullivan," said George Grey. "Now do tell me what's the matter?"

"Well, I'm on as good terms with the world as I might wish to be," replied Hal. "In the first place, speaking of Sue White, some days since there was an interview appointed for this very morning between pater familias and your humble servant, ten o'clock the hour. I thought to afflict you with my presence in the interim from breakfast until then, hence my promise to you last night; but—well, I breakfasted early, much earlier than usual, didn't sleep after my return from 'the Park.' After breakfast wandered about like the babes in the woods, or Japhet in search of a father, or some of those people, until I thought it was ten o'clock, or ought to be, and presented myself at Mr. White's door. The servant looked at me with a peculiar glance as he admitted me; but I couldn't exactly see how he should know anything, when the mystery was solved in a moment after he withdrew by the sound of Mr. White's voice pronouncing emphatically, 'Confound the boy! I've not dressed myself; I've this moment swallowed my breakfast.' I knew he always breakfasted early and in bed. 'I'm here now, and I'll wait; nothing like patience,' I reasoned"—

"To a young physician," suggested Grey.

"Plague on your puns! Don't interrupt me. And I called the old gentleman's attention to the sentiment when I was ushered into his dressing-room at about half-past eight o'clock. 'Patience, do you call it?' said he. 'Ousting a man from his early morning nap to keep a ten o'clock engagement at six!' But he seemed to appreciate my reference to the four years' probation already passed, and the result of our long poa wow is that in a few weeks more my blue-eyed Sue and I pair off to our nest. I pointed out to you the small, snug domicile in Seventh Street, you recall, as possibly destined for the interior embellishments but now suggested, and the exterior adornment of 'Doctor Henry Sullivan' in bright gilt on the basement door. At two o'clock I'm to walk with Mrs. Sullivan that is to be, and having to step to my office in the mean time, must now say 'over the river!' " [Au revoir!] "Good-morning! How are you, Charlie?" he greets another visitor, and passes out.

Charles Bland enters Grey's office. On his flexible features and upon his broad and lofty brow a seal set as though ages had done their work there in a single night. We all know what it is, I believe, to crowd these cycles of existence—either of joy or sorrow—into some brief division of a brief life-time. What a contrast is he to the but now gay and happy incumbent of the chair into which he moodily sank!

"Good-morning, Charlie!" Grey cordially accosts him. "I'm glad you've come. But what?"—and he looks more steadily at his pallid face. "Are you ill? No? Then you have been?"

"No," and Charles tells him that, as his most intimate friend, he has come to inflict a little of his confidence on him, and to ask some advice. "I am going to Italy," he says.

"To Italy! When? Why? Not now, when you are a burning and a shining light in the fashionable circles here."

"It is of the when, in some sort, that I wish to consult you; of the why you will, perhaps, judge as I do, when you hear all. For the capricious fancies of an idle crowd, which create an idol to-day to be hurled to-morrow from its base, and replaced by another as whimsically chosen, they detain me not so much as an hour. Indeed, in that space of time I propose leaving here, if we decide that I can consistently with duty. You have been very kind to me, George, but, intimate as our acquaintance has been, there is a secret I have never told you. I held her name as something too sacred to mention. I heard it often and often named around me, while I affected not to hear it, or by some remark, foreign to the subject, sought to give another current to the conversation. All this by some contradictory trait in my nature; for, while the sound was more beautiful to my ear than anything else, I felt a nervous uneasiness at having any utter it who felt differently in regard to it from myself. She was the object of my boy affection; it was no transitory passion as I felt it then. I knew this better and better as it became incorporated with my growing strength, and ripened into earnest, true man's love. We were separated for several years of our childhood, but absence wrought no change, save to transform affection to adoration. She was my dream, all through these years, the something which was to make my future life good, and bright, and happy with its beautiful radiance. My only relative died, leaving me early to battle alone with the world—but, then, Lucy was left in it. I would some day see her again—well—but I tire you," he said, recollecting himself.

"No, go on," urged George Grey, drawing his seat nearer, and looking somewhat of the kindness and sympathy within him.

"It's a short story, now," said Charles. "A few months since and we met again. Her childish loveliness was all there, an indescribable womanly lustre hallowing all. She was more beautiful than my dream. It's useless to dwell on these points, however. I told her of what was in my heart for her, of the help she had been to me in those long years of struggling with adverse circumstances, inspiring me to battle with and overcome them, and how I believed that with her lay the power to bid me attain the highest honors of that beautiful art world, wherein I entered—a worshipper. She wept when I told her how barren had been my life but for her and the pencil creations which always took her shape; and she told me, with all a little child's frankness, it seemed to me, that she had never been oblivious of the impressions arising from our early association, that they had always retained for her a vague, sweet influence she had never been able to translate; she knew now. Well, we were engaged. I was painting her portrait then. Had ever artist such inspiration? How to keep back my truant pencil from depicting a rainbow of glory around that beautiful head, from tracing the symbolic anchor as a resting-place for the rounded ivory elbow? That taper finger—it should be pointed heavenward. My Hope must have all her outward belongings, too."

"But tell me," says his friend, impulsively, "she hasn't been untrue to you, Charlie?"

"It is so, George. Whether she was mistaken in her own sentiments respecting me, whether I am to believe that one so lovely could be thoroughly false, I have yet to be satisfied. The issue thus far is the same to me; from last night we are no more than strangers to each other. It is not my purpose to repine at my fate, for fate I call it, believing, as I do, in the immortality, the indestructibility of real, true affection. This atmosphere is dangerous to me; I might be her dupe again."

"Her dupe! I have it now," thought George Grey. "You would not accuse her, but she has treated you as no true woman would. I see it all, despite you."

"And I sail to-morrow, if I can dispose of one obstacle," added Charles.

"What obstacle?"

"Miss Emmons' portrait. Her father, who has been a friend to me, so sets his mind on having it."

"Tell him that changed relations (I assume for granted he knows of those that existed) would make the prosecution of the work disagreeable to all parties."

"And this mention of the matter would not bear the aspect of complaint? I want your candid opinion, for you see I am bewildered."

"It involves necessarily no complaint—this is as you put it. The young lady had a right to change her views of this match; she has done so. Isn't that the statement of the case?"

"Precisely."

"Well, say so, if you need say anything."

"You're a good fellow, George; give me your hand," and they clasped hands, the last time in some years; for the artist packed up his unfinished work, and with the blessing and best wishes of old Mr. Emmons set off for Italy that evening, via New York.

I, Nora Starr, wouldn't have had it happen for the world; but, in utter ignorance that Mr. Bland was leaving us, or that there was any one in Mr. Emmons' study, save, as I supposed, himself, whom I was seeking to deliver an important message in a letter from my father, I walked in and disturbed the conference. He was just taking leave. He could do no less than tell me he was going, and offer to bid me good-by, too. I felt so for him, seeing the change his sorrow had made in him, and in that little time, too—so distressed that there was not a word of comfort I could offer—so anxious to say, and yet so afraid it would be wrong to do so, something about Lucy—I could not help it, the tears would come, then the sobs, then the perfect abandon to grief. I wept as though he had been my brother.

"Lucy keeps nothing from her," said dear Mr. Emmons, kindly, by way of explanation. "She knows all that has happened, and it grieves her little tender heart to think of parting friends. Ah! the child has seen little of the world, yet, and hasn't learned that, take it day by day, life is made up of this sort of thing—forming ties and breaking them, meeting and parting," and he patted my head as he set me down in his own arm-chair.

Mr. Bland had waited a few moments. He now shook the hand of Mr. Emmons again, then, taking mine, gave it a cordial pressure, said, "God bless you, Miss Nora!" and was gone.

One summer in my eastern shore home mother said: "Will you consent, Nora, to set out for the White Sulphur with Mrs. Eyre and family on Wednesday week? You need but little more preparation than that you've been obliged to make for the gay season here, as we call it."

The Chaunceys, and Bankers, and Cadwaladers from Philadelphia, the Donnells and Gilmors from Baltimore, and our Smith and Teackle relations always made such a time of genuine, social enjoyment; such a round of dinner, and evening, and all sorts of parties, and attracted so many visiting strangers in their yearly advent to our little peninsula, that becoming toilets, for all possible occasions, were as much a matter of thought and forecast with our country matrons and their daughters—and, I really imagine, with the beaux, too—as with any corresponding class within the limits of the Quaker, or any other city, on occasion.

"It won't do for you to mope so," said ma; "people are really talking about it. Next thing they'll be saying you left your heart in Philadelphia two years and a half ago. I don't say that, of course, but you never have enjoyed society as much since. And your reason, darling," she smilingly added, in her own tender way; "its hollowness. Well, don't be above using that which God has given you. I suppose that, seeing the verdict of ages gone is levelled against the stability of the people composing it, society is much the same now it has always been, and yet we are intended for social beings. Hence, if we can better it, we must do so; when we can't, we must tolerate—at least, so far as the obligation enjoined of 'charity to all men.'"

"I've been waiting for our visitors to leave, ma," I said, "to tell you the contents of Lucy's letter."

Mr. and Mrs. Eyre, of whom my mother had spoken just now, were among the morning callers, bringing some stranger guests from Carlisle, relations of theirs, however, to return our call of some days before, and the arrival was announced as I read my epistle in my own pretty sea-view chamber. The news it brought furnished one reason, I think the main one, for my evading Mrs. Eyre's cordial invitation proffered that day.

Lucy wrote—I can give you as much of the substance of the letter as you would wish; I haven't it by me now:—

"DEAR, GOOD LITTLE GRANDMOTHER" * * *
[She dotted it off so, as if hesitating what she would write next.] "Well, you remember St. George Grey? You know I wrote you after you went away from me, you truant grandmother, how I had met him unexpectedly at the Academy of Music; how I was just taken by storm (my susceptible heart) by his killing moustache, black eyes and whiskers, and handsome figure? You know, I told you how we seemed to fall in—to sentimentality with each other, right upon the back of this introduction. At least, I did with him. He, it appeared, you will recollect, had known me secretly, and loved me as long, dating from a certain morning when, in my 'seraphic' (Hem!) voice, I read his name on his professional plank in — Street, and questioned, above my breath, what sort of saint a lawyer would make. A cosy little session of billing and cooing ensued upon all this comparison of notes, and cotemporaneous admissions, and—and so forth. It was an adorable time, no doubt about it, but then—well, you know one gets tired of anything. Not you, precocious feminine sage—is that the herb I mean?—you don't. I got tired of being engaged, you know, and so last summer, at Long Branch, I gave my Grey suitor unlimited leave of absence.

"Well, what am I writing all this stuff for now, when you've heard it a thousand times before?"

"Nora, I couldn't get to it any sooner. I'm trying to tell you I've called George back again, and I'm going to be married on the 20th with you for first bridesmaid, by your most gracious leave.

"I said people get tired of everything. I've never got tired of you for a friend, and I don't think I should ever get tired of my husband if I had one (I never had one), that is, supposing his business wasn't in the house every day and all day long. * * * * *

"Charles Bland, my old lover, will be at the wedding, too, if he has the sense and independence I credit him with. We do not get letters from him, as I believe he writes to no one save his business agent here. From this person my saint learns that he has married a beautiful grisette in Rome, and will be here with his wife probably in the next steamer from Europe."

Just as that last clause of Lucy's letter turned up, my thoughts were going out naturally to "Charles" (that's what we used to call him at school), and vexedly, in a vague way, to my display on the eve of his departure. Let that tableau go, however. I considered much more of how he might have suffered but for the good wife I hoped, and settled in my mind, he had secured. Of course, there was none of the old love left for Lucy now. I have as much as acknowledged, perhaps, that I was a little romantic. Most country girls of gentle breeding (and some of those not delicately reared) are, but my romance, be it explained to you, gentle reader, what I had of it was not of the Byronic school, not in the least, and I no more calculated the possibility of Mr. Bland the husband of the charming grisette, or any woman he might have chosen as his wife, suffering pangs of suppressed adoration for Miss Lucy Emmons, or Miss anybody else, than I thought I should ever conceive a violent passion for the big oak that shaded our front door. If, not being married, he had gone to some desert isle "to pine away and die," in the words of the old song, hearing his best loved was plighted away, I should have thought undoubtedly it was the orthodox thing to do. He was safe, however.

I should go to the wedding, my mother said; my father said so, too, when he came in. I should accompany the party to Niagara and to Canada, too, as Lucy expressly stipulated, and should do anything else that there was a chance of to give me recreation and amusement.

"You've needed a change a long time," they both said; "I'm glad you've consented to make it."

That's how I went off to the North that summer, and how the rather limited pecuniary means at "sweet home" were put up to their best for my enjoyment. Well, when I say limited, I some how, from habit, improperly, too, put our little fortune in comparison with that of the friends to whom I was going, the Emmons', who were millionaires. You have probably heard the expression, "An Eastern Shore fortune." Well, we had that, at, perhaps, its best figure, and lived, of course, admirably well, where it is harder not to live well than to do so. My father was worth about a hundred thousand dollars.

The gayest of wedding breakfasts; the most beautiful of brides; the handsomest of bridegrooms, and the most enchanted company.

As the last hallelujah died out on St. Andrew's organ, I caught Charles Bland's familiar glance. Changed some, more manly, and altogether better looking. I was right in my judgment. There wasn't one trace of anything left that looked like the old love burning again. I was glad of it.

The marriage proceeded. The organ again, with its grand diapason; the bridal march, swelling along aisles and galleries; a white-robed, flower-bedecked train in motion.

I've inverted the order of narration. The breakfast came after this; then such hand-shaking! such congratulation! The artist was there, and by and by we found time to chat coseily, he and I. Why was he so provokingly reticent touching that performance with which I honored his departure long ago? I could not force him to allude to it. Suppose—vain, foolish man—suppose he for one instant believed I felt more than, or differently from, what I really did feel. I hoped I might pity anybody. I took another tack and wondered this hadn't been my first essay, as it seemed the most natural.

"Your wife, I hope, is here?"

"She is not, thank you." What a handsome smile he had.

"Shan't I see her?"

"I hope so, but not to-day, I fear."

I didn't like to seem inquisitive, as he didn't tell me why.

"Tell me something about her," I persisted.

"I hear she is a beauty."

"So report says."

"What does Mr. Bland say?"

"Oh, I think he wouldn't marry a woman who didn't seem beautiful to him."

"Do you mean that you would sacrifice your admiration of higher attributes for mere personal beauty?"

"No, Miss Nora. When I speak of beauty now, I mean it to refer to all soul-excellence, heart-excellence, and to intellectual gifts. Endowed with these, no man or woman could have a face otherwise than pleasant to me. The countenance must reflect these, in a greater or less degree."

"You've married an angel," I said.

"No, I never expected to do so; that is, I might in earlier years," he remarked, significantly, "have foolishly promised myself some such thing; not in the more sober and rational age succeeding. And he was evidently encumbered by no unpleasant reminiscences of a time of foolish promises.

"I don't like to be Madame Marplot," said the lady friend who was charge d'affaires by Mr. Emmons' invitation—some relative of the family—"but I'm sent to interrupt this pleasant chat, Miss Starr. However, as Mr. Bland will accompany the party to the depot, I'm sure he'll excuse your present enjoined absence with a better grace."

"Dear aunty! dear No! Mr. Bland, all pardon me!" cooed our newly-mated dove. "It is an hour to the time of starting. I thought they said half-past one, but it's half-past two o'clock we go."

And so that little excitement subsided, and we set to talking again quite like old friends who had a great deal to say. The vanity with which my transitory thought had half wronged the traveller—where was it? Not to be found, upon examination. He used the observation: "The wider and wider the world opens to us, the more insignificant we feel; specks upon the earth, dust, finite beings set side by side with the Infinite." And all his talk when you led him to speak of himself, seemed an unconscious commentary on that text.

I was at rest. He had no such unworthy suspicion as that which had entered my—shall I say foolish—brain? Another thing I liked. It appeared Charles Bland had not become disgusted with his own country by visiting others; or distasteful of her institutions because differing from those the travelled gentleman saw abroad.

"Though there are undoubtedly some things which, I think, could be altered for the better," said he, "still, the old line of the poet—'with all thy faults'—can never be hackneyed for me; and I append thereto that, loving her still, I love her far dearer and better than all other lands I have yet seen, or expect to see."

How that suited me!

"She improves, then, by subjecting her to contrast with other nations?" I asked, and added, "I wish more of our American sojourners abroad were like you, and came home unspoiled."

"If they set out fortified as I did, probably they would return the same, Miss Nora. Please excuse me for calling you Miss Nora," was his parenthetic remark, continuing: "I don't remember ever to have addressed you so when we met here before, but I'm sure this, and not Miss Starr, is the name by which I've always thought of you when away."

He had thought of me, then! Well, and so had I of him. I told him I liked it better than the other; besides, I wasn't Miss Starr, having an unmarried aunt who took that honor.

What did he mean by fortified, though? I asked him.

"Simply this: That all the most sacred sentiments which ever bind a man to home, hold me by hooks of steel to America." He looked serious.

What! treason to the poor grisette, wooed and won and brought away to this strange country? O Charles Bland! I didn't know what to say. I wanted to have it out with him, that little matter that would worry me, go which way I might, and decline the honor of more than a speaking acquaintance henceforward. I know my way to the point was a blunt one, but this ought not to have made matters so much worse.

I said, as though I hadn't observed his last remark—had been abstracted—something: "We were talking, Mr. Bland, of the time when you left for Europe just now. I've often felt sorry I behaved myself like a baby or some little, foolish child on the occasion. Do you happen to remember how I cried, in Mr. Emmons' study, that evening, while I was there by accident, and you had come to say good-by?" He was going to interrupt me, but I wouldn't let him. I was to make a finish of it then and there. "I was very young and foolish then," I went on. "I used always to weep when I saw people suffer. I thought you were suffering; I thought—pardon me, but you know that I was acquainted with all the circumstances of your departure—I thought there was, no matter what the cynics say, such a thing as true, and honest, and constant love in the world, and that you had received a wound you could never get over."

"Do you set it down to a man's discredit, Miss Starr" (he called me this, now, for I was getting excited, and so was he), "that he should not make life hideous by calling up into it continually the ghostly shadows of disappointed affection? I tell you candidly I want no such companionship. I was suffering intensely at the time, and in the way you mention; but I determined, by help of that manhood which Providence has given me, to drag out no useless, sentimental existence, useless to myself and others, and, if the ghosts came, I drove them away. They ceased to haunt me, and one sweet, pleasant spirit came in their place, taking quiet possession of my house; she made peace there. I wooed her to stay, and she is there, I dare hope forever. You know my past history. I may say this much to you. I have not one thought of repining in regard to yonder pretty bride. I loved her with much youthful ardor, but—forgive me, Miss Nora, for this abrupt declaration, your, I believe unintentional, injustice has forced it from me a little sooner than I anticipated—the tears you shed for me have been a dearer memory, all this time of exile, than any thought of Lucy ever was."

I burst with indignation at this insult, for such I conceived it, but a little of woman's tact came to my aid in smothering the Vesuvius of wrath within me. "You married men," I replied, with a something, I felt, between a smile, a sneer, and a cry, "keep in practice, I suppose, by making flattering speeches, or what you think such, to young girls and such other people as cannot resent them."

You would have judged a lightning flash had scathed the young man. "Forgive me, dear Miss Nora!" he exclaimed, in alarm and amazement. "Pardon my forgetfulness that you had not been undeceived regarding the groundless report which preceded my return home. I am not married. I didn't know if you really believed it. My friends mostly have forgotten it was ever said, but—I am a stupid brute!"

"No false alarm this time, friends," announces Mr. Emmons. "The special train awaits you."

And so we bade adieu to Philadelphia for the present.

Never did two people part company under more outré circumstances, I think, than those connecting or separating, which you will, the two persons improperly monopolizing a great deal of that wedding chapter.

I don't pretend that I gave it no attention, that I found plenty to occupy my mind withal in the new scenes which I was passing, the new acquaintances we were constantly making and to make. Certainly, these had their place with me, but I was just as certainly wondering how, when, this other matter should come up for final audit and settlement. I didn't suppose I had seen the end of it. I had been very abrupt, so had he. The right to be offended, if any, lay equally between us. Though, on second thought, it was my privilege, I believe, seeing I was the only party proceeding under a delusion. The delusion was no fault of his, I might say, again, or, if he had humored it—I don't know that he had, intentionally—it was none of his making.

We talked about him very much, as we did the other people who had been at Lucy's bridal breakfast, sitting at our hotel on the Canada side—travelling through, there was but little time for such discussion at large. We had one morning of such as this, the next Charles arrived to speak for himself.

What am I to tell next in this story of mine? Naturally, I suppose, what befell next. I am more appreciative now than I was at first, I think, of the dots or dashes prefacing a letter of Lucy's some time quoted in one of these pages.

What would you have done, reader, young lady reader, I mean? Your declared lover—handsome, talented, good as you respectively knew and believed him to be—weaving his ideas of an old love and a new into a strange, sweet story. "You rolled the stone away, to sit therein an angel." He was talking of his heart, of course, you understand that. You'd have done as I did, probably—accepted the exaltation, cum grano salis, and the pleader, prospectively "for better for worse."

There may have been very many foolish things said on the occasion. I don't remember that there were, but much less do I lay claim to wisdom "above what is written" of love-making people. An enchanted land lay about me, but all travellers to Niagara find this. I do remember Charles, while we were on Goat Island, on this very morning of which I speak, calling my attention to the grand, brief, comprehensive poem of Lord Morpeth, written here, which lines were, he said, the only ones he had ever seen that appeared in any degree worthy the subject. They are copied in my note-book or diary, whatever it is, and I shall transcribe them on this page, because they are comparatively but little known or appreciated, strangely enough:—

NIAGARA.

"There's nothing great or bright, thou glorious fall,
Thou mayst not to the fancy's sense recall—
The thunder-riven cloud, the lightning's leap,
The stirring of the chambers of the deep,
Earth's emerald green and many-tinted dyes,
The fleecy whiteness of the upper skies,
The tread of armies thick'ning as they come,
The boom of cannon and the beat of drum,
The brow of beauty and the form of grace,
The passion and the prowess of our race,
The song of Homer in its loftiest hour,
The unresisted sweep of Roman power,
Britannia's trident on the azure sea,
America's young shout of liberty!
Oh, may the wars that madden in thy deeps
There spend their rage, nor climb the encircling steeps,
And, till the conflict of thy surges cease,
The nations on thy banks repose in peace!"

Water is its own witness of the truth of diluvian history, I reasoned silently, contemplating the wondrous majesty of the cataract, or to me, at least, to whom the sound of falling water is unexceptionably fraught with vague awe; for even here, where it is an instrument of danger to none but the rashly defiant, is the rainbow testimony to Noah's faith, to the fact that His greatness is ever tempered with tenderness. I wondered how people could laugh, and chatter, and frisk about in such a presence, I called it; it seemed like frivolous amusing of oneself in face of the Great White Throne.

Well, that summer-time passed, as summer-times will, unto the final end thereof, and I had company home, in the early autumn, I little thought of, coming away. The news had gone before me. I didn't keep many secrets from those dear hearts in the old house by the sea. Charles wanted to be settled. He had made money by study, and perseverance, and attention to his profession; but he could not afford to be idle, and he did not choose to be dependent. He must locate, and go to work again in earnest; and so, before the white Chrysanthemums were beaten of the fall rains, my mother wove a bridal-wreath of them to deck her daughter's hair.

I left my sea-washed home; but there is a pretty, poetical-looking, not ostentatious, establishment in the heart of the Quaker City, where I live now. Here, often while I write, my heart goes out to the sounding sea, surging along the shores of my sweet Southern home, all within, around me, though, thank heaven! is bright, and genial, and lovely. As I sit at these notes, my artist-companion, sitting at my side, is finishing off, at my pleading, the portrait of one Lucy Emmons, now Grey, who is, I know, my own true friend, and whose wealth, beauty, and accomplishments have constituted her, by common consent, the leader of the ton in this city

LOUISIANA SCENERY.

BY MRS. ELLEN M. MITCHELL.

[Suggested by a picture, painted by J. R. Meeker.]

WHERE ever skies, or woods, or sun-lit waters clear,
More real and sweet to mortal sight than these?
Were they not wrought in some enchanted sphere?
Did art or nature form such perfect trees?
Fain would we 'neath their branches dreaming lie,
And let all worldly cares drift idly by.

Far, far within that depth of shadows vast,
Faint, lovely pictures slowly seem to rise;
Such magic has the skillful artist cast
O'er all he touched, his waters, woods, and skies,
That every detail is suggestive and replete
With thoughts and fancies new, and strange, and sweet.

E'en where the moss, with clinging arms, droops low,
And deer across the herbage shyly tread,
And sunbeams, shining with a softer glow,
Are filtered through the dainty leaves o'erhead,
Such subtle meanings do we find concealed
As thrill our hearts with rapture when revealed.

What perfect tints and shadows charm the eye!
Unheeding time, we linger, gaze, and dream;
And from cloud-billows, lake, and trees, and sky,
New beauties, still unfolding, sudden gleam,
Till every pulse with vague delight is stirred,
And e'en the leaves' soft, rustling sound is heard.

Exquisite picture! word-descriptions fall
To give a faint conception of thy worth;
For ah! delicious secrets dost thou veil
That only in a poet's brain had birth;
Whose glowing wealth and imagery of thought
To perfect, rare fruition thou hast wrought.

VOL. LXXXII.—17

WANTED—A WIFE.

BY S. ANNIE FROST.

"I WONDER," said pretty Lizzie Thorndyke, looking up from a newspaper, whose columns had held her attention for nearly half an hour, "I wonder if any of these matrimonial advertisements are ever put in the papers in good faith? Here are no less than five, commencing, 'Wanted—a wife.'"

"I should think," responded Anna Green, cousin to Lizzie, "that if a man wanted a wife very badly, his best plan was to go court one. There are plenty of nice girls to be won."

"Just fancy advertising for a husband, Anna."

"Can't. My imagination cannot compass such an absurdity. But what makes you so interested to-day? I'm sure that trash has been in the papers for years."

"Why, three of these enterprising gentlemen are modest enough to ask for photographs, and I was thinking it would be fun to send some of those in the box Bob left up stairs."

"What box?"

"Have you never seen it? You know Bob learned to photograph just before he left for California, to be able to take views of scenery. He took lessons of the foreman at Wright & Hill's, who were burnt out just before Bob left. Bob was at the fire, trying to save all he could, and amongst other things he rescued a box of pictures that they told him to keep. There is the greatest mix of stuff in it—copies of pictures and statues, groups, heads, and quite a lot of pretty faces."

"But we might send some picture of a person who would get into trouble by it."

"Oh, no! I wouldn't send anything but a fancy head; there are plenty of those. I'll get the box and let you see them."

The box proved to be a treasure for passing time. It was quite large and well filled, and the two girls found the morning slipping away rapidly as they examined the contents. Suddenly Anna gave a cry of admiration.

"What an exquisite face!"

"That is one of the fancy heads," said Lizzie, taking the picture from her cousin's hand.

"Are you certain, Lizzie? It is very lifelike."

"But very fanciful, Anna. Nobody in these days sits for a photograph with a wreath of field daisies and green leaves round their head, and who ever saw such hair? Why, there is enough to start a chignon factory in flourishing business."

Anna looked again at the picture. It certainly was fanciful enough to justify Lizzie's assertion, although the face had an animated expression rarely attained by the pencil. There was only the head set in a framework of clouds, the dimpled shoulders rising from the fleecy clusters, and the sweet face encircled by them. The regular features, exquisite mouth, and large, soft eyes were framed in masses of heavy curls, just caught from the low brow and little ears by a wreath of field daisies, grasses, and leaves.

"It is a lovely, lovely face, Lizzie, is it not?"

"Yes. I think," said Lizzie, musingly, "that I will send this to Mr. Edgar Holmes; ain't that the name? Yes," she added, after a reference to the paper. "Mr. Edgar Holmes, Box No. 47, Waterford, Illinois. Illinois is a good way from Hilton, Massachusetts, Anna, so I guess he will not come to look for the original very soon. There! how does that look?" and she tossed the picture to her cousin, having written on the margin, "Ever yours, with love, Ida."

"But, Lizzie, suppose, after all, this should be a real portrait?"

"Nonsense! We certainly know everybody in Hilton."

"I don't half like it, Lizzie."

"Oh, pshaw! You are always fussy. I mean to get some answers from Mr. Edgar Holmes & Co. It will be real fun. Here is one from California and one from New York; pick out two more pictures. O Anna, here is that hateful old maid, Matilda Truefit. I have half a mind to send her."

"No, I won't let you, Lizzie. Send only fancy heads."

"Well, just as you say. Now for the letters. See how nicely I can disguise my hand," and she wrote a few lines in a stiff, angular hand as legible and almost as unrecognizable as print.

"Anybody can see that it is a disguised hand."

"Of course they can; but that's of no consequence. I shall only write a few lines at first, professing deep interest and a desire for further acquaintance. You are as grave as a deacon, Anna."

"Because it seems to me foolish, a waste of time, to say the best of it, and it may get you into trouble, Lizzie."

"I'm not afraid. It is all for fun. I shall sign them all 'Ida,' and have the answers directed to the same name."

An hour passed away, almost in silence. Lizzie wrote three letters of the character she had described, while Anna pondered over the pictures, read the newspaper which had inspired her cousin with the new piece of mischief, and perused the letters as they were finished and tossed over to her for criticism.

There were not two prettier girls in Hilton than these cousins—one a resident of the village from her birth, the other a regular visitor for the summer months. Lizzie Thorndyke was a brown-eyed, dark-haired beauty, with a short, plump figure, fair complexion, a tongue that was the terror of every dull-witted youth in the village, and a love of mischief and excitement that made her the leader in every picnic, festival, and frolic for miles around. Anna, a tall, slender blonde, was more quiet and reserved, a resident of Boston, fond of music and literature, but yet ready to enjoy heartily all the pleasures offered during a visit to Hilton in the summer months. Twice her father had taken herself and Lizzie for a trip to Niagara, the lakes, and the White Mountains; but generally Anna spent the summer in Hilton, and Lizzie a portion of each winter in Boston. Many a heedless prank originating in Lizzie's busy brain Anna had checked in time to prevent mischief and confusion, while her own graver nature was cheered and made happier by intercourse with her lively little cousin. She sat, now, rather soberly perusing Lizzie's daring epistles, very doubtful of the results of sending them away, yet not trusting her own powers of persuasion to prevent a freak which she saw had taken strong hold of her cousin's imagination. The letters were all sealed and directed at last, and depositing them in the post-office being postponed for an afternoon walk. Lizzie yawned, declared she was tired to death, and threw herself upon the sofa for a nap, while Anna took up an intricate piece of knitting to pass the time before dinner.

One of the letters only is of interest to our readers, and that we will follow to its destination. It was directed to "Mr. Edgar Holmes, Waterford, Illinois," and contained the beautiful photograph of the girl crowned with field daisies.

Lying upon the table, in a neatly-furnished lawyer's office, half-hidden by a number of other epistles, it was there found by two young gentlemen, who came in chatting and laughing soon after the office-boy had brought the mail from the post-office.

"More answers to my matrimonial advertisement, Al," said one of the gentlemen, a handsome, bright-eyed young fellow, whose sunny face spoke of a life free from care, and formed quite a contrast to that of his companion, who was evidently an earnest man, a deep thinker, and of a grave, rather reserved nature.

"How can you tell before opening them?" he inquired, courteously, but evidently feeling no interest in the matter.

"Oh! they are so daintily enveloped and directed, and I can feel the photograph cards."

As he spoke he was rapidly breaking open his batch of letters, whilst his companion scanned the columns of a morning paper. Suddenly a cry broke from the lips of the younger man.

"What an exquisite face! It cannot be a portrait, but it is lovely. Direct 'Ida, Hilton, Massachusetts.' Look at it, Al."

Albert Clayton languidly stretched out his hand for the card, but the instant his eyes fell upon the picture the whole expression of his face changed. In the place of the look of indifference, there now flashed from his eyes a look, first of utter surprise, then bitter anger, and finally a contempt that was the strongest of all. Once he turned the card to see the name of the artist, and then slowly there gathered upon his brow and round his lip a set, determined look that it was painful to see.

"Why, Al, what ails you?" suddenly cried his friend. "One would think Miss Ida's was a gorgon's head."

The forced smile of answer would never have deceived a keener observer, but Edgar Holmes was satisfied with it.

"Let me see the letter, Ned?"

"Certainly. You can be reading it while I am in court. Shall I find you here when I return?"

"Yes. I shall wait for you, for I must leave this evening, you know, for home."

"I know. I shall miss you constantly. Well, good-morning!"

Left alone, Albert Clayton, after reading the letter signed "Ida," drew from his vest pocket a card-case, and from its folds a photograph, an exact copy of the daisy-crowned beauty. Well remembered he the day when the lovely face had been so crowned. The original of the picture was his promised wife, into whose keeping he had put the whole treasure of his love, to whom he had given a heart, which, sorely tried by suffering, had never before bowed before the charms of a woman.

Educated in a different school, Albert Clayton might have been a trusting, frank nature, but he had been trained from childhood to suspect and question all around him. He had worshipped his parents, and his father, a wealthy Western lawyer, had given him love for love. When that father died, he was a boy at school, and returned for a summer vacation less than two years from the time he was left fatherless to find his mother again married, and to a man whom he had every reason to believe unworthy of any good woman's affection. Too fully were all his fears for the future realized. His own share of his father's property was squandered by the new guardian before he was of an age to claim it; his mother, oppressed and ill-treated, died broken-hearted; and his only sister, driven to desperation, eloped with a young scamp, attracted to her by her father's wealth.

Orphaned and almost penniless before he was quite twenty-one, Albert was offered a home and an opportunity to continue the study of law by his father's partner, continuing with him long after he knew that he was a mere drudge, half-paid for services his own intellect and hard study soon made valuable to his employer. The practice of his profession was not calculated to increase the young lawyer's faith in mankind; and when, at the age of thirty, he opened an office of his own in Cincinnati, he had acquired a reputation as a shrewd, long-headed lawyer, impossible to cheat, but a hard, reserved man, devoid of affection for any one.

This was the man who, coming one summer to Hilton to investigate a law case in his care, met there Sadie Elkington, the niece of his client, paying a summer visit to her aunt. Something in the pure, sweet face of the young girl, just stepping into womanhood, attracted first the world-hardened man. Watching her jealously, he found a nature open and frank, yet modest, full of all womanly grace and sweetness, and the closed portals of his heart opened, at last, to fold in a close embrace this true woman, who, in winning his love, all unconsciously had given him her own.

It was pronounced rather a dull summer at Hilton. Many of the young people were away, the cousins Lizzie Thorndyke and Anna Green were at Niagara, and picnics, drives, and dances were "few and far between." But the month occupied by Albert Clayton in the investigation of old Mrs. Elkington's papers flew by on gilded wings; and when he returned to Cincinnati, Sadie to her father's home in Boston, it was with mutual promises of constancy, and bright hopes for the future.

Well did Albert Clayton remember the day when the lovely photograph was taken at his request. They had been for a long ramble in the fields, and he had crowned her with daisies, making her so beautiful in his loving eyes that he would not rest until she consented to allow him to carry away the picture of her face as he had adorned it. One year of betrothal, and the wedding day was set for a certain seventh of October, when, again absent from home on a professional visit, Albert found the face of the woman he had loved almost to idolatry inclosed in a letter answering a matrimonial advertisement.

It is impossible to describe the shock given to the fastidious, suspicious nature of this man. He had given, for the first time in many years, the confidence of his heart to another's keeping. He had thrown aside the suspicions of all human nature, that had warped his own character, to give a trusting, perfect love to one woman. In her he had found all that his starved heart craved of gentleness, affection, and modesty. All her letters were filled with a spirit of devotion, toned down by a sweet, maidenly reserve, that had commanded his respect as well as his affection. Loving faithfully, trusting utterly, he had looked forward to his future happiness as a thing assured and certain.

And now, to find this woman, his promised wife, his ideal of modest refinement, answering a vulgar matrimonial advertisement, sending the picture, for which he had been forced to plead and petition for hours, to be the sport of an unknown man, writing a letter that was an invitation for future correspondence, and covering all only by the flimsy veil of a disguised hand, and a post-office address a few miles from home. Some friend in Hilton, probably, mailed this precious letter, and would call for the answer. Well, his dream was over. He brooded for a long time over his duplicate pictures, then, tossing one back upon young Holmes' pile of letters, he inclosed the one he had carried over his heart for a twelvemonth in a short letter, directed and sealed it, and, taking up his hat, left the office. His return to Cincinnati the same evening had been settled before the receipt of the momentous letter, so his friend was prepared for his departure, though scarcely for his abrupt and hasty farewell.

And while strangers and her dearest were thus ruthlessly destroying Sadie Elkington's love dream and hopes of happiness, she was living her life of peaceful daily duty, making the sunshine of home, and looking forward to a future of married bliss. Already there were piles of snowy linen, daintily embroidered by her own skilful fingers, lying in readiness for the trousseau, and daily some such needlework passed through her busy hands, while she sat and dreamed of Albert, his love, and her own powers of rendering him happy. It was a very pure, unselfish love this fair young girl had given to her betrothed. With quick, womanly instinct she had read the character of the reserved suspicious man, penetrated the crust of his proud reticence, and knew that her love was to him almost his sole hopes of faith in any human excellence. She knew also, that from this hard mistrust and cynicism, it was often but one step to positive infidelity, and it was her earnest prayer that she might be permitted so to soften this noble heart as to let in upon it a fuller light and higher faith than it could ever know whilst clouded by doubts of all mankind. Sadie Elkington would have smiled had any one suggested to her that there was any sacrifice in her prospects for the future. She loved Albert Clayton with all the fervor of a first love, and it had never occurred to her to contrast her own home with the one awaiting her. The eldest of a family of nine children, she had learned early to make all the little sacrifices of her own comfort daily required from the oldest sister in a large family. Her father almost worshipped her, while her mother could scarcely endure the prospect of seeing this loving, tender daughter leave the home she had brightened so long, for one so far away.

Yet hiding away their own grief, the loving parents were aiding in the preparation of a bridal outfit that was to be as perfect as ample means, taste, and loving care could make it. The mother and daughter were in the sitting-room just before the dinner hour, discussing the merits of a new collar pattern, when Mr. Elkington came to the door, holding a bundle in one hand, a letter in the other.

"There, Miss Sadie," he said, opening the paper to unroll a piece of superb blue silk, "see if you can get a petticoat out of that. Mamma, there, will lend you some old cotton lace to trim it."

"Not a yard," laughed his wife. "Why, you extravagant man, this is the third Irish poplin."

"Fully paid for by the kisses Sadie has just given me. What are you gazing at this letter for, Sadie? Women are never satisfied. Give them finery and they want flattery. Well, there is your sugar plum."

"Sadie! Sadie!"

It was a startled cry from the mother that broke the interval of silence following the opening of the letter. The young girl tried to answer the cry, but the stiff white lips were powerless to move, and with a moan of pain she fainted, falling heavily upon the dress just received with warm, shy blushes, and representing so much thoughtful love.

Mr. Elkington took up the letter which had fallen from the nerveless hand, and while his wife was trying to restore life to the insensible girl, he was seeking the cause of her sudden fall.

"Sadie's picture! Valueless when shared with others! Trusts her new love may prove more agreeable than the old! Shocked at her want of maidenly modesty! What does the fellow mean, mother? How dare he insult our Sadie by such a letter. Useless to answer, as he intends to leave Cincinnati at once. Well for him! He had better get beyond the reach of my horsewhip, for my arm is not yet too weak to thrash the scoundrel!"

"Hush, father; she is recovering," said Mrs. Elkington, interrupting the passionate exclamations and bitter readings from the letter.

Sadie was, indeed, reviving, and trying to realize her own position.

"Father," she said, as her father came to her with the fatal letter still in his hand, "what does he mean? How can he write so cruelly to me?"

"He is a rascal!" said the angry old gentleman; "a scoundrel! He has found some newer face to flatter, and tries to make you to blame for his inconstancy. Why, the letter is perfectly absurd upon the face of it. Accusing you of having another love, and giving your photograph to some one else! You, who have lived like a nun ever since Sir Jealousy condescended to bestow his regards upon you! You, who are such a model of reserve and devotion, that your own old father has been jealous fifty times of your fiancé, to be accused of a want of maidenly modesty! I should like to wring the fellow's neck."

"There is some terrible mistake, father."

"Mistake! I should think there was a mistake! There was a mistake when we all believed him an honorable, upright gentleman, if he was a grumpy, sulky companion; and a grand mistake when we believed him capable of appreciating our Sadie, and making her an affectionate husband."

"But, father, I am sure he has been deceived in some way."

"He deceived! I think it is we who have been deceived! Well, there, don't look at me so pitifully. I won't rave any more. Here, mother, you talk to her." And, conscious of his own inability to talk quietly, the angry, insulted father went off to the library to march up and down, and work off his wrath in solitude.

Poor Sadie! It was in vain she read the cruel letter over and over to try to find some solution of the mystery. She could not accept her father's theory of Albert's voluntary renunciation of her love. Some influence had been at work upon his jealous, suspicious nature, she felt convinced, though what it was, she could not divine. It was a hard blow, and her cross seemed almost too heavy to carry, but she put out of sight the pretty clothing collected with so much care, and full of such loving associations, locked up the letters that she had welcomed so eagerly, responded to so faithfully, and bravely crushing her own sorrow out of sight, was always the loving child, the devoted sister to the home circle, fully appreciating the tender care her mother bestowed upon her, and the delicacy which kept back all her father's expressions of anger. She was not one to parade her grief or bare her heart for any eye, and the effort to appear calm and cheerful was rewarded by a real feeling of resignation. She had done no wrong, and perhaps at some future time Albert might learn how truly and faithfully she had loved him; in the mean time she would try to find happiness in her home, her parents' love, and her friends' society. A very dull commonplace view of the matter, perhaps, but one that required more real unselfish heroism than many an act admired by the world.

Four years passed away with many changes, and Albert Clayton returned from a prolonged European trip to Cincinnati, and again opened an office for the practice of law. Amongst the many friends who came to offer him a word of welcome, he was surprised one morning to receive a call from Edgar Holmes.

"When I heard you had left Cincinnati, Al, I thought I would come for a while, and see if some of your clients would not fancy me for a substitute."

"I hope you have done well!" said Albert, politely.

"Oh, yes, pretty well. You must drop in when you are passing and see how the old office looks. By the way, you know I am a married man, don't you?"

"No, indeed! Did you marry Miss Elkington?"

The name seemed almost to choke him, spoken for the first time in four long years.

"Miss Elkington? Never heard of her in my life. What put that into your head?"

"I—was she not the lady who answered your advertisement for a wife?"

"O Al, I must tell you all about that. Can you listen to a long story?"

"Yes."

"Well, about two years ago, I had business which called me to Boston, and amongst other gentlemen friends there, was one Mr. Green, who made me welcome to a very pleasant home, and introduced me to a pretty daughter and an equally pretty niece, Miss Lizzie Thorn-dyke, of Hilton, Mass. Miss Lizzie was in Boston purchasing her bridal finery, being engaged to a young gentleman from New York. It was not long before I noticed that the young lady avoided me as much as possible, seeming half afraid of me when thrown into my company. My business was soon transacted, but my heart was yielding to the charms of Anna Green, and I lingered in the city, trying to win an answering affection. I succeeded, and won the father's consent to my suit. The day was set for a double wedding, the cousins wishing to be married at the same time. You look bored, Al!"

"Oh no, go on," said Albert, who certainly did look bored.

"Well, to make a long story short, Lizzie's fiancé, Mr. Moreton, came on from New York, preparations were going on for the wedding, and everything was pleasant, when one evening we were all seated in the parlor chatting. Amongst other subjects, the one of matrimonial advertisements came up. I saw that Lizzie looked distressed, but suspecting nothing, I laughed about my correspondent Ida, and read two or three of her last letters—warm enough they were, too—for the benefit of the party. Mr. Moreton expressed his opinion on the indelicacy of such a correspondence in no measured terms, finally declaring that he would disown his own sister if she was guilty of such a proceeding. Fancy our amazement when Lizzie, as white as ashes, started to her feet, crying out:—

"O Robert, don't, don't say so! I am Ida!" and fell in a dead faint upon the floor."

"But the picture?" said Albert Clayton, himself as pale as a corpse.

"That was a fancy head her brother picked up in some photograph gallery in Hilton. Are you going to faint, Al?"

"No, no," he said, rousing himself by a great effort; "finish your story."

"There is not much more to tell. Robert, touched by Lizzie's distress, and influenced by Anna's entreaties, forgave her, but there came into his manner a reserve and coolness of which he, himself, I think, was unconscious, but which grated terribly on Lizzie's sensitive, high strung spirit. For a week or two there was a sort of enforced peace, and then the engagement was broken by mutual consent, Lizzie returning to Hilton, and Mr. Moreton to New York, before the wedding day which gave me the dearest wife in the world. I was half afraid I should lose her for my share in the correspondence, but she never referred to it, and you may be sure I did not. Ten o'clock! I must go. You will come soon to see us, Al? No. — Fourth Street."

He was gone at last. For hours Albert Clayton paced his office floor, now and then sighing out:—

"O Sadie, Sadie, can you ever forgive me?"

Then he sat down to write to her whom he had so cruelly misjudged; but letter after letter was tossed into the fire, till, finally, giving up that task, he packed a valise and started for Boston.

It was not Sadie's nature to be unforgiving when he pleaded for pardon. He should have known her better, she thought, but she made all allowance for the strong evidence against her. It was not so easy to win the old gentleman over; he growled and scolded, made sarcastic speeches, and was altogether most impenetrable, till Sadie's pleading face and great pitiful eyes silenced him.

"You really think you can forgive him, and trust your happiness to him?" he asked.

"Yes, father," was the quiet answer, but the expressive face lighted with pleasure.

"Well, get out your finery again, and I"— "Will go buy more Irish poplins," laughed his wife.

Nobody ever knew exactly how the story got to Hilton, but Lizzie—still Miss Thorndyke—found all eyes would turn upon her if, in company, any allusion was made to the advertisements headed, "Wanted, a Wife."

MY WIFE.

BY FRED HAMMOND.

SHE is not tall, of queenly grace,
Nor beauty marks her youthful face;
Untutored ease her footsteps guide,
And loving is my little bride.

On Brussels soft she doth not tread,
Nor downy pillows rest her head;
Unwearied in her cottage life,
Oh! dear to me my loving wife.

In velvets rich she is not clad,
Nor silks and satins make her glad;
Unenvious she, my soul's delight,
She makes my home forever bright.

Of liv'ried footmen she has none,
Of coaches, horses, e'en not one;
But yet for all I could not part,
Nor separate her from my heart.

HAPPINESS is no other than soundness and perfection in mind.—Antoninus.

THE SHADOW ON THE HEARTH.

BY MRS. M. O. JOHNSON.

In a richly-furnished parlor, its crimson curtains closely drawn to shut out the piercing winter night, before a glowing bed of anthracite, sat Maurice Greenwood, merchant. Somewhat more than fifty years had written their record of his life, but his hair was thickly sprinkled with gray, and his face, with its deep-set hazel eyes, and compressed mouth, seemed like that of one much older. That face was one where WILL was graven on every feature, as with pen of iron and diamond-point. But some regret, some lasting shade there was, about brow, and mouth, and eyes, and Maurice Greenwood was not happy. Wealth he had, and every outward means of happiness, save dear faces by his fireside, and tones of home affection. These he had not; in his palace-like home he lived alone. His housekeeper was faithful to her duty; and she only, of all the world, felt an interest in the lonely man. She had been his boyhood's nurse, and all she could do for his comfort was done, but she could not silence the thoughts that oppressed him, the aching want in his life. Ah, there was a shadow on Maurice Greenwood's hearth and heart; one, too, of his own making.

His wife slept beneath the green shades of Laurel Hill; and his only daughter, his beautiful, gentle, true-hearted Annie, was no longer at his side. She had kept her faith with the lover who lacked only gold, and for this he had banished her from his home, and tried to drive her image from his thoughts. But that he could not do. The sight of a child climbing a father's knee, or clinging to his hand, always gave him a thrill of pain, for it brought back days long past. A gleeful voice, carolling old ballads, never failed to wake echoes in his soul he dreaded to hear. Every fair young face he met in the street seemed to look at him with reproachful eyes. He saw his wife growing paler and thinner day by day, and, though no word of complaint came from her lips, he knew his own hand had wrought this, yet pride held him in its iron sway; and not till it was too late; not till the suffering mother lay on that bed from which she would rise only on the wing of an immortal life, did his will bend. Then, in the loneliness and sorrow that followed, realizing, for the first time, all that the feeble woman, no longer his, had been to him, his very soul was bowed; a regret awoke that would not be silenced, and he would have given his whole fortune to undo what he had done. He knew not where Annie was; whether, even, she were living or not.

Time passed on, and he became accustomed to his lonely life; yet the regret he could not banish, embittered every quiet hour. At times, when, as now, he sat alone by his deserted fireside, the thought of his daughter grew so vivid that she seemed to stand beside him. The white brow, the radiant, wavy hair of golden brown, were the same; but the blue eyes, with a sad, reproachful look, gazed steadily into his own. Once or twice the illusion had been so strong that involuntarily he stretched his arms toward her and called her name, and his house-keeper, perhaps coming in with his tea-tray, had found him nearly fainting, or, as he always answered, "tired."

"I do declare," she said to an intimate friend, "if he would get his daughter home, with her husband, and treat her like a father, how happy the man might be! Likely enough they've little children that would make the old house alive again, and it's more of a tomb than anything else. But, dear me! there's no knowing if she's alive; wonder if he knows; never can ask him; it won't do to mention her name; just set him against her still more, if that could be; but I wish I knew. To think I cradled her on my breast, same as I did him before her, and I never thought to see my boy like this; just making himself wretched for the sake of worrying his own flesh and blood."

"Ten years to-day since Miriam left me," said Maurice Greenwood to himself.

It was a mild, sunny spring morning, and opening leaf-buds and a scent of garden violets, even in the busy city, brought glad tidings of that which should be. A sudden impulse came over him to visit Miriam's grave, and he concluded to ride out to Laurel Hill that afternoon.

It was a lovely, shaded spot near the river, and the early flowers were beginning to bloom. Maurice Greenwood stood there alone in the still glow of sunlight that wrapped the "city of the silent" as in God's great peace; and in those moments a glimpse of a higher, better life dawned on his soul. The thought thrilled him, as never before, how soon he, too, must lie down, his heart as still as those beneath the grass, his hand powerless to change aught he had done in life. And a great sorrow for the past came over him. But where was Annie? Could he even now make any reparation for the cruel wrong he had done his own child?

What startled him? What made the strong man tremble in every nerve? For the moment, it seemed to him a vision. A young girl passed with a basket of flowers on her arm. He had only a glimpse of her face, but the golden-brown hair beneath the little sun-hat, the form, and step, and bearing were Annie's own! A great hunger sprang up in his heart, and he could not resist the impulse to follow her. He did so, silently, slowly, not to attract her attention. She did not see him approach, as she sat on the grass twining a wreath of the flowers she had brought, and singing a low, sweet melody; one that Anne loved and often sang. He drew nearer; near enough to read the inscription on the marble tablet before him. His daughter's name was graven there, and the man with difficulty repressed a cry of pain. The young girl turned her head; she saw him and sprang to her feet.

"Pardon me, young lady," he said, courteously, "for my seeming intrusion. She who lies here was very dear to me, but I have not seen her these many years, and I did not know of this."

His manner, his gray hair, and worn, sad face, reassured her, and she remained awhile, answering simply and frankly his few inquiries about her father and home. She was the only child his Annie left, and likely soon to be quite alone, for her father was fast failing. Maurice pondered. What should he do? Could he tell her that he was her grandfather? Would she not fly from him as from a savage beast if she should know he was the father who turned her gentle mother from his heart and home, and left her to die in poverty and pain? But she must know, or he could make no reparation. And his good angel told him that Annie would forget, in kindness shown her loved ones, even at this late hour, the deep and bitter wrong done herself.

"I have a chaise waiting at the gate," he said, at last. "Will you allow me to carry you home and see your father?"

But the revelations made there are not for mortal pen to describe. When he left, there was peace between them. It was but a little time that the sick man lingered, Maurice doing all he could for his aid and comfort, and he went to his rest, happy in the assurance that Annie Genevra should ever hold his mother's place in the heart and home of the repentant old man. This promise Maurice sought earnestly to fulfil, and though his daughter's presence seemed still conscious at times, the shadow on his hearth grew less, and not all of pain. Yet thoughts of the unreturning Past, regret, softened though it were, served in after years as a warning, a beacon, the reminder his impervious will still needed.

Five years have passed since Annie Genevra came to Maurice Greenwood. Her presence has become the sunlight of his home; her voice the sweetest music that meets his ear; her hand alone rests on his temples with soothing touch, when sad memories oppress him; and ever, as she comes near, the shadows on hearth and heart grow less.

He sits musing alone this evening, and a shade of troubled thought is on his brow. Rarely does he talk to himself, but he feels lonely now, though Genevra has been away but a day.

"Five years!" he says. "How happy we have been! And here this girlish fancy must upset it all. Why haven't I seen this before? Why didn't I stop it? Wonder if I wasn't an old fool to let them go off on that boat trip to-day? But, if I had refused, what then? It would only provoke Frank, and start him up more resolute than ever, like as any way; and, as for Genie, she'd have cried all day, I suppose. I'm in a pretty plight, I declare! I might have foreseen it—but, the mischief I didn't—when I took Frank into the store, and let him come here so much. I don't want him to have her; he's poor as Job's cat—steady and good, to be sure, and loves her, no doubt of that. I'm not afraid he wouldn't be kind, I'm not afraid she wouldn't be happy; but I wanted my pet, my pride, my beauty to take a place befitting her. But, dear me! if I say no, she'll run away with him, or she'll go and break her heart. They're all alike, these girls." A look of intense pain passed over the old man's face, and he murmured: "Maybe if I'd been different, Annie might have been here now, Miriam, too—who knows? What makes me think of Annie so to-night, I wonder?" he said, moving uneasily in his chair. "I wish those youngsters would come home—I do. It seems as if she stood by me this blessed minute. O Annie! Annie! don't look so. I haven't done it, Annie. I haven't harmed them," cried the old man, half-wild in his excitement.

"Will you have tea now, sir, or wait for Miss Genevra?" asked the housekeeper, opening the door. "It's past your usual time."

"Tea before she comes! No, indeed," was the instant reply. "But isn't it time for her to be home?"

"The boat's a little late to-night, I reckon, sir. She'll be in soon, no doubt."

"Late!" The old man sprang to his feet as if his years had suddenly rolled from him. "Late!" he repeated, as he glanced at the clock, and then walked nervously to the window and back again. Ten minutes passed, and he grew so excited that the good old housekeeper, while she tried to quiet him, bitterly reproached herself for her casually spoken words. There was really no cause for alarm, as he would have seen, but for his nervous excitement; but all manner of accidents ran riot in his fancy, and the moments seemed hours.

The door-bell rang. An instant after Genevra's merry voice wound through the entries and up the stairs, and in she came, radiant with health and happiness, just as she had parted from him in the morning.

"O grandpa, such a splendid day we've had!" she exclaimed, clasping her arms round his neck.

"Then you had no accident?"

"No, indeed. What made you think of that, grandpa? Am I late? Oh, yes, I see," glancing toward the clock. "Just a little delay with something about the machinery, grandpa. We were talking, and I didn't mind much about it."

"Happy child!" thought Maurice Greenwood. "God helping me, I'll never break her heart—one's enough," and the shadow grew less than ever.

A year went by. Frank Shirley had become a junior partner in the firm of Greenwood & Co., and in the old family mansion a bridal feast was made.

"Ah!" thought the housekeeper, as she herself fastened the white dress, and placed the orange-flowers on Genevra's fair brow, "if I could have done this for Miss Annie. Well, what's past is past forever, and she's angel-crowned now."

"God bless you, my children!" said the old man, and the shadow grew light, misty, almost disappeared.

Ten years more. Genevra has filled Annie's place; her gentle care and tender affection making the old man's heart warm and his home sunny; her husband has long been as a dearly-loved son; her children, the little heart's-ease blossoms that brought comfort to his spirit. He is way-worn and weary now, and the loving friends gathered around him know that he is passing from them swiftly, but with peace and trust in his heart.

For an hour or two he had slumbered lightly, Genevra sitting beside him, his hand clasped in hers, when he opened his eyes, and, looking at her with a world of affection in their clear, steady gaze, said:—

"Genevra, darling, I have seen your mother. She forgave me long ago. In a little while I shall hold her to my breast again as I did when she was a babe. She is so beautiful, Genevra, all in white, with a rose-crown on her forehead, as young and bright as you are now. I have tried to make you happy, dear—kiss me," and, as Genevra bent her face, dripping with tears, to his, the falling hand caressed her golden hair, as it had been wont, and he spoke once more, feebly:—

"The shadow is gone now. She stands there, but it is all glory. Annie!"

"What does he mean? What shadow?" whispered Genevra's husband. But she raised her hand slightly.

"Hush, dear—see—he is gone."

NEVER do anything that can denote an angry mind; for although everybody is born with a certain degree of passion, and from untoward circumstances will sometimes feel its operation, and be what they call "out of humor," yet a sensible man or woman will never allow it to be discovered. WORK DEPARTMENT.

INFANT'S BOOT—CROCHET.

Materials for a Pair.—Seven-eighths of an ounce of white, and a few skeins of colored Berlin wool; bone crochet-hook No. 12 (bell gauge).

MAKE a chain of twenty-six stitches. Work on one side only. The first and second rows are in double-stitch, always working through both the threads of the stitches of the preceding row; third row likewise in double, but working alternately once in the nearest two threads of the stitches in the preceding row, and once in the middle in the following stitch of the first pattern-stripes, and decrease one stitch in the middle of each row. The sole is worked in double-stitches forwards and backwards, always working in the whole stitch. For this, white wool is taken. Begin at the point with nine stitches, which, by increasing at both the outer edges, are, in the next five rows, increased to thirteen; work in these seven more rows, and in the next five rows decrease to eight stitches; then five rows, without increasing or decreasing. Now increase two stitches, work five rows, and then finish the sole with three row, so that a little kind of double-thread strap is formed upon the stitch lying over it in the preceding row. Repeat alternately the second and third rows, reversing the strap-stitches.

When eight pattern-stripes are worked, leave the last fourteen stitches of the preceding row for the leg, and work two pattern-stripes (four rows), and decrease one stitch in the second and fourth rows on the same side (that of the front opening); for this the stitch is passed over.

After this, work another piece in exactly the opposite direction, for the side, back, and leg of the boot. For this, you must begin with the short rows, and work towards the back. Then join both parts in working the instep—that is, crochet over both parts together five more rows, decreasing in the first and last. Crochet round the under edge of the boot one row of double, and one strap row (both with colored wool); then sew on the sole. Crochet a row of double with colored wool (deep red) round the upper edge and front opening. A red scallop row inside, falling back upon the boot, closes it. This is worked separately, in the following manner: * four chain in the second of these; one double in the first of these; one treble. Repeat from * until the scallop line is long enough. Sew on this trimming first at its straight edge, and then fasten each separate scallop by a raised little knot of filoselle.

Put a woollen cord of crochet over the opening, with tassels at the ends, and cover the opening from the inside with a separately-worked tongue, sewn on underneath. This is worked with white wool, in rows running crosswise; one row is knitted and one purled, so that the side which appears like a plain stocking is uppermost. A row of double-crochet of red wool finishes the upper edge of this part.

LAMP SCREEN IN BRETONNE EMBROIDERY

THIS lamp-screen is about seven and one-third inches long, four and four-fifths inches wide, and of the shape seen in illustration. It is made of gray glacé silk, and embroidered in the Bretonne style, which is a sort of point russe, with different colored purse-silk. The circles of the pattern are worked with gold cord; the vandykes between the same are worked with green silk; the point russe stitches in the inner circle are worked with red and white silk. The four-leaved patterns are worked with gold thread, orange-colored and light-blue purse silk. The screen must be lined with light-green glacé silk, and edged all round with a fringe one inch wide. It is fastened at the top on to a handle covered with colored silk cord; on this handle a cross-bar with a brass clasp is fastened, by means of which the screen is fastened on the handle. At both ends of the cross-bar, fasten two tassels of colored silk.

CHEMISE TRIMMING.

Materials.—Crochet cotton, No. 24; mignardise of the size shown in the illustration; waved braid, and steel crochet hook.

Fig. 1.

A SMALL pointed piece of embroidery fills in the front of the trimming.

The work is begun in the middle. One single, * thirteen chain into the following picot; five chain, two double-treble worked off as in tricot at the top and into one picot below; pass over three picots; two double-treble worked off together, five chain into the fourth picot. Repeat from * until you have worked the requisite length.

For the opposite side, one single into a mignardise picot; * five chain, one double into sixth of opposite chain; one chain, one double into eighth chain of opposite side; five chain; pass over two mignardise picots, one double into the third; two double-treble, and five chain worked between two leaves below form the next leaf; five chain, and two double-treble form the second leaf, passing over three picots, are worked into the fourth. The heading consists of one treble, four chain, passing over a picot of mignardise.

The waved braid is fastened at the point by one single, and three chain; one double; pass over a picot of mignardise; three chain; fasten to next braid point. The work is shown in the full width in Fig. 2.

FLUTED TRIMMING.

BETWEEN the points, rounded out to an inch and a quarter of a straight stripe of stuff, two and three-quarter inches wide, composing the quilted heading of this extremely striking trimming, given in half the proper size; the space from one point to the other is eight and three-quarter inches. The edge of these being finished with a narrow-stitched hem, the straight edge is quilted as for a threefold rose quilting, and stitched down by the upper of the four flutings seen in the illustration. Each point is to be fastened to the stuff with one stitch; the under double fold lies backwards over the fluting. Tassel fringe, of black silk, which is very pretty, and much cheaper than fringe, comes out under the fluted stripe.

FOOT-CUSHION COVERED WITH PLAITED TWINE.

For the plaited covering, plait a three-skeined plait of six strong pieces of twine (each skein consists of two pieces of twine), and plait it together with red wool in the manner seen in Fig. 1. When the plait is sufficiently long, arrange it in coils, keeping them flat, so that the cover has the

CHILDREN'S CLOTHING.

PINAFORES.

CHILDREN'S pinafores may be made in a variety of ways. The simplest mode of forming a girl's pinafore, for any age, is like Fig. 1. It is cut out of a width of fine linen diaper, length should be rather less than the frock, and the width sufficient nearly to encircle it. At the full part of the skirt perhaps a third is left open behind. Some mothers like to make pinafores, for such young children, large enough to cover the frock, and run and fell them together behind. They leave the rest entirely loose, but add little epaulettes, edged with muslin embroidery, and a similar trimming is also added round the neck. These pinafores, instead of being drawn by a string the shoulders shaped by folding it in half, letting it meet down the centre of the back, and lap over a little for a hem; then folding it again in the centre from G to H, and cutting off the slopes from the doubled material, marked at A to B. When opened again it appears as in the diagram. Run and fell it neatly on the shoulders, A to A and B to B. Cut a straight slit from A to J and B to J, on the two sides, and hem it round for the armhole. Hem the top and run a tape in. Sew it at K in the centre, to prevent its being pulled out. Sew on strings at L and L to tie behind. The bottom of the pinafore has a half-inch hem. The

to the neck, are often set in a band there, like Fig. 2. For dress occasions, over silk frocks, these pinafores may be made of fine book-muslin or Swiss muslin, edged with embroidery or lace, but a little shorter than the frocks. For children of four years old they are extremely pretty—at six and eight years they also look well. Either of the pinafores, Fig. 1 or Fig. 2, may be made with a band, by double-gathering the material from E to F, Fig. 1, drawing it to the waist, piping a diaper band, and stitching it on with long ends of double-piped diaper to tie behind. In muslin, the band may be of muslin, with lace round the muslin ends, or they may be of insertion, run with a plaid or colored ribbon which ties. In the latter case, the sleeves are tied up with bows of similar ribbon. These pinafores may also be made of brown Holland or of prints. Fig. 2, made of print, light or dark, suffices for frock and pinafore in one, during summer. Where nicety is studied it may be made in checked white muslin, and worn over a clean tucked white petticoat. To make it, take two breadths of the print, and cut the two alike for back and front, try the pinafore pattern, Fig. 1—the dotted lines marking the front, and two gores inserted between it and the back. The neck at the back should be hollowed, but not be hollowed out to fall quite as low, by an inch, in the centre as the front. Slope the shoulders and leave open places for the arms. Run and tell the breadths together at the sides and on the shoulders. It will be needful to cut a placket hole half the length behind. Hem one side narrow and the other broad. Stitch the broad hem over the narrow where they meet. Set the top in a band, the size of the child's neck. Add epaulettes or little sleeves. If epaulettes only, the undersleeves must be trimmed. Sleeves are best, as children's clothes sit better for being fastened on the arms by ribbons; or, for economy, straps buttoned. A band of black velvet, lined with sarcenet ribbon (to which it is run by both edges), buttoned over, edged with black lace at the end folding over, and fastened by a steel slide and unseen hook, or a pretty button, fastens sleeves well, and lasts long. Lace or crochet, lined with colored ribbon, can be used the same way. (See Fig. 3.)

Pinafores for boys of four and five may be like those of girls, but at six they ought to differ. It can be made in two ways of brown Holland. The first way is to join two widths and cut them like Fig. 1; the piece between the arms in front forming one width, and the two backs, which in Fig. 1 are separate, are united and take the other width. Slope the shoulders, hollow the neck; join the sides and shoulders, leaving open a space for the arms. Hollow this out and pipe it. Before piping, put in the epaulettes, which must be braided and trimmed first. Make three plaits for the front, and pin and afterwards tack them. These plaits must reduce the width of the material sufficiently to make the body the size for the child. These box-plaits, as they are called, are made by running an ordinary tuck, Fig. 4, and opening and spreading it each way afterwards, Fig. 5, bringing the seams B B flat to

A A. Tack the fold down the centre to keep it in place till the pinafore is complete.

The back of the pinafore is managed the same way; but the placket hole must be cut so as to come under the centre plait, and show no join when the pinafore is on. The box-plaits must be stitched down across the waist. Braid the plaits next, if they are to be ornamented. Then braid a neck-band. Set the neck into a band; it can be edged with embroidery or not. Make a deep hem, an inch wide, to the skirt, and, if the body is braided, that should be trimmed to correspond. Make a two-inch wide waistband. Cut two lengths, pipe the first and line with the second. Round the ends. Let them wrap over a little behind, and fasten with a button and buttonhole. Braid the band. Such pinafores as these of brown Holland may be made perfectly plain, only edging the neck and epaulettes with tating or other trimming; or they can be braided with narrow white, black, or scarlet braids, stitched on in patterns. White piqué dresses made this way, and braided, serve as summer frocks; it is also an easy and not an ugly way of making frocks for children. The other method of producing this pattern—and, if a frock is wanted, the best way—is to make the body first and separate in the way already described, and sew it to a two-inch band; the lower edge is best piped. Then make the skirt separately, and much fuller than for the pinafore—that is, three or four yards full. For a boy, plait it all round in large plaits one way, inch and a half deep, and overlaying one another quite half an inch. For a girl, cut a front width, with a gore each side. Fig. 6 is a design for an ornamental bib pinafore for a young child to wear at meal times. Pinafores for boys of eight and girls' princess pinafores will appear in a future number. If a skirt is gored, set the front plain to the waist. The rest of the skirt plait—over the hips in single plaits, each side turning to the front, and behind in box-plaits. About two box-plaits each side behind can be made, or one each side, and one at the centre behind covering the placket hole. The latter is certainly the best, as it agrees with the plaited body.

EMBROIDERED WICKERWORK BASKET.

THIS wicker basket is embroidered on the outside with a diamond pattern in two shades of blue, and maize-colored filoselle in the centre of the diamonds. The second row of diamonds has white silk stitches in the centre. The cover of the basket is embroidered only round the border. It is lined inside with blue silk, and is fitted up with small pockets for the scissors, thimble, thread, etc. The pockets can be ornamented with blue silk ruches, but these are not necessary.

CASE FOR HOLDING SILKS.

THIS convenient little case is made of satin; the outside is quilted and tufted with beads. Casings are run in the inside to contain skeins the shape of an envelope, and is cut from Fig. 2, which shows the sachet open; it is cut on one piece of silk, covered on the outside with cambric muslin, and lined with glazed calico.

of either thread or silk. The edge is covered with a strip of black and red striped satin fourteen inches deep. This strip is lined on the inside, and bound at the bottom with black worsted braid.

SACHET FOR LINGERIES.

(See Engravings, Opposite Page.)

THIS case is made of blue silk; it is twelve inches long, eight or ten inches wide; it has

On the revers of the sachet the word "Lingerie" is embroidered in satin stitch on the muslin, and underneath a garland of forget-me-not, in the manner seen on Fig. 1. The sachet is edged all round with a pouff of blue silk six inches wide, the sewing on of this pouff is covered by a row of blue chenille. It fastens with a button and loop. Fig. 2 shows the inside of the sachet with the revers; the latter is of silk lined with calico, and bound with blue silk ribbon.

Materials.—Cotton No. 20, a piece of fine braid, and small crochet hook.

Take the end of the braid and turn it in a round loop, containing 16 small loops of the braid in the inside; stitch this through with needle and thread.

Take the cotton and crochet hook, make 1 double crochet over this crossing, then 2 chain, and 1 double crochet in every alternate small loop till the last; then work a double crochet in each of the two loops that will be close together. Take out the hook, and draw the loop of the stitch underneath the crossing of the braid, and work 1 double crochet in each of the two small loops that will be close together on the other side; then 4 chain, double crochet into the straight part of the braid, missing one small loop.

Make another loop of braid, and work it in the same manner, then 4 chain, miss a small loop, chain, double crochet in the centre loop of each point. Repeat to the end. Then on this same side work thus in the first loop; 12 double crochet with 4 chain between each 4th stitch; then the centre loop 4 double crochet, 4 chain, 4 double crochet on the straight part of the braid, and repeat, looping the stitch underneath the braid, so that the crossing may appear perfect on the right side.

When the length required is complete, fasten off, join the cotton on to the side, 7 chain, miss a loop of braid, double crochet in next, 7 chain, miss a loop, double crochet in next, 7 chain, double crochet, and in the next loop the same as the first.

DESIGN IN PATCHWORK.

In this design, the pieces of the same shape must be of the same color. The best way to have the sections accurate in shape, is to have miss 1, 1 double crochet in each of the 2 small loops that are close together. Continue this to the end, and work on the other side the same.

This will now form an insertion; or to convert it to a bordering, fasten on the cotton, 13 each separate part cut by a tinman. The papers should then be cut out to these shapes; and finally, the pieces of silk or velvet should be carefully tacked to the papers previously to being neatly sewn together.

SOUPS.

General Directions for Making Soups.—Lean, juicy beef, mutton, and veal, form the basis of all good soups, therefore it is advisable to procure those pieces which afford the richest succulence, and such as are fresh-killed. Stale meat renders them bad, and fat is not so well adapted for making them. The principal art in composing good rich soup, is so to proportion the several ingredients that the flavor of one shall not predominate over another, and that all the articles of which it is composed shall form an agreeable whole. To accomplish this, care must be taken that the roots and herbs are perfectly well cleaned, and that the water is proportioned to the quantity of meat and other ingredients. Generally a quart of water may be allowed to a pound of meat for soups, and half the quantity for gravies. In making soups or gravies, gentle stewing or simmering is incomparably the best. It may be remarked, however, that a really good soup can never be made but in a well-closed vessel, although, perhaps, greater wholesomeness is obtained by an occasional exposure to the air. Soups will, in general, take from three to six hours doing, and are much better prepared the day before they are wanted. When the soup is cold, the fat may be much more easily and completely removed; and when it is poured off, care must be taken not to disturb the settlings at the bottom of the vessel, which are so fine that they will escape through a sieve. The best strainer is a sort of open cloth, or sieve, and if the soup is strained while it is hot, let the cloth be previously soaked in cold water. Clear soups must be perfectly transparent, and thickened soups about the consistence of cream. To thicken and give body to soups and gravies, potato-mucilage, arrowroot, bread-rasplings, isinglass, flour and butter, barley, rice, or oatmeal, in a little water rubbed well together, are used. A piece of boiled beef pounded to a pulp, with a bit of butter and flour, and rubbed through a sieve, and gradually incorporated with the soup, will be found an excellent addition. When the soup appears to be too thin or too weak, the cover of the boiler should be taken off, and the contents allowed to boil till some of the watery parts have evaporated; or some of the thickening materials, above mentioned, should be added. When soups and gravies are kept from day to day in hot weather, they should be warmed up every day, and put into fresh scalded pans or tureens, and placed in a cool cellar. In temperate weather, every other day may be sufficient.

Various Herbs and Vegetables are required for the purpose of making soups and gravies. Of these the principal are—Scotch barley, pearl barley, wheat flour, oatmeal, bread-rasplings, peas, beans, rice, vermicelli, macaroni, isinglass, potato-mucilage, mushroom or mushroom ketchup, parsnips, carrots, beet-root, turnips, garlic, and onions. Sliced onions, fried with butter and flour till they are browned, and then rubbed through a sieve, are excellent to heighten the color and flavor of brown soups and sauces, and form the basis of many of the fine relishes furnished by the cook. The older and dryer the onion, the stronger will be its flavor. Celery or celery-seed pounded. The latter, though equally strong, does not impart the delicate sweetness of the fresh vegetable; and when used as a substitute, its flavor should be corrected by the addition of a bit of sugar. Cress-seed, parsley, common thyme, lemon thyme, orange thyme, knotted marjoram, sage, mint, winter savory, and basil. As fresh green basil is seldom to be procured, and its fine flavor is soon lost, the best way of preserving the extract is by pouring wine on the fresh leaves.

For the Seasoning of Soups.—Bay-leaves, tomato, tarragon, allspice, cinnamon, ginger, nutmeg, clove, mace, black and white pepper, essence of anchovy, lemon-peel and juice, and Seville orange-juice, are all taken. The latter imparts a finer flavor than the lemon, and the acid is much milder. These materials, with wine, mushroom ketchup, tomato sauce, combined in various proportions, are, with other ingredients, manipulated into an almost endless variety of excellent soups and gravies. Soups, which are intended to constitute the principal part of a meal, certainly ought not to be flavored like sauces, which are only designed to give a relish to some particular dish.

MISCELLANEOUS COOKING.

Botted Salmon.—Six ounces of salt to each gallon of water, sufficient water to cover the fish. Scale and clean the fish, and be particular that no blood is left inside; lay it in the fish-kettle with sufficient cold water to cover it, adding salt in the above proportion. Bring it quickly to a boil, take off all the scum, and let it simmer gently till the fish is done, which will be when the meat separates easily from the bone. Experience alone can teach the cook to fix the time for boiling fish; but it is especially to be remembered that it should never be underdressed, as then nothing is more unwholesome. Neither let it remain in the kettle, after it is sufficiently cooked, as that would render it insipid, watery, and colorless. Drain it, and if not wanted for a few minutes, keep it warm by means of warm cloths laid over it. Serve on a hot napkin, garnish with cut lemon and parsley, and send lobster sauce and plain melted butter to table with it.

Pickled Salmon.—Salmon, half an ounce of whole pepper, half an ounce of whole allspice, one teaspoonful of salt, two bay-leaves, equal quantities of vinegar and the liquor in which the fish was boiled. After the fish comes from table, lay it in a nice dish with a cover to it, as it should be excluded from the air, and take away the bone; boil the liquor and vinegar with the other ingredients for ten minutes, and let it stand to get cold; pour it over the salmon, and in twelve hours this will be fit for the table.

Melted Butter.—A quarter of a pound of butter, a dessertspoonful of flour, one wineglassful of water, salt to taste. Cut the butter up into small pieces, put it in a saucepan, dredge over the flour, and add the water and a seasoning of salt; stir it one way constantly till the whole of the ingredients are melted and thoroughly blended. Let it just boil, when it is ready to serve. If the butter is to be melted with cream, use the same quantity as of water, but omit the flour; keep stirring it, but do not allow it to boil.

Melted Butter, More Economical.—Two ounces of butter, one dessertspoonful of flour, salt to taste, half a pint of water. Mix the flour and water to a smooth batter, which put into a saucepan. Add the butter and a seasoning of salt, keep stirring one way till all the ingredients are melted and perfectly smooth; let the whole boil for a minute or two, and serve.

Horseradish Sauce, to Serve with Roast Beef.—Four tablespoonfuls of grated horseradish, one teaspoonful of pounded sugar, one teaspoonful of salt, half a teaspoonful of pepper, two teaspoonfuls of made mustard, vinegar. Grate the horseradish, and mix it well with the sugar, salt, pepper, and mustard; moisten it with sufficient vinegar to give it the consistency of cream, and serve in a tureen; three or four tablespoonfuls of cream added to the above very much improves the appearance and flavor of this sauce. To heat it to serve with hot roast beef, put it in a bain-marie or a jar, which place in a saucepan of boiling water; make it hot, but do not allow it to boil, or it will curdle. This sauce is a great improvement on the old-fashioned way of serving cold-scrapped horseradish with hot roast beef. The mixing of the cold vinegar with the warm gravy cools and spoils everything on the plate. Of course, with cold meat, the sauce should be served cold.

Baked Beef.—Slices of cold roast beef, salt and pepper to taste, one sliced onion, one teaspoonful of minced savory herbs, five or six tablespoonfuls of gravy or sauce of any kind, mashed potatoes. Butter the sides of a deep dish, and spread mashed potatoes over the bottom of it; on this place layers of beef in thin slices (this may be minced if there is not sufficient beef to cut into slices), well seasoned with pepper and salt, and a very little onion and herbs, which should be previously fried of a nice brown; then put another layer of mashed potatoes, and beef, and other ingredients, as before; pour in the gravy or sauce, cover the whole with another layer of potatoes, and bake for half an hour. This may be served in the dish, or turned out.

Baked Beef-Steak Pudding.—Six ounces of flour, two eggs, not quite one pint of milk, salt to taste, one pound and a half of rump-steak, one kidney, pepper and salt. Cut the steaks into nice square pieces, with a small quantity of fat, and the kidney divide into small pieces. Make a batter of flour, eggs, and milk in the above proportion; lay a little of it at the bottom of a pie-dish; then put in the steaks and kidney, which should be well seasoned with pepper and salt, and pour over the remainder of the batter, and bake it for an hour and a half in a brisk but not fierce oven.

ECONOMY DISHES.

To Use Nicely Cold Fowls.—Pick the meat from bones; break the bones, and boil in very little water; stew the meat, gravy, and dressing of the cold fowls together, and add the soup.

Cold Eggs as Egg Balls.—Take the yolks of the eggs, work them to a paste with a little butter; chop the whites as fine as possible, make them in balls or small flat cakes, and brown them in butter.

Cold Beefsteaks.—Make a plain paste, cover a plate, and bake it, put in the meat cut in small bits, put it in the pie, add seasoning to suit, cover and bake; it will bake in twenty minutes.

Cold Fish.—Take any kind of cold fish, pick it up finely, mix it with potatoes, make it in small cakes, and fry it brown.

To Make a Soup of the Bones of Steak.—Boil the bone and fat of beefsteak in very little water, season with onion, pepper, and salt, thicken with very little flour, add potatoes, bread, or any vegetable desired. Bones from two slices make a good soup for a small family. The bone, if left on the steak, wastes butter, and the fat burns in the fire.

Cold Veal.—Either make a pie, a stew, or a fricassee; it is very nice cold, when it is fit to put on the table; but the broken bits can be used to advantage in either of the above dishes.

Cold, Fried, or Broiled Ham.—Cut the ham in bits, fry the fat part to a crisp, stir in the lean bits, and just before dishing, add a few eggs; stir them with the meats, and serve all together; cold bacon and pork can be served in the same manner.

Cold Rice.—When rice is left cold, mould it in small cups, filling each cup half full, or less, according to the amount of rice; the next day turn the moulds bottom side up in a deep dish, and pour over them a boiled custard; serve cold; or use it in making puddings; it can be used also in griddle cakes and soups.

Broken Cake Puddings.—Soak the cake in domestic wine, and serve with cold custard: heavy cake can be used in the same manner.

Heavy Plum Cake Pudding.—Soak in milk, add soda and cream of tartar, and bake or boil as pudding.

Bread Balls.—These are made of soaked bread and egg, seasoned with salt and pepper.

Fried Bread.—Dip the bread in egg, and fry slowly until nicely browned; serve with ham or port. Children are usually fond of fried bread, and if not too oily it is an excellent dish for them.

CAKES, PUDDINGS, ETC.

Savory Cake.—The weight of four eggs in pounded loaf-sugar, the weight of seven in flour, a little grated lemon-rind, or essence of almonds, or orange-flower water. Break the seven eggs, putting the yolks into one basin and the whites into another. Whisk the former, and mix with them the sugar, the grated lemon-rind, or any other flavoring to taste; beat them well together, and add the whites of the eggs, whisked to a froth. Put in the flour by degrees, continuing to beat the mixture for a quarter of an hour, butter a mould, pour in the cake, and bake it from one hour and a quarter to one hour and a half. This is a very nice cake for dessert, and may be iced for a supper-table, or cut into slices and spread with jam, which converts it into sandwiches.

Lemon Cake.—Ten eggs, three tablespoonfuls of orange-flower water, three-quarters of a pound of pounded loaf-sugar, one lemon, three-quarters of a pound of flour. Separate the whites from the yolks of the eggs; whisk the former to a stiff froth; add the orange-flower water, the sugar, grated lemon-rind, and mix these ingredients well together. Then beat the yolks of the eggs, and add them, with the lemon-juice, to the whites, etc.; dredge in the flour gradually, keep beating the mixture well, put it into a buttered mould, and bake the cake about an hour, or rather longer. The addition of a little butter, beaten to a cream, we think, would improve this cake.

Honey Cake.—Half a cup of sugar, one cup of rich sour cream, two cups of flour, half a teaspoonful of carbonate of soda, honey to taste. Mix the sugar and cream together; dredge in the flour, with as much honey as will flavor the mixture nicely; stir it well, that all the ingredients may be thoroughly mixed; add the carbonate of soda, and beat the cake well for another five minutes; put it into a buttered tin, bake it from half an hour to three-quarters of an hour, and let it be eaten warm.

Macaroons.—Half a pound of sweet almonds, half a pound of sifted loaf-sugar, the whites of three eggs, wafer-paper. Blanch, skin, and dry the almonds, and pound them well with a little orange-flower water or plain water; then add to them the sifted sugar and the whites of the eggs, which should be beaten to a stiff froth, and mix all the ingredients well together. When the paste looks soft, drop it at equal distances from a biscuit-syringe on to sheets of wafer-paper; put a strip of almond on the top of each, strew some sugar over, and bake the macaroons in rather a slow oven, of a light brown color. When hard and set, they are done, and must not be allowed to get very brown, as that would spoil their appearance. If the cakes, when baked, appear heavy, add a little more white of egg, but let this always be well whisked before it is added to the other ingredients. We have given a receipt for making these cakes, but we think it almost or quite as economical to purchase such articles as these at a good confectioner's.

Lemon Sponge.—Two ounces of isinglass, one pint and three-quarters of water, three-quarters of a pound of pounded sugar, the juice of five lemons, the rind of one, the whites of three eggs. Dissolve the isinglass in the water, strain it into a saucepan, and add the sugar, lemon-rind, and juice. Boil the whole from ten to fifteen minutes; strain it again, and let it stand till it is cold and begins to stiffen. Beat the whites of the eggs, put them to it, and whisk the mixture till it is quite white; put it into a mould which has been previously wetted, and let it remain until perfectly set; then turn it out, and garnish it according to taste.

Bolled Raisin Pudding.—One pound of flour, half a pound of stoned raisins, half a pound of chopped suet, half a saltspoonful of salt, milk. After having stoned the raisins and chopped the suet finely, mix them with the flour, add the salt, and when these dry ingredients are thoroughly mixed, moisten the pudding with sufficient milk to make it into rather a stiff paste. Tie it up in a floured cloth, put it into boiling water, and boil for four hours; serve with sifted sugar. This pudding may also be made in a long shape, the same as a rolled jam-pudding, and will then not require so long boiling—two hours and a half would then be quite sufficient.

Apple Snowballs.—Two teacupfuls of rice, apples, moist sugar, cloves. Boil the rice in milk until three-parts done; then strain it off, and pare and core the apples without dividing them. Put a small quantity of sugar and a clove into each apple, put the rice round them, and tie each ball separately in a cloth. Boil until the apples are tender; then take them up, remove the cloths, and serve.

Tartlets.—Puff-paste, the white of an egg, pounded sugar. Roll some good puff-paste out thin, and cut it into two inch and a half squares; brush each square over with the white of an egg, then fold down the corners, so that they all meet in the middle of each piece of paste; slightly press the two pieces together, brush them over with the egg, sift over sugar, and bake in a nice quick oven for about a quarter of an hour. When they are done, make a little hole in the middle of the paste, and fill it up with apricot jam, marmalade, or red currant jelly. Pile them high in the centre of a dish, on a napkin, and garnish with the same preserve the tartlets are filled with.

Paradise Pudding.—Three eggs, three apples, a quarter of a pound of bread-crumbs, three ounces of sugar, three ounces of currants, salt and grated nutmeg to taste, the rind of half a lemon, half a wine-glassful of brandy. Pare, core, and mince the apples into small pieces, and mix them with the other dry ingredients; beat up the eggs, moisten the mixture with these, and beat it well; stir in the brandy, and put the pudding into a buttered mould; tie it down with a cloth, boil for one hour and a half, and serve with sweet sauce.

CONTRIBUTED RECIPES.

THE following receipts were contributed by a lady of Wisconsin:—

Boston Pudding.—Four eggs, three cups of sugar, one of cream, one of butter, one of buttermilk, one teaspoonful of soda, and four cups of flour.

Mush Custard.—One cup of butter, two of mush, three of sugar, and four eggs.

Cream Pie.—Mix one beaten egg, two tablespoonfuls of corn starch (flour will do), two of sugar, a little salt, one spoonful of extract of lemon, and one pint of milk. Bake two crusts separately, boil the custard; when cold, lay it on one crust, and cover with the other.

Rusk.—Three eggs, a teacupful of sugar, one yeast cake, dissolved in half cup each of water and milk; one pint of flour, one teacupful of butter, rubbed up with a pint of flour; then pour the yeast on the latter (butter and flour). After the yeast has risen well, mix and make up the dough well and slowly.

Lemon Pie.—One lemon, four eggs, seven table-spoonfuls of sugar, mixed with the yolks; grate the rind; mix juice, rind, sugar, and yolks together. Beat the whites stiff with sugar, and spread over the top. Bake in good crust; no top crust.

Sally Lunn.—One quart of flour, piece of butter size of egg, three tablespoonfuls of sugar, two eggs, two teacupfuls of milk, two teaspoonfuls of cream of tartar, one of soda, a little salt; stir the cream of tartar, salt, and sugar into flour; add the eggs without beating, the butter melted, and one cup of the milk. Dissolve the soda in the other cup of milk, and stir altogether. Bake in three pans, the size of a breakfast plate, fifteen or twenty minutes.

Apies.—Two cups of sugar, one of butter, four eggs, one teaspoonful of soda, one pint and a half of flour.

Hotch Potch Pickles. (Good Receipt.)—Take two or three boxes of the best mustard or more, according to the quantity of pickles, and add enough pure sweet oil to make a perfectly smooth paste; add a tablespoonful of cinnamon beat fine, one of cloves, one of mace or nutmeg, one of ginger, one of allspice, one of red pepper, one of black pepper, one of celery seed, two ounces of turmeric, horseradish, and onions, if it suits the taste. Put a couple of teacupfuls of sugar, and pour on good vinegar to make it sufficiently thin to pour over the pickles. Put the jar containing the pickles in a vessel of cold water, and let them boil four or five hours. If you wish to make mangoes, use the ingredients mentioned, adding white mustard seed, and pour the vinegar on after the melons are filled. Hotch potch is made of all kinds of vegetables that are ever used for pickles, cut up fine together with more cabbage than anything else.

Scotch Short Bread.—Take one pound of butter, two of flour, half a pound of fine ground sugar, and work all together into a smooth dough. Divide into two cakes, the size of a dinner plate, three-quarters of an inch in thickness; pinch round the edge with the fore-finger and thumb, and prickle on the top with a fork. Ornament with orange-peel, either in form of initials or fancy designs; add a few caraway seeds. Paper a tin, put the cakes on it, and bake to a light crisp brown in a moderate oven.

Homemade Linen Buttons.—Procure wire rings of various sizes at the wireworkers. Cut up odd pieces of fine linen into rounds a quarter of an inch beyond the ring; use two-ply for each button. Insert the ring, and catch up with a loose overcast stitch all round; draw up and fasten tightly at back; then with a fine cotton button-stitch very closely round the button. These homemade buttons wear four times as long as bought ones, and, if carefully made, look equally nice on ladies' undergarments. Mrs. T. P. B.

The question has been asked in connection with the receipt for Hot Cross Buns, what is meant by "half prove them." It means that after having moulded the dough into buns, they must again be put to rise; and when about half risen, or they have become dry on the top, to then brush them with milk and cross them; then to let them rise a little more.

Editors' Table.

THE ENGLISH GOVERNESS IN SIAM.

THERE has been published within a few weeks a volume which is in some respects unique in our language. The government and people of Siam have long excited the interest of the Eastern traveller, and their exports are of considerable importance; yet our information concerning this kingdom of seven million inhabitants is remarkably scanty. Now for the first time we meet with a narrative of personal experience and of the facts gathered in it from the pen of a lady whose official position at the Court of Siam is a guarantee at once of her opportunities for observation and of her fidelity to truth.

"The English Governess at the Siamese Court, being Recollections of Six Years in the Royal Palace at Bangkok," is the title of the book in which Mrs. Leonowens has recorded her experience. It may be divided into two parts: a general description of the people, the manners, and the antiquities of the country, mainly drawn from the accounts of others, and of no great value; and an account of the court life in which she played a part, extremely interesting in itself, and tending to throw great light upon the condition of Siam. It is only with this latter portion that we shall deal. Mrs. Leonowens, then living at Singapore, was invited by the King of Siam—whose name, repeated ad nauseam in her book, is Somdetch P'hra Paramendr Maha Mongkut—to undertake the education of his children. Against the advice of her friends she accepted the dangerous situation, and in March, 1862, steamed up the Gulf of Siam to Bangkok. Her first experience was disheartening. No preparation had been made to receive her, and but for an English family, who took her in for the night, she would have fared badly. After a vexatious delay a house was given her; she entered upon her duties, and for six years she taught in the palace. Her employments were extremely onerous. The king had sixty-seven children and many wives, a number of whom desired to be taught English. But her most exacting taskmaster was the king. He was in every way a singular character. The legitimate heir to the throne, he had been ousted from the succession by the intrigues of a half-brother, and to save his life had entered a Buddhist monastery. Here for twenty-five years he had devoted himself to the learning of his people. He was thoroughly acquainted with the doctrines and history of Buddhism; he was proficient in Sanscrit, Pali, geography, and astronomy; but his pet hobby was English. He believed that he understood the language perfectly; and, in fact, his mastery of it was astonishing, but it was a knowledge of the dictionary rather than of the actual idiom; and his proclamations and addresses, of which many are inserted by the governess, are extremely amusing. One of her functions was to assist the king in English composition; and, as time went on, and he discovered her ability, she became his chief clerk, and obtained great insight into the system of falsehood and intrigue which regulated the diplomacy of Siam. The king's first instructions give a good idea both of her duties and of his own command of English: "I have sixty-seven children. You shall educate them and as many of my wives as may wish to learn English. And I have much correspondence. I have much difficulty for reading and translating French letters, for French are fond of using gloomilydeceiving terms. You must undertake, and you shall make all their murky sentences and gloomily-deceiving propositions clear to me. And furthermore I have by every mail foreign letters, whose writing is not easily read by me. You shall copy on round hand for my readily perusal thereof."

The governess was naturally dismayed at the recital of her multifarious tasks, but determined to make a faithful trial. For awhile she was principally employed in the duties which we should consider belonging to her post. She had English classes every day, chiefly for the children; a few of his majesty's wives came to her for tuition, and she was a favorite with all. She had the best opportunities of observing the workings of polygamy, and her testimony coincides with that of other travellers. The harem is filled with silly and vacant minds. The women have nothing to do but to dress and adorn themselves all day long. The favorite wife, or the favorite half-dozen wives, are well treated; the rest are neglected and insulted. The king was capricious even in his love; only one or two of his great establishments seem to have preserved his constant affection. He was capable of great cruelty to those who displeased him; and his anger was so sudden, and excited by such trifles, that the harem lived in perpetual fear. Soon after the arrival of Mrs. Leonowens a wife, "out of favor," sent in a petition that a court office might be given to her brother. The office she asked for had been bestowed upon another courtier, and, though she was utterly ignorant of the fact, the king flew into a violent passion. She was imprisoned in a Siamese dungeon—a place more wretched than any European jail—she was beaten upon the mouth, and chained to the trestles of her pallet. The governess interceded for her with the prime minister, who, by representing to the king her ignorance of his will, obtained her release.

His majesty was quite fond of his children, and spent a part of every day in playing with them. His affection for the mother regulated his feelings, and the child of the reigning favorite was always preferred. One little daughter, whom the governess mentions with peculiar affection, was left to his care by a much-loved wife, and he poured out upon her all the tenderness of his nature. Fà-ying was the light of the palace, and, when she fell sick with the cholera, her father's affliction was boundless. She died after a brief illness; and in the "Circular" which appeared from the royal printing press, the king commemorates her loveliness and his affection. Soon afterwards the governess was summoned to court; and, after a pompous and absurd ceremony, was invested with a title and estate, as rewards of her "courage and conduct" at the death-bed of the princess. "My estate," she says, "was in the district of Lophaburee and P'hra Batt, and I found afterward that to reach it I must perform a tedious journey overland, through a wild, dense jungle, on the back of an elephant. So, with wise munificence, I left it to my people, tigers, elephants, rhinoceroses, wild boars, armadillos, and monkeys to enjoy unmolested and untaxed."

But space fails us to give our readers more details. They will find in the book itself an abundance of them as interesting and instructive as those we have cited. We must condense the rest into a few words.

The king, after a time, employed Mrs. Leonowens chiefly as his private secretary. He had a mania for composition, and his private printing press was kept constantly at work. His diplomatic correspondence was large, and he resorted, without hesitation, to trickery and lying, the immemorial weapons of the East. To these the governess refused to be a party; and, after several quarrels with the king, finding that her health was suffering under the severity of her labors, she determined to go back to civilized life. Her departure was clamorously mourned by the women of the palace, and his majesty confessed he had lost a faithful and efficient helper.

Fifteen months afterwards he died, and his son, whom the governess had taught for years, succeeded to the throne. The new king sent his old teacher an affectionate letter, which is printed at the beginning of this volume, and which shows that her instruction has not been wasted.

We may return to the volume again; but we leave it now, having been greatly interested by its narrative, and heartily recommending it to our readers.

ARE WE TOO SILENT?

AN English paper tells us that Mr. Thomas Hughes, M. P., the well-known author and statesman, recently gave, at the Workmen's College in London, a familiar, friendly description of things which had struck him during his recent trip to America. He came by way of the St. Lawrence, and said that the Canadians had not impressed him as presenting any marked characteristics to distinguish them from Englishmen. But, "on crossing the border, he was conscious of being among a new people, of which the first peculiarity which struck him was their being remarkably silent. He endeavored to talk at once, but though he found the Americans exceedingly courteous and civil, he at the same time found it extremely difficult to open up a conversation with them. All over the States, contrary to his impression, he had found them a remarkably self-contained, serious, and almost sad people." No doubt, the observations of this friendly observer are correct, and, of course, there will be many ways of accounting for the appearances he mentions, some of them quite profound. We shall venture to present our own view, even at the risk of having it deemed superficial. From the succeeding remarks of Mr. Hughes, it appears that much of his time in this country was spent, as might be supposed, in railway cars; and we fancy it was in these that he formed the impressions of which he speaks. Now, there is no doubt whatever that these long railway journeys do tend to render those engaged in them silent, self-contained, and, at last, "sad." There is no other country in which such long and wearisome journeys by rail are undertaken by so many people as in ours. Almost every one of us is familiar with the aspect of weary resignation which at last settles down upon a car-load of travellers, who have been hurried and shaken for hundreds of miles behind a panting, screaming, restless monster of a locomotive. On the other hand, those who have had experience of the old stage-coaches are aware that there was in them—and doubtless still is where they survive—plenty of cheerfulness and social chat. We dare say that Mr. Hughes, if he had travelled much in that style, would have found his original ideas of American willingness to talk fully realized.

His remarks are evidently meant more as a compliment than otherwise: but, if our practical view of the subject is the correct one, we should rather see in them a hint for self-improvement, at least so far as our deportment in railway travel is concerned. They should incite each of us to make an effort to shake off that frozen rime which is so apt to incrust us in such journeying, and to enter as freely as possible into communication with our fellow-travellers. Instead of burying ourselves in books or in "self-contained" meditation, we should be on the alert to obtain all the information we can from the people who are with us, and the scenes through which we pass. There are some who habitually practise this rule, and with very satisfactory results, gaining useful knowledge which could not be otherwise acquired, and sometimes making desirable acquaintances. A traveller, who returned not long since from a journey to a Mississippi state, gave a suggestive account of the conversational nuggets which he unearthed under the most unpromising surfaces. An exceedingly shabby and plain-looking person, who took a seat beside him, turned out to be a well-informed man, who had made a small fortune by collecting and raffing timber on the upper branches of the great river, and was able to give a highly graphic and entertaining account of that peculiar work. His garb was accounted for by the fact that he had lost his trunk of clothes just before starting on the train, and, having previously sent his money to his family, he came on in his work-day attire to join them. The next partner in our friend's seat was one dismal enough to have added a still darker shade to Mr. Hughes' impressions. A few civil words brought out his history. He had invested all his means in a huge, many-storied hotel in a western town. In one night the whole was destroyed by fire, leaving him penniless. The next day, with the indomitable energy of his class, he had started for his former home in New York, hoping to raise money enough among his friends to rebuild his caravanserai. In an hour or two the whole art and mystery of western hotel-keeping was laid open to our inquiring friend.

Some of our more romantic readers may not care to learn about lumbering operations and western hotels. If they enter into conversation in this way, they would desire that it should be with accomplished men or fascinating ladies—with great authors, for example, or distinguished public characters. Well, these are rare birds everywhere, but they do travel by railway, and, we dare say, would be very apt to speak if spoken to. Of one fact in this way there cannot be much doubt. A few months ago several of our countrymen or countrywomen sat, "serious and almost sad," beside a middle-aged and mild-looking gentleman, of a genial English aspect, who would have been prompt to meet any courteous advances in the way of conversation. Those who did not rouse themselves sufficiently from their travelling gloom to make these advances lost the pleasure of conversing with a highly distinguished member of Parliament, the author of "Tom Brown's School Days," and of other works which are read and admired on both sides of the Atlantic.

EXTRACT FROM A LETTER.

"* * I need not tell you with what eager pleasure your 'Book' is always received. If there could be a better to what is so positively good, I should say your last year had achieved that better. So variously excellent are the illustrations and inducements to all sorts of exercises, whether of needle, brain, or pen; whether in the fine arts of decoration, or the not less important pursuits of a domestic and culinary character. On my word, I don't see what anybody needs, further than your 'Book,' to manufacture skillfully everything, whether of furniture, dress, ornaments, or houses.

"I think, my dear Mrs. Hale, it must be a real pleasure, well earned, to you, to look back on the years, severally passed, in the successful effort to raise the character of women to a loftier place both of thought and execution. No one can carefully read your 'Table' without feeling that, though the magazine is one of 'modes and forms,' it is also devoted to far higher and better efforts, and that dress is simply, with you, an expression of just taste, and not a fit occupation for the time and thoughts of an immortal being. For my part, now that Eugenie has left the throne of fashion, I could wish American women might erect a national standard of taste in dress, suited to our varying climate and exceptional social construction. There are excellent reasons why all street dresses, for instance, should be of the most simple and grave fashion. Any person, in the habit of observation, may connect the elaborate fashions of trimming in the street-wear of ladies with much of the sin and sorrow that are now attributed merely to the effect of low wages with a large class of women. This is a subject too broad to be more than hinted at in a letter, but I think it must often occur sadly to one who looks below the surface."

HOW TO REFORM.

EVERY well-managed family is a perpetual "reform school," in which bad habits are constantly checked, and good principles inculcated, and thus, at last, the youthful inmates are trained to be virtuous and useful members of society. Fourteen years ago the idea occurred to the authorities of Massachusetts of trying the effect of this "family system" in the reformation of neglected and depraved children. The "Girls' Industrial Reform School" was established in 1866. There are five houses, each having accommodations for thirty girls, who are managed and trained as though they were members of a large family. There are no means of confinement used, no high fences, no bars to the doors, and yet only three of the girls, out of a total number of seven hundred and fifty-three, have run away since the school was opened. The average age of those who are sent to the school is about thirteen, and they usually remain between two and three years. During this time they are instructed in the ways of domestic life, so as to qualify them for household service, and also in the elements of education. A large number of the girls who have been thus trained have married, and are doing well; and others are supporting themselves in household labors, in trades, and some even in teaching. The lesson which this school teaches should not be lost on our legislators. It confirms what reflection should have taught, that no reformatory for children can deserve the name which is not based on the household system.

NOTES AND NOTICES.

ARE THE CHINESE AN EDUCATED NATION?—We were told by the late Hon. Anson Burlingame that the Chinese were an educated people, and therefore deserving of our warm sympathy in the Brotherhood of Nations. This idea of universal education in China has been widely diffused in our country, till it seems to be considered a truth. Can a nation be called educated when one-half of the people are kept in total ignorance? The women of China have never, so far as can be ascertained, been permitted the advantages of education. Confucius asserted that women had no souls, and consequently could not be taught wisdom, but were to be the slaves of men. We give a sketch of the present condition of Chinese women, from the letter* of a lady in the M. E. Mission to China:—

"A full-dressed Chinese lady would be something

* From the Heathen Woman's Friend, Boston, Jan. 1871. We should like to insert the whole letter, and advise our readers to obtain it.

for any one of my readers to see. What with her wide-spreading hair, adorned with gold, precious stones, and flowers; her heavy gold ear-rings, with jade-stone pendants; the heavily-embroidered sang of satin, over which, and around the neck, hangs a long string of perfumed beads; the gayly-embroidered red underskirt and pantalets; the tiny feet, in two-inch scarlet satin shoes; the small-formed hands, two or three fingers of which have the very finish of aristocracy, that is, nails an inch or two long, in silver or gold sheaths; the gold or jade bracelets on the wrists; the cheeks and lips painted red, face powdered, eyebrows shaven straight—altogether, the lady before us is very gorgeous in her get-up, and not unhandsome, if I except the poor little feet so wofully misshapen. Such is a lady in China adorned with silk, satin, and jewels, but generally unable to read a word, secluded from the world, married to a man she never saw until bound to him for life unless he choose to set her aside, shut up in small, cheerless rooms, having none of the comforts of our homes. She is the slave of her husband and his immediate relatives. Surely she is an object for our pity and sympathy.

Now a few words as to the large, or unbound-footed woman. At Foo Chow we have a working class that have unbound feet. This class has much more liberty than the lady class. They carry burdens through the streets, plough, plant, reap, and row the boats; in fact, do all sorts of hard work, such work as falls to the stronger sex in our more favored land. Their dress is of the plainest kind, although they dress their hair very elaborately, adorning it with large silver ornaments and gay flowers. They wear silver ear-rings, six, seven, and even eight inches in circumference. Their dress is always of black or blue muslin, never of silk or satin, never of gayer color, excepting one day in her life, her wedding-day, when she may put on the joyful color, scarlet. She may not put on white as an outside garment, even in summer. Her sang, or upper garment, has the same shape as that of the lady. Her pantalets are also of blue or black dyed muslin, and generally do not come below the knee. She wears no stockings, not even the coldest day in winter, and the greater part of the time no shoes. She is, like her lady sister, ignorant and superstitious. She is often the 'beast of burden' in the family. She, too, is the slave of her husband and his family. He may whip her or starve her. He often lounges at home smoking tobacco, or, worse still, opium, while he sends her forth to plough, dig, or carry burdens for him. If so he choose, he may even rent her out to another man, or sell her entirely away."

CONTRAST the following notices with the account of the condition of the slave women in China:—

"FOUNDER'S DAY.—A beautiful custom is in our colleges to devote one day in each year to the honor of its founder, thus paying a grateful tribute to the memory of those who confer benefits upon the country and the world. On the 12th of December, the young ladies of Wells College, Aurora, New York, celebrated their birthday.

"On the walls of the hall was the legend, in evergreens, 'The Power of an Endless Life'; and the rooms were tastefully decorated. The founder, Henry Wells, Esq., was greeted, on entering the hall, with a welcome chorus by the students; and then followed addresses and floral gifts. The Hon. Mr. Sedgwick spoke with great ability, and Mr. Wells returned his thanks in fitting words. The college is flourishing, and though only in the third year of its existence, bids fair to be one of the most useful institutions of learning."

"THERE is a young lady of vast wealth, residing in the vicinity of Union Square, in this city, who employs her leisure and pocket-money in buying cloth, muslin, and calico by the wholesale, and cutting it into garments. She takes her carriage and goes into lanes and by-ways, giving work to needy people; and when finished and liberally paid for, she generally bestows the comfortable garments on those poor men and their wives and children who 'fought and bled' in the late war. None are turned from her door without the help that maketh the heart glad. She is said to be highly accomplished, agreeable, modest, and seeks happiness in doing good to all. She is devoted to her work and a dear relative, and has refused the hand of some of the leading men of the nation."

"DOCTOR FINLEY, late President of McKendree College, after hearing a lady deliver a powerful address in the Illinois Methodist Convention, offered a resolution 'that hereafter, in all our Western universities and colleges, a professorship in the art of persuasion be granted, and a lady be elected to fill it.'"

PAINFUL DIGESTION.

CONSTIPATED bowels is one of the most prolific causes of dyspepsia that we have to deal with, and it is not to be wondered at. Imagine an individual—and there are hundreds of them, both male and female—taking from two to five pounds of solid food per day, and having a passage of the bowels only once or twice in a week to carry off the refuse, and think for a moment what can be the condition of their digestive canal. A little over one-half of that material is taken up and carried into the blood, while the remainder—the refuse—what becomes of it? It collects pound after pound in the rectum, deranging the neighboring organs by the pressure of its accumulated mass; impeding from the same cause the circulation of the blood in the abdominal vessels, and thus occasioning congestions of various kinds; exciting sympathetic irritation between the viscera of the abdomen and pelvis, as well as the brain, heart, and other distant organs; and clogging up and deranging the whole process of digestion, until it is finally taken up by the absorbent vessels and carried off through the skin, lungs, kidneys, and other eliminating organs. This is the way that the greater part of it is gotten rid of, and we would ask if any one's digestive organs could be in a healthy condition when such a state of things is in existence? We should judge not. Stoves do not burn; mills do not run, unless the waste material be removed for its free and unlimited action. Neither will the human machine run unless it be given the same indispensable advantages, for it is just as necessary that the unassimilable portions of the food should be removed, as it is that the nutritive should be absorbed to enhance its natural and healthy action. Whatever, therefore, impedes the contractility of the intestinal canal, whatever alters the structure of its mucous membrane, whatever mechanically obstructs its calibre, or whatever interferes in any way with its operations, induces dyspepsia, and that in proportion to the extent of the mischief.

There are other sources of dyspepsia, direct and indirect, that we must leave out for the want of space. It is an "uncomfortable undertaking" to attempt a description of this disease in a place like this. Volumes might be written of it and hardly do the subject justice, but we have noticed the most important facts, and will commence the treatment.

TREATMENT OF DYSPEPSIA.

In the treatment of dyspepsia, the first, and by far the most important consideration, is the removal of the cause. And, as in nine cases out of ten, this cause is to be directly traced to a continued abuse of the digestive organs, the object is to be accomplished by a systematic regulation of the diet and general habits of the patient, moral as well as physical. This is a point sadly neglected by both physician and patient, and hence the ill-success with which the treatment of the disease is attended.

What people want in general is some medicine that will relieve them of their dyspeptic troubles, and allow them at the same time to go on with the indulgences that have been the cause of it. What physicians want is some preparation by which every care can be annihilated instantaneously, without the trouble of looking up the proper method of treating it. And as long as these indispensables remain undiscovered, just so long, we are afraid, will the horrors of indigestion rack the constitution of our American people. It used to be a favorite remark with Doctor Abernethy, the famous old English surgeon, that no one could be induced to pay due regard to his digestive organs, till death, or the dread of death, was staring him in the face. And, really, there is a great deal of truth in the remark, for people have their dyspepsia, their headaches, their back-aches, their stomach aches, and the thousand aches and pains that accompany the disorder, and suffer no one knows how much; yet they cling to their rich food, their late suppers, their tea, their coffee, and their ruinous indulgences, as though they were the actual necessity of life, and it was impossible to do without them. And the physician who conscientiously tells them that this is the very cause of their troubles, and that it is not medicine, but attention to diet and habits of life that they need, is counted a fool at once, and scoffed at. They do not believe it, and any amount of persuasion will have no more effect than preaching at the wind. Now it is to just such individuals—and the world is full of them—that we direct these little bits of advice. We hope they'll digest it if they can't their food.

In order that any benefit should be derived from the treatment of dyspepsia, it is absolutely necessary that the efforts of the patient himself should be enlisted with those of the physician in the direction towards a cure. Oftentimes this alone, with medicine or advice from no one, will effect a cure. Without it, there's no use doing anything, for it's time and money thrown away.

When a person comes to us with the dyspepsia, we give them to understand right away that it is our privilege as a physician to prescribe for them just what we believe to be for their own best good, and we do so, laying down in plain English whatever rules and directions we deem necessary to assist in carrying out our purpose. If they are not attended to, and the patient gets no better, it's his own fault, and we want nothing more to do with him. If they are attended to, carefully, considerably, and as they should be, and there is no improvement, it's our fault, we acknowledge it, and he is at perfect liberty to "ship" us for some more successful vender of physic at the earliest moment he sees fit.

A physician, however, may be as strict and as circumspect as possible in the directions that he may give his patient, and still, if some judgment be not exercised on the part of the patient in following these directions. no good will accrue. Common sense is requisite for the successful pursuance of any undertaking, and this instance is no exception to the rule. We cannot, however, in a place like this, give more than general hints upon the subject. The most obvious rule in relation to diet is to avoid the use of all substances of difficult digestion, and this, to be practically useful, should embrace an enumeration of the particular substances to be forbidden or allowed. Individual peculiarities render this a difficult undertaking. As a general rule, however, the patient should avoid "all fat, salted, and smoked meats, and those that are tough, from whatever source derived; of the particular kinds of animal food, pork, veal, and domestic ducks and geese are particularly difficult of digestion. The flesh of very young or of very old animals is usually less digestible than that of the same animals in the intermediate stage of life. Fish is generally deemed rather difficult of digestion; and most shell fish, especially clams and lobsters, should be avoided by the dyspeptic. Of substances prepared by the culinary art, pastry, fresh, hot, and heavy bread, puddings, cakes made with butter or fat, fried meats, hard boiled eggs, jellies, soups, gravy, etc. etc., should be avoided. Whatever is pasty, doughy, or disposed to form a tenacious mass with water, resists digestion, because impenetrable by the gastric juice. Sausages and cheese of all kinds are difficult of digestion. Butter, lard, and other fats, when altered by heat, are very injurious to the dyspeptic stomach. Brown sugar, molasses, and honey are apt to induce acidity. Vegetable acids have been found to be very injurious, and the fruits which contain them should be especially avoided.

The list of allowable substances is not plenty. Among those of vegetable origin are wheaten bread, which should always be light, and perfectly free from acid (stale wheat bread is very easy of digestion); crackers made without shortening of any kind; well boiled rice; and Irish potatoes, when they are mealy and well cooked. Some physicians object to the last named article, and the small, waxen, watery potatoes, which are often met with, are certainly difficult of digestion; but when of good quality, they agree well with most dyspeptic stomachs. The sweet potato, when dry and mealy, is often very acceptable, and may always be tried when the patient desires it. Tomatoes are found to agree with many individuals, and prove useful by their laxative properties. The same may be said of perfectly ripe peaches, and berries of the different kinds. Good fresh milk, boiled or unboiled, is usually easily digested, and forms an excellent diet for dyspeptics, especially when stronger animal food is thought hazardous. It forms a good dessert when loosely coagulated by means of rennet, and mixed with refined sugar, nutmeg, and a little sound wine. Small quantities of sweet cream may be taken with propriety, and even agree with some stomachs which most other food offends. Good fresh butter, though condemned by some writers, has, within my own observation, when eaten moderately with bread, rice, potatoes, etc., proved in general perfectly innocent. It should never be used in dyspepsia after having been subjected to any culinary process, as heat has a very injurious effect upon it. Among the meats, tender mutton and beef; and among poultry, the common fowl or turkey is to be preferred. The flesh of wild animals is in general more easily digested than that of the tame. Good venison is, perhaps, the lightest and most digestible of meats. The American pheasant, partridge, and the canvas-back duck, with many of the smaller birds, are admissible. But in eating all sorts of fowl, care should be taken to avoid skin and fat, especially when they are roasted.

There are various other articles of animal food well adapted to dyspeptics, such as oysters, raw or roasted; sweetbread; the liver of calves, terrapins, cooked well without butter; and soft boiled eggs. It is highly necessary that the eggs should not be overdone. Condiments, such as salt, pepper, mustard, horseradish, etc., should be used with moderation. They occasionally prove beneficial by assisting digestion, and as their stimulant effects are chiefly local, they are less dangerous than alcohol; but, like all other stimulants, if abused, they diminish the excitability, and then increase the already existing debility." But perhaps we have lengthened our "hints" upon the subject far enough. We will simply add that about as much depends upon the proper mode of taking food as upon the selection of the substances to be used. Meals should be taken at regular intervals, and three a day are usually sufficient. Care should be taken not to overload the stomach, and for this reason, if nothing else, the patient should eat slow. Light suppers should be taken invariably, and all food thoroughly masticated and mixed with the saliva before it is swallowed. A meal should never be taken immediately after fatiguing exercise, as the stomach participates in the general languor. Liquids of any kind, except in small quantities, should not be taken at meal times, as they dilute the gastric juice and injure its solvent properties. Neither should exercise be taken immediately after a full meal.

And there are general habits that should be attended to. Excesses of all kinds should be avoided. The patient should retire early to bed and rise early, allowing from six to eight hours for sleep, and never permitting either pleasure or business to encroach upon his period of rest.

Personal cleanliness should be rigorously observed, and this, indeed, is an excellent remedial measure in dyspepsia. Relaxation from severe mental labor, and the cares and anxieties of business should be enjoined, as also diversion of the attention from one's self, all of which go a great way towards accomplishing a cure.

There are other points that deserve attention, but we cannot mention them here.

Literary Notices.

From PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

GARSTANG GRANGE. A Novel. By T. Adolphus Trollope, author of "Gemma," etc. Mr. T. Adolphus Trollope has won for himself an enviable reputation as an author of romances of Italian life. But in this volume we find he has varied from his usual habit, and has laid the scene of his story in England. It displays to the best advantage Mr. Trollope's abilities as a story writer: the characters are skilfully drawn, and the interest is intense.

COMSTOCK'S ELOCUTION. A System of Vocal Gymnastics, designed for the Promotion of Health, Cure of Stammering, and Defective Articulation. By Andrew Comstock, M.D. To which is added a collection of gems from the writings of the best authors in prose and verse. Edited and selected by Philip Lawrence, Professor of Elocution and Teacher of Reading and Recitation in the first schools and colleges in Philadelphia. This volume contains exercises in elocution, vocal gymnastics, articulation, pitch, force, time, gesture, reading, and declamation, with postures of the body, arms, head, face, eyes, shoulders, and the lower limbs.

LIFE OF CHARLES DICKENS. By R. Shelton Mackenzie, LL.D. This life of Dickens is meeting with exceeding favor from the public. It has already reached its eleventh edition. It contains personal recollections and anecdotes, letters by "Boz" never before published, and uncollected papers in prose and verse.

THE YELLOW MASK. A Novel. By Wilkie Collins.

SISTER ROSE. A Novel. By Wilkie Collins.

These are two of Collins' earlier novels, which have been reprinted for the benefit of those who wish to obtain his works complete.

THE WIDOW RUGBY'S HUSBAND, A Night at the Ugly Man's, and Other Tales of Alabama. By Johnson J. Hooper, author of "Adventures of Capt. Simon Sugg." This book belongs to "Peterson's Library of Humorous American Works."

From D. APPLETON & Co., New York, through LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

OTHER WORLDS THAN OURS. A Plurality of Worlds Studied under the Light of Recent Scientific Researches. By Richard A. Proctor, B. A., F. R. A. S., author of "Saturn and Its System," etc. Under this somewhat sensational title Mr. Proctor has issued a volume on astronomical subjects, based on a series of essays which, during the past year or two, have been contributed by him to some of the leading English periodicals. Written in a pleasant, semi-popular style, this book not only elucidates its author's own peculiar theories with regard to the subjects upon which it treats, but also places before the reader all the more important researches and discoveries of those engaged with him in endeavoring to fathom the mysteries of the starry heavens. Mr. Proctor is a bold but not rash theorist, and his book cannot fail to awaken interest.

FIFTEEN YEARS. A Picture from the Last Century. By Talvi (Mrs. Thérèse Robinson). A Swedish historical novel, dating back a hundred years or more. It is a story of court life, in which Queen Ulrica, the sister of Frederick the Great of Prussia, figures prominently. The book is well and entertainingly written, and deserves the appreciation of the public.

THE POISON OF ASPES. A Novelette. By Florence Marryatt (Mrs. Ross Church). Florence Marryatt is one of the most entertaining of English lady novelists; and, though her novels are, perhaps, not always entirely unexceptionable in point of morality, they will yet compare favorably with many others which hold a high place in English literature.

WHAT TO READ AND HOW TO READ. By Charles H. Moore, M. D. This volume contains classified lists of choice reading, with appropriate hints and remarks, adapted to the general reader, to subscribers to libraries, and to all persons intending to form collections of books.

From HARPER & BROTHERS, New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS, LIPPINCOTT & Co., and CLAXTON, REMSEN, & HAFELFINGER, Philadelphia:—

MORNING AND EVENING EXERCISES: Selected from the Published and Unpublished Writings of the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher. Edited by Lyman Abbott, author of "Jesus of Nazareth," etc. The editor says of this book that it is "one simply of devotional readings. Heartily accepting that catholic conception of religion of which Mr. Beecher is the most distinguished modern exponent," this volume embraces a wider range of topics than is usually found in devotional literature. The volume comprises morning and evening devotional readings for every day in the year, composed wholly of selections from the published and unpublished writings of Henry Ward Beecher.

LIGHT AT EVENING TIME. A Book of Support and Comfort for the Aged. Edited by John Stanford Holme, D. D. This volume consists of beautiful religious and sentimental selections, both in prose and poetry, from various writers. Its editor says of it: "It contains such religious truth as is adapted to the wants of the aged, and is printed in such type as is best suited to their use. The articles are generally brief, and the work is designed to be a sort of manual to be taken up at odd moments for occasional perusal."

THE ADVENTURES OF A YOUNG NATURALIST. By Lucien Blart. Edited and adapted by Parker Gillmore, author of "All Round the World," etc. A father takes his young son of nine years as his companion on a tour of discovery and adventure through the wilds of Mexico, and this book narrates the events of the journey. It is full of wonderful and exciting incidents, while there are more than one hundred really beautiful engravings in illustration of the narrative. The book is attractively bound in green and gold.

PUSS-CAT MEW, and Other Stories for My Children. By E. H. Knatchbull Hugessen, M. P. All children love fairy stories, and even grown people have been known to spend an idle hour in reading them. The author of these stories originally told them to his children "in the pleasant half-hours before the arrival of their bed-time and the sound of the dressing-bell interrupted" their evening talk. They are amusing and wonderful to a degree that will satisfy any lover of fairy lore.

ON THE TRAIL OF THE WAR. By Alexander Innes Shand, Occasional Correspondent of the London Times. Those interested in the progress of the present European war, the circumstances attending it, the country occupied by the troops, and the prominent persons on both sides engaged in it, will find much information in this volume.

From SHELDON & Co., New York, through CLAXTON, REMSEN, & HAFELFINGER, Philadelphia:—

OUR POETICAL FAVORITES. A Selection from the Best Minor Poems of the English Language. By Asabel C. Kendrick, Professor in the University of Rochester. The compiler of this work has gathered together the choicest poems of the English language, making the volume a beautiful mosaic of poetry and sentiment. All our best known English and American poets are represented in the list of authors. It is just such a book as every person of true refinement and elevated taste must desire to possess, and which will become a favorite companion in many a quiet hour.

THE DESTROYER OF THE SECOND REPUBLIC; being Napoleon the Little. By Victor Hugo. Translated by a Clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, from the nineteenth French edition. If ever a man was earnest in his feelings and their expression, it is Victor Hugo when speaking of the late French Empire and the ex-Emperor. It is written with all the force and power for which Hugo is already so remarkable, and is, in many respects, a singular book. It was originally published in 1852, and, as the preface says, "many of its predictions have been singularly though tardily verified, and we can read in the light of 1870 many prophecies with wonder, which in 1850 would have provoked a smile."

THE SHADOW OF MOLOCH MOUNTAIN. By Jane G. Austin, author of "Cipher," etc. This romance is in some respects superior to "Cipher." It is quite as sensational, and quite as absorbing in its interest, while its characters are better drawn, and its style more equal in its excellence. Mrs. Austin is, however, somewhat morbid in her tendencies, and though her literary abilities have already deservedly won for her a high rank among American writers, she does not belong to that healthy, natural school of authors of whom we have some few in this country, and whom we can unhesitatingly commend.

From DODD & MEAD, New York:—

THE VICTORY OF THE VANQUISHED. A Story of the First Century. By the author of the "Chronicles of the Schonberg-Cotta Family," etc. The author of "Chronicles of the Schonberg-Cotta Family" has created a school of literature of her own, in which, although she has some imitators, she stands undoubtedly at the head. She enters so fully into the spirit of the times and people she describes, that one can scarcely fancy her as living in modern times and looking back upon the past through the medium of history and tradition. The present volume is dated back to the days of Tiberius Cæsar, and the leading characters of the story are German captives of that monarch. She draws a beautiful picture of the early Christians, and their faith and endurance under persecutions and revillings.

From J. B. FORD & Co., New York, through LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

THE CHILDREN'S WEEK: Seven Stories for Seven Days. By R. W. Raymond. Christmas stories, a wonder story, a fairy story, a story of adventure, all amusing, curious, and interesting, quaint and beautiful pictures, bright and attractive cover—what more can we desire in a juvenile book? The first, "Father's Christmas Story," is exceedingly odd and entertaining. It is an account of the doings of the toys in a toy-shop on Christmas and New-Years' eves.

From CHARLES SCRIBNER & Co., New York, through LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

THE BOTTOM OF THE SEA. By L. Sourel. Translated and Edited by Elihu Rich. Scribner's Illustrated Library of Wonders does not contain a more interesting volume than this. Its contents embrace, first, "Submarine Geography," then "The Water of the Ocean," "Submarine Life," "Man and his Work at the Bottom of the Sea," "Gradual Changes of the Bottom of the Sea," "Influence of Life on Variations in the Bed of the Ocean," and other equally interesting topics, which are all treated in full, several chapters being devoted to each topic, and the whole work profusely illustrated.

From S. M. PETTINGILL & Co., New York:—

THE ADVERTISER'S HAND-BOOK—Comprising a Complete List of all Newspapers, Periodicals, and Magazines published in the United States and British Possessions, arranged by counties with the population of counties and towns; separate lists of the daily, religious, and agricultural newspapers, and a history of the newspaper press.

From LEE & SHEPARD, Boston, through TURNER & Co., Philadelphia:—

GOLD AND NAME. By Marie Sophie Schwartz. Translated from the Swedish by Selma Borg and Marie A. Brown. We are only beginning to find out the resources of Swedish literature. Mary Howitt introduced us to Fredrika Bremer, and since then we have had occasional glimpses of the literature of that country. Christine Nilsson, the Swedish songstress, in a letter to Miss Selma Borg, the translator of this work, speaks of "the magnificent works of Madame Schwartz," and congratulates her for having chosen "to introduce to the American public a writer who has contributed to make the glory" of Sweden. The story gives us an insight into Swedish life, manners, and modes of thinking.

ARTHUR BROWN, the Young Captain. By Rev. Elijah Kellogg, author of "The Elm Island Stories." This is the first of a series to be completed in six volumes, and called "The Pleasant Cove Stories." So well has the public appreciated "The Elm Island Stories" that their author has been encouraged to write again for the entertainment and instruction of his young friends. The aim of the author in this volume is to show that "benefits conferred usually excite gratitude, and sometimes, when the donors have passed away, are repaid, with interest, to their posterity.

THE TONE MASTERS. A Musical Series for Young People. By Charles Barnard, author of "Mozart and Mendelssohn," etc. This is the third book of this series, and selects for its subjects of biography and history Bach and Beethoven. The information this volume contains is put in pleasing form, so that it may prove attractive to its youthful readers.

KATHIE'S THREE WISHES. By Amanda M. Douglas.

KATHIE'S AUNT RUTH. By Amanda M. Douglas.

KATHIE'S SUMMER AT CEDARWOOD.

These are the three first volumes of the "Kathie Stories," by an author who proves herself competent to interest children as well as adults.

From LORING, Boston, through PORTER & COATES, Philadelphia:—

MOTHER GOOSE FOR GROWN FOLKS. By Mrs. A. D. T. Whitney, author of "Faith Gartney's Girlhood," etc. A New, Revised, and Enlarged Edition. As in our childhood we were edified by Mother Goose, so in our maturer years we may study her, and take her deeper meanings to heart. These meanings, as elaborated by Mrs. Whitney, are well worth consideration. Indeed, taking the "lays" of Mother Goose for her texts, Mrs. Whitney has presented her readers with a series of poetic sermons which will profit as well as amuse them.

From HORACE B. FULLER, Boston, through LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

BATTLES AT HOME. By Mary G. Darling. This is a story which has received the commendation of Miss Louisa M. Alcott, and has already found many admirers as it appeared in the pages of "Merry's Museum." It should not be overlooked by those in search of juvenile literature.

From OLIVER DITSON & Co., Boston:—

BAKER'S THEORETICAL AND PRACTICAL HARMONY: with a Treatment of Thorough Bass, the Affinity of Chords, Modulation, and Pedal Point. By B. F. Baker. This volume includes a complete classification of intervals, common chords, discords, diatonic and fundamental harmonies, suspensions, and passing notes. It will be found an invaluable book in the hands of those who wish to perfect themselves in the science of music. It is, perhaps, unnecessary to state that it is not intended as an elementary work in that science, but supposes a certain amount of knowledge on the part of the student.

From NIMS & Co., Troy, New York:—

JOHN-JACK. By Lynde Palmer, author of "Drifting and Steering," etc. This is the fourth of "The Magnet Stories," and is a beautiful story, calculated not only to interest its young readers, but to teach them lessons of nobleness and goodness.

From JAMES VICK, Rochester, New York:—

VICK'S ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE AND FLORAL GUIDE for 1871. We know of no seedsman who issues more elegant catalogues than Mr. Vick.

They are handsomely printed and beautifully illustrated. The catalogue before us has two brilliantly-colored plates of the different varieties of petunias. Mr. Vick is also one of the most liberal and reliable of men, and the seeds and bulbs obtained of him can be depended upon. Several years' experience in dealing with him gives us the opportunity to speak with authority of his ways and of his wares. He does not advertise as large a collection of seeds as some other florists, but his list includes all desirable kinds for the ordinary or even the fancy florist. In the catalogue before us nearly every species of flower is illustrated, so that the purchaser can decide at once as to the desirableness of any unknown sort.

From ROBERTS BROTHERS, Boston:—

PERICLES AND ASPASIA. By Walter Savage Landor. The name of Landor recalls to us a reputation once great, now fallen into singular oblivion. Fifty years ago his name was honored throughout the literary world; and now, after a long forgetfulness, the remembrance of his greatness is returning upon men. "Forester's Life" was published last year, and here we have the most celebrated of his "Imaginary Dialogues," collected in a neat and scholarly reprint. Perhaps no English author is Landor's equal in style. He had drunk so deep at the Attic fountain that no meaner stream would content him. We welcome this volume as an indication of his reviving popularity.

ASPENDALE. By Harriet W. Preston. Miss Preston is known to some of our readers as the translator of several essays of M. Sainte-Beuve. This volume is of a different order. It is a story of two New England women, with a slight plot and characters rather colorless, but nevertheless interesting. The authoress discourses very pleasantly and with much ability of various home authors—Doctor Holmes, Hawthorne, and the leader of New England literature. The book is well written and amusing.

MAX AND MAURICE. By William Busch. From the German by Charles T. Brooks. A boy's book, relating the exploits and mischievous tricks of two little boys, who, after plaguing the neighborhood for many weeks, finally met with a tragic fate. The illustrations are in the broad style of farce, and the catastrophe will doubtless strike terror into all the mischievous boys who read the book at Christmas.

Godey's Arm-Chair.

MARCH, 1871.

OUR ENGRAVINGS.—"Lights and Shadows by the Wayside" is our steel illustration. The title bears a double meaning—one as regards the relative condition of the two figures; the other, with reference to the manner in which they are portrayed. The incident is sufficiently plain to be understood. The ashion-plate is executed in a masterly style of engraving and coloring, and the dresses have a chaste appearance. The twenty-eight engravings on the extension sheet will be found to be useful. The promenade costumes on page 230 are of the very latest styles, and are beautiful in their get-up. Every one knows the usefulness of the articles that we always select for our work-department; it is therefore unnecessary to say more about them.

AMONG the many beautiful specimens of typography that we have received in the shape of periodicals we notice The Proof Sheet and Printer's Circular, of Philadelphia, The Press of Chicago, and Major and Knapp's Illustrated Monthly, New York.

PUBLIC LEDGER ALMANAC, 1871.—Owing to our early issue of the January and February numbers of the Book, this is the first opportunity that we have had of paying our tribute to the enterprise of the publisher of this useful almanac. The 80,000 recipients of this annual gift to the subscribers of the Public Ledger have here a mass of important information, collected for their especial benefit, that will be found of great value in their households as a means of reference. Great care has been taken in the management of the several tables contained in it. The whole work exhibits the character of its publisher, as whatever Mr. Childs undertakes to do, he does with an energy that is remarkable, and with the sole view of benefiting others.

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK for January, 1871, opens with a supplement of gurple netting that seems to be a compound of the Cretan labyrinth and Arachne's web. The illustrations are altogether too numerous to allow any mention, and include one bird, variegated that will be an addition to the catalogue of the natural history society. The work, music, fashion, architecture, health, kitchen, and other departments are all crowded. There is, nevertheless, room found for thrilling stories, and poems, and essays, and dramas, and that other furniture that has made GODEY famous. No work of its kind is superior in any department, and few approximate its completeness.—North American, Philadelphia.

OUR first article in the Book this month has been prepared expressly for the juveniles. Many of our older friends will remember reading it years ago, and we have no doubt will take pleasure in now reading it to their children. We have no recollection of its ever having been illustrated before.

"At a New York fashionable wedding, recently, the gloves of the bridal party cost $160."

We are not surprised at anything in the way of extravagance we hear from New York.

We give the following notice, taken from the Sunday School Times, and written by John S. Hart, L.L.D., Principal of the State Normal School, Trenton, New Jersey:—

"Woman's Record. By Mrs. Sarah Josepha Hale. 918 pp. royal 8vo. New York: Harper & Brothers. A third edition of a work of such magnitude as this, after so short a time from its first appearance, is no slight attestation to its solid value. Mrs. Hale has here done for her sex what Doctor Allibone has done for British and American authors. By long years of patient and persistent labor and research, she has gathered the authentic evidences of what the eminent ones of her own sex, in all ages of the world, have been and have done, and has placed the fruits of her labors in this noble and enduring Record. The volume contains sketches of all distinguished women, from the earliest times down to the year 1868, with portraits of two hundred and thirty, engraved by Lossing & Barritt. The matter is arranged in four parts, or eras, the first coming down to the time of the birth of Jesus Christ; the second, to the year 1500; the third, the year 1850; and the fourth, including persons still living. For each of these parts there is an alphabetical arrangement, making it easy to find what is written about any particular woman, while this convenience is still further consulted by a general index of names at the beginning of the volume. To the head of each period, also, the author has prefixed an Introduction, intended to show some of the general characteristics of the period under review. Mrs. Hale seems to have been raised up for the extreme purpose of making such a work as this, her life-long history having been one continued preparation for it. We may add, it is a noble and worthy monument to her sex. No special plea for the character of woman could have half the weight of this most truthful, conscientious record of what she has done. No better answer could be given to those who would seek for her some special "mission," alien to her native tastes and faculties, than this encyclopedia of almost infinitely diversified feminine work. Mrs. Hale does not alin at the brilliancy and sparkle of some of our women writers. But there is a sobriety of judgment, an earnestness of purpose, a straightforward truthfulness, and a fullness of information, in what she writes, that unconsciously win the reader's assent, and that have made the honored writer a recognized authority in all that pertains to her own sex."

Mrs. ALICE, of the Grand Opera House, New York, is said to possess a pair of diamond ear-rings worth $40,000, which were presented to her by the Emperor of Brazil. Each gem weighs fifteen carats.

We don't believe a word of the above. Don't believe the Emperor of Brazil could be such a fool, and don't believe the ear-rings are worth one-eighth of the money.

DEAR FRIEND GODEY: As the new year has come I feel constrained to renew my subscription for the most excellent counsellor and guide to home happiness, the LADY'S BOOK. This is now my fourteenth year's subscription, and, as I look over the volumes as they stand before me on a choice shelf of my little library, I always feel like greeting them with a kindly smile and patting them fondly for their constancy through so many years. How many quarrels have they helped me through in my home life. Each month seems to be better than the other. Always something new. May its dear and honored editors live long to gladden the hearts and the homes of the women of America; and, in thus bestowing blessings on others, laying up treasures for themselves where true happiness abounds. Please accept our good wishes to you for a happy New-Year.

Yours, with kind regards, MRS. J. C. J.

OUR cashier, a few evenings since, found a pocket-book in the Union Passenger Railroad. He immediately went to the office of the Ledger and advertised it. Next morning, before nine o'clock, a woman made her appearance, described accurately what was in the book, and received her money. She went away praising the Ledger.

What ancient sage was the inventor of dancing? Play-toe.

THE following we copy from the Philadelphia Bulletin. It asks: "Is there no social hero or heroine who will lead a crusade against the absurd abuses into which the custom of making wedding presents has run?" We answer—the crusade was commenced by us fifteen years ago, and we are willing to continue it, and will publish any well-written article on the subject. We may mention here a little pleasantry that took place about a year ago. A bride received a present of a pair of salt cellars, packed in a box of one of our leading jewellers. The recipient, having received so many salt cellars, wished to exchange them for something else. She took them to said jewellers, who not only said that they had not been purchased of him, but that they were not silver, and only washed, and not even plated with silver. On further inquiry they were traced to one of the dollar stores. This is not exactly the abuse we want to correct, for certainly no great amount of money was wasted here, but it shows deception and also how many articles of the same kind were received. We may add that the bountiful giver of the washed salt cellars was a member of a very wealthy family.

"WEDDING PRESENTS.—Is there no social hero or heroine who will lead a crusade against the absurd abuses into which the custom of making wedding presents has run? There is an opening here for some devoted young man or strong-minded woman in which great distinction may be won. For it cannot be denied that the old custom has lost all the delicate aroma of its former sentiment, and has degenerated into a most mercenary and unpoetical system of social black-mail. The system needs to be either abolished or improved upon. As it now exists everybody sees, but nobody confesses its shame, at least when it is applied to Nobody himself or herself.

If the system is abolished, we will have no more pinching of poor purses to put in some second-rate present among the gorgeous displays on the wedding day. We will have no more of the heart-burnings with which more impetuous guests hide their confusion as they see how their humble gifts, which looked so pretty at home, have been crowded into insignificance by the ticketed splendor of their richer neighbors. We will see no more of the snobbish trickery that hires jewelry and plate from the stores, or borrows it from obliging relatives or friends, as we have known it done, to dazzle visitors with its false show. One or two bold reformers have attempted to abolish the systems in their own cases, and have notified their friends that there will be no presents received; and their example is worthy of all praise and imitation. It is nothing better than a species of social black-mail, that bestows wedding presents, 'hoping for something again.' It is a burden, and a nuisance, and a sham, and a pretence, and an absurdity, and an imposition, and a degradation of the rite of matrimony. It may also be several other things, but these will suffice for our present argument.

But if the system is not to be abolished, by all means let it be improved upon. There is room for improvement in several directions. There is the Chinese system, for example. The 'heathen Chinese' sends costly presents of silks, and China, and many precious things to his friend, upon festive occasions, and they are displayed with great pomp and circumstance. But they are never used. They are carefully put away, and when the next wedding day or feast comes off some of these presents are sent, and so they are kept circulating from house to house, very often coming back intact to the original giver. He casts his bread upon the waters, and he finds it after many days. This Chinese plan is a great improvement upon our own. It is not wholly unknown in civilized society, but it is not recognized as a regular conventional practice, as it might be, with great advantage.

A still better improvement would be to reduce the system of wedding presents to a cash basis. There is not only a degree of uncertainty about jewelry and plate, especially since the establishment of 'Dollar Stores,' but the presents are often so injudiciously selected as to be almost wholly worthless, and there are a great many young married couples who have a foolish pride about selling their wedding presents. Why not try the experiment of sending out handsomely-printed wedding checks, with the invitations, to be returned, filled out, before the ceremony? The probability is that much larger sums would be realized, for, if it ruled out poor relations and friends, it would stimulate the richer ones to a generous rivalry, which would be productive of excellent results. A modification of this plan would be to specify in the invitations a limit of value below which no presents will be received, coupled with an announcement that there will be a liberal discount allowed for cash.

These suggestions run in the direction of an improvement upon the present system. If it can only be worked up to its legitimate development, it will explode, upon President Grant's principle that the true way to repeal a bad law is to enforce it in its fullest rigor."

Many persons go to a wedding party more to look at the presents than for any other object. They are all anxiety to get to the sacred apartment where the presents are, and when there they comment upon the generosity of this one and the meanness of another, when, perhaps, the donor of the smallest gift has given more in proportion to his means than he of the costly one. We have been told of a trick played upon a set of these sight-seers by a gentleman of a neighboring city. They rushed to a room to see the presents, and there hung up were the following: An iron pot, a gridiron, a nutmeg grater, a lemon squeezer, a griddle, a pail, shovel and tongs, coal-scuttle, old hat-box, coffee-mill, sieve, wash-tub, etc., each with a card attached with the supposed donors' names. A good rebuke to such pertinent curiosity. Of course, those who saw the presents said nothing, willing that others should also be deceived. Who will aid in this great crusade?

"It is perfectly natural that funny things not set down on the bill should always be occurring on the stage. Thus they had the 'Lady of Lyons' improved the other night at Lafayette, Ind. Beauseant was rude to the proud Pauline; the chivalrous Melnotte rushes to her rescue; and, in the scuffle, poor Claude receives a real blow upon the nose which causes the blood to run in rivulets. Then, in her most dulcet tones, Miss Pauline exclaims: 'I am so glad that this affair has ended without bloodshed.' The audience roars with laughter, and only the smitten Claude does not see the fun."

The risibles were often excited at the Old Chestnut when Manager Warren, who weighed about 300, played Evander in the Grecian's Daughter, who was kept alive while in prison by nutriment received from his daughter. He is supposed to have wasted away to a shadow. In the last scene his arrival was announced by one of the actors, who says: "See where he comes, a spectacle of misery and famine." The laugh came in when old 300 pounds made his appearance.

The best book of the kind published:—

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK.—To say it is the BEST book of the kind published, is no more than it deserves.—Times, Ashland, Ohio.

"FREQUENT bathing in cold water, says a distinguished physician, is almost certain to produce that fearful malady, Bright's disease of the kidneys. He insists that if bathing must be practised daily, limpid water only should be used. What have our cold water bathers to say to this?"

We have long been aware of the fact that excessive cold water bathing, especially in the early morning, was injurious. We have heard persons boast: "I had to break the ice this morning to get my bath." Two men have died within our knowledge of this delightful (?) bathing. Imagine a man leaving his warm bed on a morning, with thermometer at zero, and plunging into ice water. It is not natural. Let ice water bathers take warning in time.

THE music teacher who broke his engagement is called "a tuneless lyre."

ENGLISH NOBILITY GOING TO THE BAR.—An English paper says:—

"The bankruptcy of five English peers during the last few months has raised the question of the propriety of excluding bankrupts from the House of Lords, as they are excluded from the House of Commons."

The most conspicuous of all is, perhaps, Lord Courtney.

"His lordship, son of the Earl of Devon, and heir to the earldom, is reported to have been brought before the Court of Bankruptcy for his last examination. The debts of the noble bankrupt amount to $3,585,000, of which $2,510,000 are secured, and $1,075,000 are unsecured."

A poor chance for the unsecured debts. The secured ones are post obits on the estate.

The next is the Duke of Newcastle:—

"The last report of the proceedings in his case states that the judge expressed himself very severely on the conduct of the duke in not coming before the court for examination, and stated that if this nobleman persisted in his obstinate refusal to appear he would be guilty of an offence which, by the English Bankrupt Act of 1849, had been made a felony, but which by subsequent acts had been lightened to a misdemeanor."

"The creditors of the Duke of Newcastle have rejected the offer of a composition; and the estate will now, in all probability, be wound up in the Court of Bankruptcy. The representatives of the duke, at a meeting held yesterday week, could only offer 4s. in the pound, and the creditors were told that if litigation was continued, the assets would be further reduced by one half. The meeting rejected the offer by a large majority."

Four shillings for twenty is a small amount for a noble duke to offer.

Sir Roger C. D. Tichborne, Baronet, is the next:—

"Adjournments have taken place from time to time in the expectation that the bankrupt would be able to effect an arrangement with his creditors. Another postponement was now ordered till Dec. 7 for a similar purpose. The liabilities are said to be about £35,000."

Only $175,000! What a miserable sum for a baronet. Why, we can fall for more than that in this country.

Baron Mostyn is the next. We have no particulars about him.

No. 5 is the Earl of Winchelsea:—

"The proceedings in bankruptcy against the Earl of Winchelsea, described as of 91 Victoria Street, Westminster, were, on Monday, completed as far as the adjudication is concerned, and the first sitting, for choice of trustee and inspectors was appointed for the 21st inst., at eleven o'clock."

No. 6 is a lord with a long name, almost equal to a Spaniard's:—

"Adjudication was also made against Charles Frederick Ashley Cooper Ponsonby Lord De Mauley, described as of 39 Mount Street, Grosvenor Square, and of Langford, Lechlade, Gloucestershire. His lordship signed a declaration of insolvency on Sept. 29, and now consented to the adjudication. The first meeting was fixed for Oct. 24. The petitioning creditor is Mr. Frederick Yates, of Harley Street, a creditor for £1897."

"The Earl of Orkney has been gazetted bankrupt. His lordship is one of the representative peers of Scotland."

Here are two more—Lord Arthur Clinton and Sir Minto Farquhar, Baronet. Lord A. Clinton was a bad case. We believe he died recently.

We have received from the inventor a 'boot-tree,' called "No. 2 Combined Toe and Instep." It has attachments which will stretch the boot or shoe at any place where it pinches. We think it a good contrivance. N. E. Stiles, Middletown, Conn., we presume, is the person who sent it to us.

Why are good husbands like dough? Because women need them.

ANNUAL FLOWERS.

THERE is nothing that adds so much to the effect of a flower garden as a judicious selection of annuals from seed. The early flowering shrubs have been blooming, the hot weather has destroyed the beauty of your roses; it is then you can appreciate the fragrant Stock or Stock-gilly, the sweet Mignonette, the brilliant beds of double Portulaca, Petunia, and Verbena; that gem of annuals, the Phlox Drummondii, with its varied and brilliant colors; the showy double Zinnia, recently brought to such great perfection, rivaling the Dahlia, in form as well as variety of colors; the exquisite colors of the German Camellia Balsam; and the lovely cerulean blue of the trailing Lobelia, so beautiful, too, for vases and hanging baskets. For running vines and trellises, you can have the new and beautiful Ipomoeas, from Japan; Mandarinas, and Thunbergias. These, with many others we could mention, contribute greatly to the attractiveness of the garden during the summer months. Then again how easy they are to cultivate; and how trifling the expense. For one dollar you can have a package containing the above select varieties (and which we consider indispensable in every garden) forwarded to your address by mail, post paid, with full directions how to cultivate.

THE LAWN.—It is impossible to have a handsome lawn unless proper attention is paid to it. In the first place, the ground must be well prepared for the seed by deep plowing, careful pulverization, and heavy manuring. Sow plentifully of the following mixture of Grass Seeds: Blue Grass, Rye Grass, Herd Grass, and White Clover; then roll with a light roller, and harrowing will be unnecessary. Commence mowing this young grass when six inches high, not too closely, and continue to do so, if with a scythe, every three weeks, but if with a Lawn mower (which is decidedly the best), every eight or ten days. Every other year top dress in autumn with a good coat of manure evenly spread. This is the only way to secure a smooth, velvety, dark-green lawn, one of the most charming objects about a well-kept premises. We prepare a reliable mixture of Lawn Grass Seeds, which will be sent by mail, prepaid, at fifty cents per pound, or by express, at purchaser's expense, at $5 per bushel of fourteen pounds. The seeker after novelties in Seeds, new and rare Plants, Roses, Gladiolus Lilies, Dahlias, and every requisite of the garden, we would refer to Dreer's Garden Calendar for 1871, which will be mailed to all applicants upon the receipt of a postage stamp, with their address.

"MR. CHARLES ALLEN PERKINS, Assistant Secretary of the American Legation at Lisbon, Portugal, was married on the 12th of November, at Lisbon, to Princess Donna Maria Isabel Francisco de Bourbon Bourbon, daughter of her Royal Highness the Infanta of Spain, and a niece of the ex-Queen Donna Isabel II., and the ex-King Francisco de Assis of Spain."

A nice family Mr. P. has married into—that is, if he has to receive as a relative and guest her late Majesty of Spain.

THE following was written by a crusty old bachelor:—

"A smile of request, an assent, and a giggle,
A shake to the train, to the shoulders a wriggle,
A bounce and a slide, a turn and a skip,
A teeter, a back-breaking bend, and a slip—
All that is the graceful, the fairy-like 'dip.'"

THE public singer that "draws" best is a mosquito. What is the greatest want of the age? Want of funds.

PAPER CUTTINGS.

By folding thin sheets of paper together from two to four or five times, every variety of design may be invented and cut out. In colored papers they look extremely pretty; it is not only useful in acquiring a steady and correct hand, but it is an excellent plan for exercising the inventive faculties.

To produce the preceding pattern (Fig. 1), fold a piece of thin paper four times, and the pattern, Fig. 2, may be drawn, which will insure more correctness; but, for practising both the eye and the hand, the better way is to try and do without drawing.

Fig. 2.

When cut out, as Fig. 2, and opened out, it will make the pattern Fig. 1. By cutting out a round hole in the centre, and bending over the ends carefully, it will make a pretty ornament for a candlestick, but for this purpose it should be about one-third larger than the annexed pattern, and in colored paper.

"UNAVAILABLE ASSETS.—The treasury vaults of the United States Government, at Washington, appear to be used as if they belonged to a safe deposit company. According to the schedule lately published, there are in that strong place otto of roses, pearls, diamonds, necklaces, golden nuggets, and old gold, Bank of England notes, bonds, etc."

We beg leave to inform the authorities, and all others who own pearls, that, if they are not continually aired, they will lose their color and depreciate in value.

SPLENDID CHROMOS at less than half the price asked in the stores:—

"ASKING A BLESSING." Painted by Professor Jordan. Size 20¼ by 15¼. Price $3.00.

"Ay; but wait, good wife, a minute;
I have first a word to say:
Do you know what day to-day is?
Mother, 'tis our wedding day!

"Just as now, we sat at supper
When the guests had gone away;
You sat that side, I sat this side,
Forty years ago to-day!

"Then what plans we laid together;
What brave things I meant to do!
Could we dream to-day would find us
At this table—me and you?

"Better so, no doubt—and yet I
Sometimes think—I cannot tell—
Had our boys—ah, yes! I know, dear;
Yes, He doeth all things well.

"Well, we've had our joys and sorrows;
Shared our smiles as well as tears;
And—the best of all—I've had your
Faithful love for forty years!

"Poor we've been, but not forsaken;
Grief we've known, but never shame—

Still we bless Thy Holy Name!"*

AN ELIZABETHAN VILLA.

Drawn expressly for Godey's Lady's Book, by ISAAC H. HOBBS & SON, Architects, 809 and 811 Chestnut Street, formerly 436 Walnut Street, Philadelphia.

SUITABLE for a suburban residence. Built of bricks and pointed or rubble stone it would present a grand effect. The cost would be about $17,000. Good proportion is absolutely required for this style of building, and any change in the forms of our drawings would seriously detract from its beauty. Owners of property should never permit these alterations without consulting the architect who furnished the plan. Our designs are made in perspective, and we adjust all parts by positive ratios.

FIRST STORY.

Blank forms, bills of quantities, and specifications are sent to any address for Two Dollars. They are not filled up for any particular building, but have under their various headings those items which necessarily enter into the construction of a first-class residence, and are, therefore, of great value to builders and carpenters in making their estimates.

Our price is two and a half per cent. for full drawings, specifications, bills of quantities, etc. When constructing our detail drawings of sections, we make them full size, so that no trouble need be ex-

First Story.—A front porch; B vestibule; C hall, 12 feet wide; D parlor, 18 by 38 feet; E library, 19 by 19 feet; F dining-room, 16 by 31 feet; G conservatory; H kitchen, 16 by 18 feet; I scullery, 10 by 16 feet; J back stairway; K pantry; L china closet; M porch.

Second Story.—P bath-room; Q dressing-room; R chambers.

"A KITTY (Me.) youth, who desired to wed the object of his affections, had an interview with her paternal ancestor, in which he stated that, although he had no wealth worth speaking of, yet he was 'chuck full of day's work.' He got the girl."

And we may add—he deserved her.

BOURBON FOLLY.—At the time of the Emperor Napoleon's exile to the island of Elba, among other small means to which the Bourbon king resorted in order to stay up his tottering throne, was the passage of a stringent law that no picture, statue, statuette, figure, or resemblance of "General Bonaparte," as he was called, should be suffered to remain in any place, public or private, among any residents, native or foreign.

Consequently there was a sudden disappearance of everything of the kind, from the bronze statue on the top of the pillar made from cannon taken at Austerlitz, which statue Louis Philippe had the good sense and discretion to restore, to the mere top or thimble-case bearing Napoleon's profile upon its outline. Every house was to be visited and examined, to see that the order was strictly obeyed, and all offending articles were to be seized.

Mr. Wilder, an American residing in Paris, owning a particularly fine and correct bronze statuette of the Emperor, buried it, with other things of the kind, in his cellar. His turn for inspection by the police came. In walked into his counting-room the officer, with his secretary and other attendants, who said, in a pompous and semi-contemptuous tone, "Have you any statue, image, or likeness of any kind, of that man?" "Of what man?" said Mr. Wilder. "You know, sir, very well who is meant," said the officer, impatiently; "that man—that usurper." "What man? what usurper?" said Mr. Wilder. "I am a stranger here." "Why do you keep me? You know whom I mean; that usurper—that Bonaparte, if you will have it," said the officer. "Have you any likeness or representation of him?" "Certainly I have," said Mr. Wilder; and, turning to a clerk, "Gougain, bring me a bag of Napoleons." Then pouring them out on the desk before him, "Here they are, sir." The police official stared. At first he could make no answer; but then said: "That money is not what I want. You can keep that." "Go and tell your master," said Mr. Wilder, "that the whole specie currency of the realm must be called in before he can keep from the eyes of the people the features of the Emperor Napoleon." "You are right," said the officer, now leaving, but continuing aside to his comrades, "It is ridiculous, truly, this business we are on, but the Bourbons cannot see it."

WILL our correspondents be particular in giving Town, County, and State. Don't head your letter Pine Apple Place, Hickory Grove, The Roses, The Pinery, Persimmon Retreat, or any other five names; simply Town, County, and State. Here is a case in point from Appleton's Magazine:—

"One of our contributors writes to us concerning a manuscript which we have received, but dates the letter from 'Roxbury,' without giving the name of the State. There are eight Roxburys in the United States, each of which has a post-office. We have written to Roxbury, Mass., and to Roxbury, N. Y., and from those places our letters have been returned by the postmasters as not called for. Before trying the other six Roxburys, we wait to hear again from our correspondent, who, we hope, will finally be kind enough to send us the name of the State."

THE New York lady correspondent of the St. Louis Republican goes into ecstasies over a flounce eighteen inches deep, a berth, and a handkerchief of the richest old point, for which the price is $2600. The pattern is a wilderness of roses, and buds, and leaves. These seem to lay upon the beautiful groundwork; the petals of the roses fold over each other. But when breathed upon, the whole flower lifts from the lace, and the leaves stir for an instant and then settle into their places again. It is a wonderful piece of lace—and a wonderful price!

THE good work is progressing. A New York letter says: "Fashionists state that the exhibition of bridal presents at weddings has in general ceased."

Here is another:—

"The wife of a manufacturer in an inland town, whose daughter was about to be married, sent notes to her friends requesting that if they intended to make wedding presents of silverware, they would send the money instead, as she was about to visit New York and would prefer to buy the articles herself, 'for it will be so nice to have the things match, you know.'"

CHITCHAT

ON FASHIONS FOR MARCH.

At this intermediate season, but little new in the way of styles is there to chronicle. The suits made for fall and early winter wear, and which the bleak winds of January and February required to be laid aside, are now resumed, and will be worn until the mild breath of April requires a lighter covering. Double tunics are the latest novelty introduced. These are stylish with dresses of two colors, the tunics being of different colors. As modistes have exhausted invention, and can find no new way of looping overskirts, these double tunics promise to be popular.

A model in blue and gray satin may be quoted. The trained skirt is of blue satin. The upper tunic, of silver gray satin, has a long point behind, and two points on the sides, and is bordered with a double flounce of blue and gray satin. The second tunic, of blue satin, forms a bouffant back, with short, round basque in front, and is edged with a double frill. The tunic must always be trimmed with a material different from itself, and like the tunic accompanying it.

For dinner and evening toilette, the court train still continues popular. The newest fancy is to cut the three straight back widths of the skirt half a yard longer than the side widths next them, giving a square train, and trimming the long widths with a plaited flounce, which, extending up the sides to the waist, has the effect of a court train. A skirt of this kind with a corsage pointed in front, the back in a long, slender basque, is very becoming to a stout person. More slender ladies, who delight in ample draperies, prefer the court train over a short skirt. Of the underskirt, but three breadths are of silk, the front and side gores, while the back breadths, covered by the train, are of cambric. The train is trimmed all around, and up to the belt, and is fastened securely to the underskirt at the sides. The underskirt is trimmed with ruffles straight across almost to the belt, and a row of bows extends up the sides.

Contrary to prediction, low corsages are most in favor for evening wear. They are straight around the neck, falling low off the shoulders, instead of the three-quarter square neck with shoulder-straps worn last season. Still, there are many persons who still adhere to the high corsage, which this season is cut down in a deep point, both back and front, and can be filled in with illusion to cover the neck.

For a young lady's evening dress, the following is inexpensive and pretty, and one that, by the aid of a sewing machine, may be readily made at home: The bodice, sleeves, and skirt are of a white book muslin. The skirt is long, and ornamented with ten flounces, three and a half inches deep, cut on the cross. These flounces are bound with colored silk, also on the cross. The silk binding when finished is a quarter of an inch deep on both edges of the flounce, and the flounces are drawn with a fine cord three-quarters of an inch from the top, which forms a pretty heading. These flounces have very little fullness. A high square bodice and tunic of silk, the color of the binding, finishes this pretty dress. The tunic is trimmed with a ruche of satin ribbon, but a frill of the same may be substituted for this if preferred. By pale blondes green should be worn for an evening toilette, as it imparts a rosy tint to the complexion. For blondes of a fresh complexion, blue and mauve; for brunettes, pink, cherry, and maize are the most becoming colors. White is generally considered becoming to all. The double tunic spoken of for house dresses, is predicted for street dresses, the short dress making the effect the same as three skirts.

We will describe a pretty way of making an evening dress for a girl of twelve years of age. A plain tight fitting bodice and skirt, with two narrow flounces of bright colored silk, has over it a bodice and skirt of white muslin, the skirt reaching only to the top of the flounces of the silk skirt. The muslin dress is trimmed round the top of the bodice, the sleeves and bottom of the skirt with a plaited frill of muslin, edged with narrow lace above the frill. At the bottom of the skirt is a bouillon of muslin, with a rouleau of satin at the top and bottom of the bouillon. A similar trimming goes around the top of the bodice above the frill. The two together form a sort of berth. The rouleau, shoulder bows, and sash are all of satin ribbon of the color of the underskirt.

The newest style of wearing the hair for very young ladies is to have it crimped, curled, or plaited, dressed quite low on the neck, and as simply arranged as possible. Narrow bands of ribbon or velvet, with tied bows, are the ornaments most worn. Plaited coronets are very general. For more matured ladies the long elaborately braided chateaulines, separated by a strand of short, airy curls, is the fashionable arrangement of the back hair for full dress. If the forehead is low, the hair is drawn back over a Pompadour roll, and the hair that has become short from much frizzling is curled over a slate pencil, then combed out to look fluffy, and laid back on the roll. For high foreheads, short, drooping curls are retained.

The novelty in opera cloaks is a large paletot of quilted white silk, lined with white cony fur. Violet, blue, and cherry satin linings are also worn in these elegant wraps. A cloak lately worn by a bride to church, when the ceremony was performed had a band of white ostrich feathers for trimming. More available than these, and far less expensive, are large half circles of scarlet opera cloth, elaborately garnished with black chenille thread in a braiding pattern. White opera cloth is suitable for such cloaks, and is imported almost covered with braiding of white and gilt.

Hoods shaped somewhat after the baschlik fashion are of white Cashmere, lined with silk of a becoming color, and edged with crimped fringe. Others are of a color to match the cloak, and are richly braided.

The jewelry most in vogue at present is copied from Oriental and half barbaric models, Moorish and Egyptian designs being held in especial favor. Crescents, exquisitely chased arabesque, hoops within hoops—linking as they clash against each other—Egyptian heads, the Sphinx, swinging columns, and pendants that vibrate constantly, are seen in brooches and eardrops. Brooches are very large, and have usually a fanciful hook at the top, by which means they may be swung as a pendant to a necklace. Earrings are long and broad also, consisting of a horizontal bar or a half moon, to which are attached many pendants that shake by the slightest motion of the wearer. The newest hoop ear-rings are not round but oval. They are formed of several slender hoops, wheels within wheels, becoming gradually smaller to the centre, where the space is filled by a ball of gold or a precious stone. Diamonds are now seldom set in the unmeaning clusters so long worn. More gold is visible in the setting than has been seen of late. Emeralds, coral, and the darkest blue sapphires are associated with diamonds. Enamel is scarcely used at all, as the precious stone is allowed to depend upon its own merits. For ear-rings the solitaire diamond is still preferred to several inferior stones. The setting of solitaires is exceedingly broad and rich, giving the ear-rings the size that fashion requires. Strung pearl sets for brides are in floral patterns, with pendants. The most stylish arrangement of pearls for general use is in dead Roman gold, in massive looking blocks studded with pearls. The most useful sets of jewelry are those made entirely of gold. They can be worn on all occasions, both for day and evening. The pale yellow gold, known as Roman and Etruscan; the red gold, with copper alloy; and the picked gold, a bright yellow, with frost-like decorations, are used for these sets. The designs are artistic and beautiful, and most varied. Long pendants are the most used for earrings for round faces, hoops and balls for slender faces. Turquoise blue enamel on gold is the favorite enamel at present. The designs are similar to those of plain gold sets, but they are colored pale blue. They are exceedingly becoming to blondes, Coral and turquoises are much worn. The former is associated with diamonds, the latter with pearls. There is not, however, a marked partiality for any particular stone, as there was a year or two since for amethysts. A necklace and pendant has come to be thought almost as important an article of jewelry as a brooch, and is often made to take the place of the latter when a large necktie is worn. The newest gold necklaces are the cable chains, heavy-looking links of pale Roman gold, though they are light enough for comfort. Large crosses are popular for pendants, made of Roman gold to match the necklace. Locketts are large, oval-shaped, and with the centre depressed, the outside being a border of gems. Many pendants are worn that have no receptacle for miniatures, being merely for ornament. The most useful, however, will serve as locket, pendant, and brooch. The opera chain is a novelty in the way of watch-guards. It passes around the neck, and has an adjustable slide by which it may be fastened near the throat or lower down on the breast. One end of the chain is long enough to hang below the belt, and to this the watch is attached, while the other is short, and ends in an ornamental gold tassel. New bracelets are broad, thick, clumsy, and ungraceful, more like manacles than ornaments. An inch and a half is the fashionable width. The bands are of massive gold, with pearl, turquoise, or cameo ornaments. The setting of finger rings also shows increase of size. Oblong, square, the slender marquise, medallion, or sets of almost any unique shape, are preferred to the round sets hitherto worn on ladies' rings. Cameo rings are in special favor; they are mounted with diamonds or pearls. A very pretty ring is a marquise medallion of chrysoprase or sardonyx, with tiny rose diamonds set in flowers on it.

As waterproof costumes are now the acknowledged style for wet weather, a description of one seen will, perhaps, be acceptable to our readers, and next month we will give illustrations of two cloaks to be made of this really desirable cloth. The suit seen was merely composed of one skirt, gored in front, and falling in full folds behind, and cut out in deep scallops, and neatly piped around the bottom; and of a loose jacket, also scalloped out in the same manner round the edge, and buttoned down the front. A turned-down collar with revers, all piped with black silk, forms a nice finish to the jacket; the sleeves are loose and open. This suit is very nice to wear over any skirt, and may even be put on over a dress. A novelty imported from London is a very fine and expensive waterproof cloak. It is made of thin fine rubber, very light and of glossy blackness, covered all over with black taffeta silk. The shape is a long, loose sacque, with sleeves and a hood, and is large enough to envelop the entire figure like a domino.

COMPLIMENTARY NOTICES.

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK for January surpasses in brilliancy all previous efforts. Godey still leads; and though the oldest of its clubs, it exceeds all competitors as much in general excellence and enterprise as it does in years. Now is the time to subscribe and to make up clubs.—Times, Bath, Maine.

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK for January, 1871, comes to us with a clean new face, profusely illustrated, and decidedly improved over former years. GODEY'S has always enjoyed the reputation of being the best ladies' magazine in the country.—Register, Rochelle, Illinois.

We are in receipt of GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK for January, and we can but pronounce it a No. 1 specimen of the "Art Preservative." Its engravings are, indeed, beautiful; its reading matter of the most instructive character. Our friends only need examine its pages to become convinced that their reading rooms are not complete without it.—Tocsin, Urbana, Illinois.

GODEY'S FOR 1871.—During the coming year its old and excellent corps of contributors will continue to furnish its columns with the kind of articles that have made GODEY'S an attractive fireside companion, and which, with the engravings, and fashion plates, and fashion intelligence, have made it one of the popular ladies' magazines of the day.—Journal and Courier, New Haven, Conn.

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK.—The January number is thus early received, and it opens the New Year most gorgeously. The first thing which catches our eye is its handsome new type, then its charming embellishments, and so on until we run the book through.—Herald, Dubuque, Iowa.

Taking this as a specimen for the coming year—and Godey is not accustomed to falter in the way of excelling in his undertakings—we predict for the LADY'S BOOK for 1871 a fully sustained character of excellence unattainable by any other publisher, and congratulate its lady readers on the good fortune which brings its pages into their possession.—Herald, Bronson, Michigan.

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK.—When we examine the numbers of this matchless periodical, monthly, as they are received, we think surely Godey has reached the highest attainable point in his department of literature. Yet, behold! the succeeding number shows that he has climbed still higher. The January number for 1871 surpasses all that have preceded it. It should be in every family, as it is an invaluable assistant to every housewife.—Journal, Delphi, Ind.

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK for January, 1871, is at hand. It is gorgeous, grand. No lady should allow the coming year to go by without forming an acquaintance with Godey. Don't depend on borrowing, but subscribe and preserve your own copies. Husbands, sons, and brothers could make no more fitting holiday present than by presenting a year's subscription of this favorite magazine to their wives, mothers, and sisters.—Valley Echo, Greensville, Pa.

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK for January has been received, and opens the new volume in a brilliant manner. Godey is continually astonishing us with some new enterprise, some additional attraction. The beauty of its typography, its gems of literature, its fund of useful information, its artistic and elegant engravings and fashion plates, cannot be surpassed.—Telegraph, Gloucester, Mass.

The Great American Tea Company

Have Just Received
TWO FULL CARGOES

OF THE

FINEST NEW CROP TEAS.

22,000 HALF CHESTS by Ship Golden State.

12,000 HALF CHESTS by Ship George Shotton.

In addition to these large cargoes of Black and Japan Teas, the Company are constantly receiving large invoices of the finest quality of Green Teas from the Moyune districts of China, which are unrivalled for fineness and delicacy of flavor.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea trade, we will start with the American houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Chinese factors.

1st. The American house in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the richest retired merchants in the country have made their immense fortunes through their houses in China.

2d. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Teas.

3d. The Importer makes a profit of 30 to 50 per cent. in many cases.

4th. On its arrival here it is sold by the cargo, and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 2,000 packages, at an average profit of about 10 per cent.

5th. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea Dealer in lines at a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.

6th. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in lots to suit his trade, at a profit of about 10 per cent.

7th. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 15 to 25 per cent.

8th. The Retailer sells it to the consumer for ALL THE PROFIT HE CAN GET.

When you have added to these eight profits as many brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, and add the original cost of the Tea, it will be perceived what the consumer has to pay. And now we propose to show why we can sell so very much lower than other dealers.

We propose to do away with all these various profits and brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing to our correspondents in China and Japan, one cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on our large sales, will amply pay us.

By our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city.

Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a club, say how much tea or coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, as seen in the Club Order in the next column, and when the club is complete send it to us by mail, and we will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost, so there need be no confusion in their distribution—each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members can divide equitably among themselves.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than $30, had better send Post-Office Drafts or money with their orders, to save the expense of collection by express; but larger orders we will forward by express, to collect on delivery.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary package for Clubs of less than $30.

Parties getting their Teas of us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom House stores to our Warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory, they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

The Company have selected the following kinds from their Stock which they recommend to meet the wants of Clubs. They are sold at Cargo Prices, the same as the Company sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show.

It contains no drugs or other materials in the slightest degree injurious, even to the most delicate system, and can ALWAYS be used with PERFECT SAFETY.

It has long been in constant use by many of our MOST EMINENT PHYSICIANS, who give it their unanimous and unqualified approval.

The following, among many of our best citizens, testify to its WONDERFUL EFFICACY:—

"Having used Dr. Turner's Tic Douloureux or Universal Neuralgia Pill personally—and in numerous instances recommended it to patients suffering with neuralgia—I have found it, WITHOUT AN EXCEPTION, to accomplish ALL the proprietors have claimed.

J. R. DILLINGHAM, Dentist.

DR. T. LARKIN TURNER, BOSTON, MASS.:

"DEAR SIR—I have prescribed the Pills prepared by you, and designed as a specific for the cure of Neuralgia Facialis or Tic Douloureux, during the last fifteen years, to a large number of patients afflicted by that painful and tormenting condition of the nerves which has HITHERTO perplexed and baffled the skill of physicians; and I can assure you—and I do so with great pleasure—that in no instance, as yet, have they failed to relieve the patient immediately, frequently AS BY MAGIC; and after the use of the number contained in from one to four boxes, effectually to remove the malady, much to the delight and astonishment of the sufferers, as invariably expressed.

Very truly yours,

O. O. JOHNSON, M. D.

"Framingham, July 18, 1864."

MR. J. M. STORY, for many years an apothecary in this city, and for three years, during the war, in the Hospital Department under the United States Government, thus speaks of it:—

"I have known Dr. Turner's Tic Douloureux or Universal Neuralgia Pill for twenty years. I have sold and used it personally, and I have never known of a case where it did not give relief. Customers have told me they would not be without it if each pill cost ten dollars. I think it the most reliable and valuable remedy for neuralgia and nervous diseases in the world."

GETTING ON IN THE WORLD.

BY MARION HARLAND.

PART III.

MR. STUYVESANT, on his way to the library, letters and newspapers in hand, was arrested just within the breakfast-room door, by some words spoken at the table he had left, and lingered to listen.

"It is absurd in you to run on so, Guy," Maude had said, scornfully. "And about a girl of that class! Mother, haven't I heard you say that a sister of this Mrs. Wells was once a servant in your employ?"

It was this sentence that caught the attention of the head of the household.

"A sister, or cousin, or something of that kind, was your nurse, my dear, and Guy's also," rejoined Mrs. Stuyvesant, carelessly. "A very faithful creature, too, if I remember aright. I have some recollection, too, of her boasting to me once how well her friends, the Wellses, were getting on. It is really amusing to see how far they have risen above their original level."

Maude, seeing with the corner of her eye that her father was still within hearing, and wishing to shield her brother from harsh rebuke, while she yet made known his folly to one who had authority to declare it must be ended, resumed in a temporizing tone.

"Of course, we understand, Guy, that you are jesting, but don't, please, affect to rave about 'Estelle la belle,' as you call her, to others as you have to us. There are always people foolish enough to take a young man at his word when he indulges in such pleasantry. And I wouldn't, for untold riches, have your name joined, even in the mouth of such, with that of Peter Wells' daughter."

"You know Peter Wells' daughter, then?"

Mr. Stuyvesant came back to the table, and addressed his son abruptly. Mother and sister looked apprehensively at Guy, in nervous expectation of a scene, while the teasing smile of the latter changed to a defiant stare, while he tugged nervously at his waxed moustache.

"I do, sir," he rejoined.

"A mere ball-room acquaintance, my dear," Mrs. Stuyvesant interposed. "Society is so horribly mixed in these days, a young gentleman can hardly consult his own inclination in the selection of associates."

"It is desirable in certain circumstances that he should be guided by other considerations," Mr. Stuyvesant observed, thoughtfully, with no sign of displeasure.

He was a tall, dignified man, with a grave face and high forehead, who never said a foolish thing, and weighed his periods deliberately while uttering them.

"I regard this as a very fortunate discovery, a happy coincidence," he continued. "I have been thinking seriously, for a day or two, of the practicability of making interest in the approaching election with a certain set in which this man Wells is influential. I was told only yesterday that it would be a fine stroke of policy in our party if we could win him over to our views."

"The idea!" exclaimed Maude. "Why, papa, he's as vulgar as vulgar can be. He and his wife sprang from the very dregs of the people!"

"Let that pass for the time." Mr. Stuyvesant waved his hand oratorically. "The man has a sort of power, is, it would seem, an oft-quoted authority, with others of the like stamp, and we would like to turn it to account in our cause. A vulgarian's vote counts at the polls as surely as does a gentleman's. It is possible, Guy, that you can do us good service in this matter. Is the girl presentable?"

"Decidedly!" said Guy.

"So-so!" amended Maude.

"Are you sufficiently well acquainted with her to invite her to accompany you to the opera—say, to-morrow evening?"

"There would be no impropriety in my doing so, sir."

"It isn't likely they would be punctilious in such a case," Maude added, sulkily.

"Call upon her, then, to-day, and offer your escort," the father enjoined in a business-like way. "Nothing tells with these people better than a pretence of social equality. And follow up this civility by others of a similar stamp. I take it," smiling grimly, "that you understand how the thing is managed. If the mother is worth winning, or if she is likely to influence her husband, be polite to her also. Wells has in his employ a large number of mechanics, and has, in the business world, a high reputation for sense and integrity. He is also very liberal in the use of his means in whatever cause he espouses. He is an alderman now, and I have even heard"—another gleam of amusement—"that he could go to the legislature if he would stand. But he peremptorily refuses the nomination."

"He certainly shows sense in that," said Guy. "Although I know legislators whose butchery of the king's English is as vile as his. The wife is quite a different creature. She appears well, and might pass as a lady with those who did not know her antecedents. The girl is pretty and taking, as any man of taste about town will tell you, Maude won't allow it, because she isn't in 'our set,' but nine people out of ten couldn't tell the plated from the real article. The task you impose upon me will, in fact, be anything but burdensome."

He looked intensely diverted; Maude supercilious. Mrs. Stuyvesant observed, quietly:—

"Guy would do anything in reason, as would we all, my dear, to further your interests. It seems odd that your election should depend, in the least degree, upon the class of which we have been speaking, but I am learning not to be surprised at the levelling tendencies of the age."

Peter Wells, returning to his home that night from a called meeting of the Board of Trade, of which he was a prominent member, smiled pleasantly to himself in passing the parlor door. Estelle was singing "like a robin in an apple tree," thought her father, and as he reached the library, where he usually sat after dinner, not to be in the way of "company," he heard a manly voice begin a tenor solo. Mrs. Wells was in the library, ostensibly engaged with a book, but the slight shadow upon her forehead did not escape her husband's eyes.

"Not feeling well to-night, Ellie?" he inquired.

He never called her pet names now-a-days. She had left them behind her with so many other things, it confused him sometimes to think of them.

"I am very well, thank you."

Her manner did not invite confidence, yet Peter had a vague impression that she was there to speak to him, and for no other purpose. He certainly had no suspicion that his next observation was leading straight to the point she wished discussed.

"Charley's in the parlor, I s'pose. I heerd him as I come by the door. I always know his voice. It's a wonderful fine one, to my ear."

"I wish it were not heard here so often," said Mrs. Wells, in extreme dissatisfaction. "I am far from easy about his intimate footing in our family. You recollect I opposed his introduction at the first, but you and Arthur were stubborn. I only hope the mischief caused by this ill-advised step may not be incurable."

Peter's eyes widened, and his jaw dropped slightly. He was far from being a fool, yet the wife said to herself in her petulance that he often contrived to look like one.

"Eh! What is the matter?" he queried, bewildered. "He's one of the steadiest and likeliest boys about town. Arthur will tell you that Charley Burt was one of the main things that kept him from going astray. You needn't be afeerd of him ever."

"I am not thinking of Arthur," returned Mrs. Wells, yet more tartly, "although I never perceived the necessity of his being guided by any one. Still less do I recognize any obligation on our part to the young man you mention. He may be a very estimable person in his way. I have no doubt he is. But I foresee that nothing but evil can result from his frequent visits here, especially now that Arthur's absence in Europe makes it more evident that they are intended for Estelle."

"They don't get along peaceably together, then?" queried Peter, stupidly, a little crestfallen, too, it seemed.

Mrs. Wells fairly lost her patience. "I declare, Peter Wells, you have less discernment than any other man I ever saw! Peaceably! When any one with half an eye can see that he worships her! I wouldn't believe it for a while. He is sensible enough in most respects, and I thought he must perceive for himself how preposterous the thought of such a union was. Since he has not the acuteness or delicacy of perception for which I gave him credit, Estelle's friends must interfere. It is disagreeable, but it is duty."

Peter was chafing his palms uneasily, the crest-fallen look deepening into distress.

"She don't feel to like him, then?" he said, piteously. "Poor boy! poor boy! And I was thinking, jest to-night, how fast he was rising in our business, and how nice it would be all 'round to keep the hull concern in the family, now that your brothers and me is in partnership. I was a-hoping Charley might step into my shoes, some day. You women see further into these things nor men, but I did have a notion that the girl liked him better'n she did any of the other fellows."

"I hope her affections are too well-regulated for that," replied Mrs. Wells, with severity. "I alluded to the subject in a conversation held with her some months since. She comprehends, as well as I do, how much depends upon her advantageous settlement in the world; that a step downward, now, would be a fatal mistake, one to be lamented for a lifetime. Estelle Wells, the only daughter of a millionaire, with her beauty, breeding, and education, may surely look for a higher matrimonial prize than a grocer's son, who has to make his way in life with his own hands and head."

"He's got a head as can do it," interrupted Peter, with sudden boldness. "Ther' ain't sech another in the State. He'd make money fast enough without my help. But that he'll have if he marries my daughter. He's a safe chance, Ellie. I can't tell you what a comfort it's been to me to see this thing working around all right, as I thought. The fast young men of this day are an awful risky set; you hain't no idea how risky and unsettled. It's worse nor murdering a good girl to give her away to one of 'em. I could name a dozen whose fathers are rich enough to give 'em everything they want, who are going to ruin hard as they can drive. The upper tenners, they call themselves. Charley, now, comes of an honest stock, and he's true as steel to the backbone. He couldn't do a mean thing, and his heart's in the right place. We couldn't ask a better husband for our girl—and, as you say, she's all the daughter we've got, and been raised so delicate in every way. I think I'd kill the man as misused her."

"You are talking wildly now, Peter. Gentlemen do not maltreat their wives. My fear with regard to Estelle has always been that she would be persuaded into an imprudent engagement; that she might suffer her heart and imagination to guide her rather than her reason. The hope that has been dearest to me for years is that she will marry well in every sense of the word. I would not be a faithful mother if I sat by passively until she was entangled in a romantic promise to this young Burt, or some other man equally ineligible. I do not prophesy aloud often, but you may believe that I know what I am saying when I predict that she may be Mrs. Guy Stuyvesant, Jr., within the year, if she will."

It was not her habit to speak boastfully, or to confide her aristocratic aspirations to her unsympathizing husband, but the rapture of this thought made her cast aside the garment of discretion she usually wore with regal grace. There was a ring in her voice, a glow in her eyes, that astonished her auditor.

"My goodness!" he said, staring at her. "I didn't know she was acquainted with any of that crew."

"He has paid her marked attention at several parties to which they have been lately, and he has called twice within a month—this morning to invite her to go with him to the opera to-morrow night."

"It is time we was interfering, if that's the way the wind blows," said Peter, seriously. "That would be a bad mess."

"What do you mean?" Mrs. Wells was mystified in her turn.

"That Guy Stuyvesant business," explained Peter. "There isn't a more dissipated fellow about town. I don't listen to half the stories people tell on him, but I know enough to convince me that he isn't fit for a young lady to speak to. And you say he wants to keep company with our Estelle? Not if I know it. I don't like the blood, to begin with."

Irate though she was, Mrs. Wells could not but smile at this climax. The Stuyvesant blood under censure of Peter Wells was an absurdity beyond comparison or rebuke.

"There is no better family in the land, my love," she observed, mildly. "Estelle—any girl—may esteem herself honored by admission to their circle. And I need not remind you, who are generally so charitable and sensible on such subjects, that rumors affecting character are to be received with great caution."

"I thought you despised 'em, root and branch," blurted out Peter of the thick skull and tenacious memory. "I'm sure I've heard you say so, time and again."

"Have you?" indifferently. "We are all subject to become the prey of unreasonable prejudices. I have had occasion to change my mind very often in the course of my life. Circumstances alter cases. But we have wandered from our subject. What I meant to caution you about was this. Since Estelle does not mean to marry this young Burt, it is wrong and cruel to encourage his visits. I must tell her as much to-night, and in decided terms. She is doing him an injury and herself no good by this flirtation. And when he discontinues his calls here, do not question him as to the reason of the change in his habits. Let it pass, and content yourself with being as kind to him in other ways as your generous friendship prompts. I would not stand in the way of his advancement."

"So she has been trifling with him all this time," murmured Peter, squeezing his broad palms together tightly, and applying to them the additional pressure of his powerful knees, holding his hands, as in a vice, between them, while he looked hard at the opposite wall. "I hadn't thought it of her."

"Girls will be girls, papa," Mrs. Wells pitied his discomfiture, the more sincerely for having gained her point. "And customs change with time. Things were very different when we were young."

"You never said a truer word," Peter pronounced, emphatically. Then he "guessed it was bed-time," and went off to his room.

Mrs. Wells did not keep up the pretence of reading when she was left alone. She listened, with a glooming face, to the sounds of music and laughter from the parlor, until at a quarter-past ten she heard Charley Burt's step in the outer hall. He never stayed late. He knew that Mr. Wells believed in early hours, and had an old-fashioned fancy that the master of a house should have the ruling voice in such matters. Mrs. Wells sneered as she thought how the young man sought in this, as in other particulars, to please his old friend.

"He has manoeuvred well, but his day is nearly over," she said. "Even if I liked him, which I do not, this should be so."

Estelle had followed the visitor from the parlor. The library-door was ajar, and Mrs. Wells saw them stand together for a moment under the hall-lamp. A fine-looking couple, she owned unwillingly. Charley's frank, intelligent face beamed with happiness, and what the spy's alarmed senses imagined was the pride of prospective possession in gazing down at the graceful girl, who detained him with an "Oh, let me tell you!" the preface to a merry anecdote. Nor was there less cause for apprehension in Estelle's heightened color and the sinking of her eyes under his steadfast look when the "good-night" was at length spoken.

"You won't forget?" were Estelle's farewell words, spoken lightly, to cover her trifling embarrassment.

"You may depend upon me," and he was gone.

The mother knew that this was true in a much wider sense than he meant to imply; that her husband had but done justice to his favorite when he averred that he was "true as steel," one into whose hands the tenderest parent need not fear to commit his best-loved child. Yet, before Estelle slept, she had her instructions in full respecting the course to be pursued with her two suitors. Mrs. Wells was not a virago, or heartless, and she dealt as gently with the girl as conscience would allow, taking it for granted throughout that the "well-regulated affections" she had trained had never been attracted by her brother's schoolfellow, her father's protégé.

"Charles is an excellent young man," was admitted, with a show of gracious candor. "His genius for mechanics is unquestionable, and there are few draughtsmen who can excel him. When we consider his early opportunities, we cannot withhold from him credit for perseverance and industry. But his antecedents are not only objectionable but ruinous, so far as his connection with our better classes is concerned. He must be content to marry in his own sphere. He has not a relative whom you or I would not blush to introduce to our friends. This seems a cold-blooded way of examining a suitor's claims to special regard; but, when the first flush of romance is over, these circumstances, so little considered in projecting the match, exercise a powerful influence upon wedded happiness. I have great hopes of you, my darling. What have I to live for but the well-being of my children?"

All this time Estelle had remained mute. She sat upon a cushion at her mother's feet, her head resting upon the lady's lap in such a position that the latter could only get a view of her face by bending forward. But, as her jewelled hand caressed her daughter's cheek, she felt that it was wet with tears, and her heart sank. Not with compassion; still less with relenting. Her task was likely to prove more difficult and disagreeable than she had hoped it would be, and the thought hardened her yet more against the presumptuous underling who had wrought the obstacle.

"Your fate is in your hands, Estelle. I have confidence in your sense and right feeling. You will not throw away the work of many years, turn your back upon the prize when it is within your grasp. A little firmness, now—it may be the sacrifice of a girlish whim—and your end is gained. I will speak very honestly to you, my child. Concealment between you and myself was abandoned years ago, has been a thing unknown since the day you came home with a spirit stung to frenzy by your schoolfellow's taunts of your obscure parentage. I can never stand upon sure ground in society."

She crimsoned with shame in saying it, under the sharp smart of wounded self-respect Estelle understood so well.

"I may rebel against the decree that assigns me a second-class place, where I feel that I deserve the first, but this does not change the order of ranks. There will always be people ready and forward to dispute my right to move in line with them, many of whom are, in truth, inferior to me in all except birth and marriage. I used to think that education and native refinement were the 'Open Sesame' to the upper walks of American life. I have found out my mistake. But with you the strife is, or should be, almost over. I want you to think seriously of the importance of this, the crisis of your life, for such I feel it is. I shall not lecture, much less command. My child will not disappoint me. What shall you wear to-morrow night? Are you going with a party?"

"I don't know."

The tone was listless, and Estelle did not move.

"Mr. Stuyvesant, the father, has a handsome box at the opera. I shall never forget how I looked up at it and the party within it, as I would at a throne and the royal family, the first time I ever went to the opera house during my honeymoon."

Mrs. Wells laughed pleasantly at the reminiscence, but Estelle made no response. Then came a silence, broken by the mother's saying in an altered tone, grave to solemnity :—

"It may appear to you a trifle, and one easily bought—this public acknowledgment of yourself as the Stuyvesant's peer. To me it is an era, fraught with deep interest and pride. Let me tell you an incident of my early marriage life which has colored all subsequent years for me."

With the color brightening in her cheek, she related the story of her last visit to Mrs. Stuyvesant's nursery, on the evening of her husband's promotion to the post of foreman in the Mansard machine-works, and the gratuitous insult she had received from the mistress of the mansion.

"I can recall her look and tone, and my cruel mortification, as if all had happened yesterday," she concluded. "It may be a morbid fancy that has since that night set the entrée of that house, the hospitality of its owners, before me as the summit of social ambition. But it means much to any one. Do you wonder at my secret delight in seeing my daughter the chosen intimate of that woman's children?"

Estelle's eyes were dry and bright. She sat upright, her face lifted to her mother's, with a light upon it any parent, whose heart and conscience were not debauched by world-worship, might shudder to see.

"That family seems to have been set for our humiliation, first and last," she said, with a hard, little laugh. "You say truly that such pin-pricks are seldom forgotten. I owe Maude a lesson in politeness—more than one, indeed. And we of the lower orders practise, among other antiquated virtues, that of paying our debts."

In this spirit she arrayed herself for the opera, as Maude Stuyvesant could not have done had the wealth of the East been hers. The fair patrician's best achievement in toilet was to make herself look like a well-rigged lay-figure in a costumer's window. Blood had not imparted the art of carrying off her dress as if it were a part of herself. In this spirit Ellen Wells' daughter met her aristocratic admirer, and was introduced by him to the stately lady who, with her younger son, sat in the curtained alcove, which had belonged for years to the Stuyvesants. In a spirit even less tolerant of patronage she hated herself for the slight heat that touched her forehead, the dash of awe which quickened her pulses in approaching the grande dame of her mother's girlhood; the secret sense of inferiority dampening the pleasure she or any other properly-instructed damsel of that day should have felt at finding herself seated en famille in a post of such honor.

Mrs. Stuyvesant intended to be very polite to the daughter of the mechanic who could control the votes of perhaps two hundred other "vulgarians." But the habits of years are not to be dropped at one effort, although the prize at stake be a husband's seat in Congress. She bowed and met with her gloved fingers those of the elegant young woman presented by her son, in the course of the evening more than once addressed her as "my dear," and all the while contrived to impress Estelle's mind with the idea that the stooping was not accomplished without great exertion, never let her forget for one instant how she had called her mother a "person" twenty-one years before, and ordered her to assist in the labors of her nursery-maid. Guy had more of the true spirit of hospitality, or his reasons for ignoring caste-laws were more weighty, and his prejudices more pliable. His attentions to his fair companion were so assiduous as to move his mother, now and then, to a faint smile of real amusement at what she interpreted as exaggerated obedience to his father's behest; while the nineteen-year-old Edgar—a studious collegian and, his father hoped, embryo statesman—surveyed them with polite surprise. It was not every day, he thought, that Guy took such pains to make himself fascinating. The elder brother was a slender-waisted, blasé man of six-and-twenty, who would have been handsome had his complexion been fresher, his eyes less heavy, and his expression less weary. In mind he was narrow, but university training and habitual association with cultivated intellects helped him to hide his lack of original ideas. He was fluent in small talk; bowed, danced, and walked well; and in art and literature, religion and politics, in everything above his comprehension, affected the nil admirari style. Blended with his other recommendations to popular (feminine) favor was an all-pervading flavor of wickedness. "Very gay," said the prudess in his mother's "circle;" "Delightfully naughty," smiled fast girls. The youths with whom he smoked, drove, betted, and drank dubbed him "knowing." Many a man has achieved a reputation for brilliancy with no more capital. Many more will do the same so long as veneer and varnish bring as high prices as solid timber. Estelle was not imposed upon by this specious display. She knew, while she responded smilingly to his flippancy chit-chat, and listened with a show of interest to his criticism of music and acting, that she was wiser and wittier than he; that she would be ennuyé, or tempted to sarcastic ridicule, were he one degree nearer her own rank. Once she turned from him entirely, feigning not to observe that he was speaking to her, and looked steadfastly at the stage; her cheeks almost as colorless as the camellia in her bouquet, and her eyes dimming with mist she dared not lift her hand to brush away. Guy wondered, lazily, at her sudden interest in scene and singers.

"Everybody knew that old duet by heart."

He was too polite to question her, and she was not likely to tell him, then or ever, how often and how long ago she had sung it with Charley Burt. The thought came to her upon the remembered music like a breath of cool, country air, laden with wildflower scent, through the hot perfumes of the theatre. Charley Burt, as her girlish imagination had loved to contemplate him, before she knew what an ineligious parti he must ever be, before she vexed her young brain with visions of "advantageous settlements." Charley, the Damon to her brother's Pythias, the man whom her father delighted to honor, as did she before she grew so old and worldly-wise. Charley Burt, who never undertook what he was not resolved to perform, and to perform well; who abhorred affectation, spoke truth, and dealt honorably with men, purely and reverently with women; who, as she was near forgetting but last night, must be put out of her dreams and hopes forever, because the blood in his veins was red, new, and healthy, and his father kept a retail grocery. By no stretch of refined phraseology could his business be dignified into "commercial pursuits." No imposing warehouse on land, no ship on sea lent him the prestige of "wholesale" or "importer." He stood all day behind his counter, with a brief linen apron over his out-door suit, and sold tea by the pound, molasses by the quart, doing up bundles of moist brown sugar with his own hands. Estelle had slept little the previous night, and shortly after breakfast had ordered the horses, and driven out upon "some errands of her own." These led her directly through James Street, and she cautioned the coachman to go slowly along the thoroughfare. Thus it was that she obtained a good look at the corner-store, with the faded sign, "CHARLES BURT," over the door; had a glimpse of the proprietor in the dusky interior, holding up a handful of salt herrings, dripping with brine, to tempt a dowdy woman who stood on the other side of the barrel. Charley honored his parents in the olden way that entitles one to expect the blessing of an honorable longevity in his turn, if the Old Testament is to be believed. Honored them too sincerely, loved them too tenderly to be ashamed of them, whatever his position. While he had a home, be it shanty or palace, they would always be frequent and welcome guests. It was a pity, for in himself he was a nobler gentleman than this languid scion of a so-called princely line.

"If I were a princess, I could afford to risk a mésalliance. As it is, his father and mine would together form a millstone weight," mused the girl, with the bitterness impatience lends to sorrow. "We cannot swim if united. Perhaps it may be kinder in me to leave him a chance to rise. It certainly is a friendly act to allow him to be happy in his own way, with a mate of his own contented sort."

The curtain fell, and there was no excuse for reverie in the entr'acte.

"I wonder sometimes what brings most of the people one sees here to an operatic entertainment. They would be better suited at the negro minstrels, or circus," Guy said, surveying the parquette through his glass. "Take that group over there, for example, the two ladies in crimson and azurine, with the very mountainous frizettes, and their attendant squires. They have done nothing but whisper and giggle and stare at their neighbors' dresses since they came in. They are sisters, I judge, from their style. Florid, isn't it? Yet I don't suppose they are knowingly upon exhibition, as burlesques of the mode"—meditatively.

Estelle's laugh was well-bred in its modulations, but not very natural, as she brought her lorgnette to bear upon the party designated, and recognized Fanny Clark and her sister Eloise. For a second she marvelled within herself if Guy's ignorance of their identity was real, or a ruse for her annoyance, such as his sister would not have hesitated to use. A glance at his compressed countenance, as he swept the house with his glass, and a more sensible second thought dispelled the fancy. It would have been more singular had he known the two girls, so many removes below him. He might live in the same city with the Clarks fifty years and never hear their names, much less meet them face to face, unless they chanced to call at her father's house at the same time with himself. Would the like pale of exclusiveness ever protect her from contact with obtrusive vulgarity? She abhorred things low and common with a sensitive disgust begotten of repeated shocks. Such noisy pretension as characterized her cousins could not be more offensive to him than to her. She sat back slightly in the shadow of the curtain, not to be recognized by her objectionable kinspeople. For this impulse let those despise her who have never practised a similar "dodge." There are few of us, I suspect, with whom false shame, pride, expediency—it goes by ail of these names—has not, at some time, gotten the better of natural affection.

Guy nor his mother made any remark upon her change of attitude and tone. That was one of the comforts of association with thorough-breds, Estelle went on to think, during the next act, with a changed spirit: The sight of the Clarks had produced a reaction. Was not her mother right? Was it not better to be in the best circle upon sufferance than to be the leader of the second? Especially as nobody beside herself suspected the existence of the teasing, tingling consciousness of inferiority that hindered her from being quite at ease. This would wear off after a while. It was pleasant to be seen by so many of her acquaintances while she sat with the Stuyvesants, their invited guest; to feel that Guy's show of devotion as he leaned over her chair to murmur the pretty nothings which were his conversational capital, was noted and talked about by dozens of her old schoolfellows and present associates; to see that Sara Stringham, whose escort was a gray-haired widower, an army officer on half-pay, eyed her with ill-concealed envy and open amazement. It did not occur to her that the emotion of gratified vanity which stole through her—a pleasant glow of excitement—was essentially mean and vulgar; that her mother's aspirations and her own were poor and small, unworthy rational beings; that the structure she went on to rear upon this evening's triumph was contemptible in materials and proportions. Guy might be commonplace, even in his dissipation, of which rumors had reached her in past days. He was self-conceited, and had few views or emotions that harmonized with hers. Altogether, had he been plain Smith, Jones, or Jenkins, there were twenty others she would have selected in preference as partners even for one evening. But—she did not hesitate to set this before herself in downright terms—the wedding-ring he would place upon his bride's finger would be a talismanic key to unlock the door she had longed from her babyhood to enter. There was a restfulness, so she persuaded herself, a refined quiet in the atmosphere about her now; something that fitted in so well with her preconceived ideas of perfect ladyhood, in Mrs. Stuyvesant's mellow accents as she spoke with her sons or herself; in the very flow of her drapery and in her manner of leaning back in her easy chair, as of one whom nothing could agitate beyond the bounds of graceful self-possession; in Edgar's grave taciturnity; in Guy's half-drawl and slow ease of motion, which she accepted as presages of the calm, satisfied life she was to lead, should her mother's auguries be correct.

It would be hard to step out of this enchanted sphere; to leave the setting she felt became her so well, for homelier and baser surroundings; for the arena of strife and uncertainty and humiliation her mother had entreated her over night to desert. She loathed the thought of her grandmother's childish recapitulation of her struggles to "bring up her children right," and her self-gratulations over the result of her labors; her father's loud voice and laugh, and his irreparable grammar; Mrs. Clark's intolerable familiarities, her curiosity, and strictures, and advice; Fanny's boisterous good nature, her slang and babble about beaux and fashion and her neighbors' concerns. Within her self-appreciative bosom Peter Wells' daughter said that she was formed for better things, and hoped for the same. Guy's evident admiration of herself was the olive-leaf she plucked off as a stay to her soul, while her tired feet could find no resting-place. Marriage with him meant safe abode among the sheltering branches.

Seeing her distracted, Guy was led to watch her covertly, but closely, and in his turn he became thoughtful. He had always considered her handsome. To-night, in that peculiar shade of blue-gray that resembled nothing else so much as a summer twilight sky, a rare tint that pleased his æsthetic eye; with the soft ermine cloak falling from one well-turned shoulder, and her golden hair unadorned save by a spray of natural hyacinths, the white bells relieved by trailing ribbon-grass, with the faint shade of pensiveness upon her that was a new phase to him, he found her absolutely charming.

"She would grace the head of any man's table," he decided. "Hang it! where did she get her style and Parisian taste? There isn't another woman in the house whose get-up is so faultless. Lively, too! Makes a fine show in conversation, but is never loud. That's queer again! Her father must be worth a million and a half at the lowest computation, and it will all go to these two children. There's a nice nest, elder-lined, for some lucky dog. Why not for me?"

He surveyed his mother—matronly and magnificent—little surmising the mine he was preparing beneath her feet, and pulled his moustache over a mischievous smile.

"There would be no end of a row with the women, I suppose, and the governor would be magisterial and deucedly uncomfortable. The connection isn't the thing, by any means; but a man must be philosophical and accept the drawbacks to his lot with a good grace. It would be an easy matter to cut the parents—when the election is over, that is. There is no hurry. I am canvassing votes for my respected paternal at present. Wouldn't Maude be gracious to her sister-in-law, though? There's the glory of the family name to be maintained, to be sure, but there are six of us to do it, and the coat-of-arms will look the brighter for a little gilding."

Charley Burt and his mother had a long, confidential chat that evening over the fire in their pleasant sitting-room.

"If she were not a rich man's daughter, I would know my fate at once," he said. "As it is, I would not hamper her by a long engagement if it were in my power to do so. But the new prospects my talk with Mr. Wells to-day has opened up to me have made life very bright. They have brought nearer the possibility of my being able to ask her to share my lot; made surer the hope that I may one day offer her a home worthy of her acceptance; a home bought by my own labor. I could never look her father in the face were I to consent to owe home and the means of providing for those I love to the bounty of any man, even one so generous as is Mr. Wells. His manner to-day moved me strangely, it was so full of delicacy and feeling. He is a model of gentleness and strength; a very Titan in heart. It is easy to see why his daughter's nature should be so sound and sweet as to resist the corrosion of a fashionable education, and the more dangerous teachings of an ambitious, worldly mother."

OVER THE BAY.

BY CARRIE D. BEEBE.

Oh, humble was my early home!
And ne'er, in childhood's hours,
Did I o'er grassy meadows roam,
Or gather wildwood flowers.
Within a city's dingy walls,
An attic drear and high,
Far, far removed from fashion's haunts,
Received my earliest sigh.
And north and south the dusky street
Stretched, curving, far away,
And eastward stood a ruined house—
Beyond it swept the bay.

Ah, they who, reared 'mid fairer scenes—
The mountain, meadow, grove—
Bask in a world of beauty bright,
Can never know the love
With which, when the fair morning dawned,
I looked me far away
To where the tall ships, motionless,
Lay anchored in the bay.
When, o'er earth, and air, and sea,
Stern Winter held his sway,
On rosy morns I watched with glee
The sun rise o'er the bay.

The years have passed, and o'er my path
Waves Fortune's golden wand;
And love and friendship now are mine,
And wealth of sea and land.
I sit amid the bloom and breath
Of summer's fairest flowers;
The south wind, with a soft, low voice,
Sweeps through the fragrant bowers:
But mid the bloom I close my eyes,
And my heart turns away
To where the tall ships, motionless,
Lie anchored in the bay.

Oh, childhood's scenes are ever dear,
And yet, though far away,
I see those golden, sunrise beams
Fall, slanting, o'er the bay.
And still it always seems to me
If my worn spirit rise
When death's still hour shall set it free
Beyond the far blue skies—
(For childish fancies o'er our lives
Will o'er exert their sway)—
My soul shall walk those golden bars
To Heaven from o'er the bay.

Do not allow Idleness to deceive you, for while you give him to-day he steals to-morrow from you.—Crouquill.

ABUSE OF AMUSEMENT.—The habit of dissipating every serious thought by a succession of agreeable sensations is as fatal to happiness as virtue; for when amusement is unhappily substituted for objects of moral and mental interest, we lose all that elevates our enjoyments above the scale of childish pleasures.

FROM A DISTANCE.

It is one of those common remarks which everyone makes for the hundredth time as glibly as if fresh out to-day, "How different things look at a distance from what they are when close at hand!" And most people add, "How much more beautiful they are in general, losing their charm in proportion as we come nearer to them and see them clearer." To be sure, certain details are lovelier the more narrowly we examine them; but, for the most part, things get a rich and mellowed grace by distance, and especially they gain a certain sense of mystery which gives room wherein the imagination may expatiate at its pleasure; and imagination and distance are the twin enchanters of the world. Take the magic which this same distance works on scenery. Say a soot-grimed, red brick hovel in the sunshine, set against a field of ripening corn for the golden background—in front a meadow full of ruddled, shaggy, warm-felled sheep and whiter lambs; distance, color, and the sun make the place glorified. It might be the palace of a fairy queen come out for a summer's shepherding, and the broken, cobwebbed panes on which the long rays glint might be burning, precious gems, so gloriously do they shine. Approach your enchanted palace, and what do you find? A sordid, tumble-down old barn, where the cattle sometimes stray for shelter, startling the owl that nests in the ivy—where the shyest beasts run riot, free of fear because free of danger, so deserted, so desolate, so inhuman is it all. At a distance it is the salient point of the landscape, and artists come from far and wide to transfer its gorgeous coloring to their canvas, to copy its marvellous flow of line and picturesque arrangement of natural accessories; but not even the pre-Raphaelites would care to jot it all down close at hand, because close at hand its beauty has vanished, distance having been that, emphatically, which had lent "enchantment to the view."

And what is true with respect to scenery is true with respect to human character and history. Distance modifies our judgment, blurs distinctive qualities, conceals deficiencies, softens down excrescences, and so transforms to us the meaning and the manner of the fact that we scarcely know whether what we see is hero or demon, the brilliant palace of a fairy shepherdess or the ruined hovel tenanted by unclean beasts, that which we ought to admire or that which all teaching calls on us to condemn. There is that crux of the historian, that battle ground of the partisan, poor Mary Queen of Scots—what, I pray you, is the final reading after all the controversies that have raged about her name? Final reading? no—we have not come to that by many a hundred volumes seemingly, if we may judge of the future by the past; but what is the true reading? Accursed witch, murderess, and perjurer, slayer of men's souls as well as bodies, beautiful with the false seeming beauty of a fiend, a ravening wolf clothed in the whitest and silkiest of lamb-skins? Or was she a sweet and persecuted lady, whose loveliness was her crime, whose power of attracting men's hearts was her ruin, who was found guilty because she was proved dangerous, and her dangerousness simply her beauty, her innocence, her love? It is not so very long since she lived—well into the historic times, and within the full view of evidence makers—yet from the distance at which we stand, not so infinite though it be, who can tell? Some take the one side and some the other, and we have found no historic stereoscope as yet which can blend the two halves into one harmonious whole, and show us the woman as she must have been in the reality of her life—sinning and sinned against; guilty, yet not so bad as her sentence; false, yet not falselier than her time; no better than her contemporaries, yet was she so very much worse? Who can decide these knotty points now? We are too far off both in point of time and in point of moral sympathy, at too great a distance from evidence and manners, to give a comprehensive and yet detailed—therefore thoroughly true—judgment. Our barn may be a dilapidated hut close at hand, but it is nevertheless a glorious feature in the landscape, in the sunshine, and at a distance; and the window panes, which sparkle like burning gems, may be cobwebbed, and foul, and fractured, still the flash is there all the same, and none but the blind can fail to see it.

So we may say of everything and almost every person. From a distance and near at hand the lines of perspective vary, and no one's character looks, or is, the same thing when placed at different angles, seen from different stand-points, and under the transforming influences of color. This, too, is another reason—if, indeed, we wanted another, having already so many—why our judgments on each other should be charitable, gentle, and ever believing in the best. We can see no man near enough to judge of his actions entirely according to his feeling, and on the ground plan of his motives; or we can never get so really within the heart of even our nearest friend as to read through and through the complex interlining which goes on through the letters of the simplest duty. In fact, there is no such thing as a simple duty out of childhood and beyond obedience. When once the free will of choice between conflicting duties comes in, there is an end to implicit taken in the sense of unity; and therefore we can never judge with a full knowledge of causes and motives, how clear so ever we may be as to the resulting facts. But facts being only the embodiment of one or at most two feelings amongst many, facts themselves are only our red brick barn with the sunlight on it or in the shadow, at a distance or close at hand, and so change in their real significance according to their relative distances from ourselves.

Society is about the most extraordinary Proteus fashioned according to distance that we can find. Take, for an example, people who go out a good deal, and who entertain as much as they are entertained, and give beautiful balls and dinners, with a fine name among the guests to make up. What blessed mortals they must be! we think, we poor young ladies whose parents are not rich, who must stay at home while we are dying for only one ball this season, only one modest white tarlatane, as fresh and simple as a rose with a dewdrop in the heart of it. What fortunate people! we growl, we bilious matrons, striving to climb up the ladder step by step, and counting every house that is open to us only by its worth in the way of dinners and concentric invitations. If we were to mention the happiest people in the world, as we know it, we would mention the Asked Abouts; and if we would honestly confess to so mean a passion as envy, it would be of these same Asked Abouts, whom we should like nothing better than to tumble from their place, and fill it with ourselves. So be it. But do you know personally those you so envy? If you do, you can appreciate the analogy of the barn and the broken panes of glass—in the sunlight and at a distance. Among the most miserable creatures of your acquaintance are the brilliant Asked Abouts. He is a disappointed man with a loaded liver, who has failed in all he seriously set himself to win; she is an unhappy wife who married for ambition, got less than she desired, and failed to secure even friendship where she had once dreamed of love. All that these people have, which seems so delightful to you, possessing so little where they have such affluence (comparative), is as dross and lees to them. They want more and ever more. They do not care two straws for the people to whom they go, and only want to be asked to places beyond their social standing, and therefore shut against them; they regard it all as weariness, a waste of time and energies, a something that mocks their wishes and gives them not what they desire; yet they are in the vortex, and cannot get out of it. They seem rich, do they? Their dress and equipage are perfect? So they may to you, but they are gnawing their hearts out with envy, with anxiety how to reach the higher stage; and what would be heaven to you if suddenly translated there is to them nothing but a clod-paved earth, with the empyrean still above, still unattained, and maybe unattainable. They have not enough for their desires, just as you have not enough for your needs; and the cornucopia which you think so rich they hold to be a miserable little screw of tea paper, holding nothing worth taking. You are an old maid—fast becoming one rather—a flower withering on its stalk, and you hear of the Misses Alllove and their offers. You have never had a chance of marrying, save that which could scarcely be called a chance, when a Mr. Guppy of your acquaintance proposed terms that were inadmissible and impossible. But all the offers made to the Misses Alllove are fascos. The nice men are poor and cannot marry, those who can are old and horrid. The eldest Miss Alllove has her secret beloved, but she cannot marry him for want of sticks wherewith to boil the pot au feu; and her sister, the pretty one, loves one who does not love her. From a distance it would seem that they have only to hold up their little fingers for a shower of wedding rings to descend thereon; but near at hand it may be seen not one fits. See what a beautiful thing maturity seems to the child badgered with lessons and bothered with control. "When I am grown up!" Yes, when she is grown up, all the roses will have no thorns, and there will never be a sunset to keep the sunrise modest. What does the child find? Much what the youth finds when he is taken for the first time behind the scenes and introduced to the ballet fairies. And when we are old, what was our youth, looked back on from the distance? A great, golden haze, full of sweetest dreams and murmured songs, and happy days and blessed anticipations. That is from a distance. When we were going through the golden time we discovered that a great deal of it was pinchbeck of the most flagrant kind, and we did not always rejoice in the sunlight; but often found it more scorching than vivifying, and less delightful than embarrassing. So that, on the whole, "From a distance" is not always the truest if it is generally the most beautifying stand-point whence to view life and nature; but at the least it ought to render us careful how we judge what we cannot verify, time for time, and point for point; and whenever there is a doubt, it should incline us to the side of charitable surmise and benevolent explanation.

HAPPINESS cannot rest till it has created for itself a claim to happiness; therefore it is a truth that whoever esteems himself is esteemed of others.—Taylor.

THE mean and servile soul of a hypocrite is like a dead carcass, in which there is neither heat, fire, nor spark of life remaining.—Rousseau.

APRIL FOOL'S DAY AT ELMSGLADE.

BY S. ANNIE FROST.

DEAR RUTH: Did you remember that the 31st of March is my ninetieth birthday? Probably I shall not see another one, and I want all my family to celebrate this. Will you come for a week? I want you all to be here on the 27th or 28th, and to stay some days into April. I believe I can hope to see all excepting Sydney.

Lovingly ever,
GRANDMOTHER.

It was just what I wanted, this little holiday, for I had been hard at work all winter, and was feeling very lonely, very homesick, and dreary, when the invitation came like a glimpse of sunshine.

I knew who would be there. Five daughters, and their husbands, with, oh! so many children, most of them young ladies and gentlemen; I, the only child of a sixth daughter, who had joined my father years ago in the better world, and Sylvia.

I must tell you of Sylvia, the only one probably of grandmother's guests who was not a child or a grandchild. She was grandma's companion. Nobody knew much about her previous history, excepting that her mother had been one of grandma's scholars in the days when she kept a little school, before grandpa came a-wooing.

I think there was not one of the grandchildren who would not gladly have lived at Elmsglade, and been grandma's companion, but she would not have it so.

"Give me your company and your love. Come to me when you can, but never feel obliged to stay," she would say. "Sylvia will live with me till she marries or I die."

So it was Sylvia who wrote grandma's letters, who read to her, and performed the thousand little acts of service old people constantly require. Because she was poor, Sylvia received a salary; because grandma liked pretty things about her, Sylvia accepted the wardrobe she provided, and was always exquisitely dressed. She was very beautiful. Not a merely pretty face, that depended upon color and dress for much of its effect, but a rarely beautiful face, full of animation one moment, yet as lovely in repose the next. The pending expression was bright and joyous, for Sylvia's was a happy nature; but at times there would come to her great brown eyes a wistful look, sad and tender, as if some sweet memory of sorrow or unattainable future joy was in her heart.

We all loved her. Maude, stately brunette, our queen of cousins, patronized her; Susie, the youngest of us all, worshipped her; and all the cousins between gave her their love, unmingled with jealousy, for we knew she was grandma's comfort, without depriving us of one loving throb of her true heart.

I fairly counted the hours in my little boarding-house room until I could pack a valise for a week's sojourn at Elmsglade, and I took an early breakfast and early train on the 28th, drawing a long, free breath of delight as the iron horse snorted its way out of the depot.

Such a houseful as I found. Maude, Claire, and Percy, with Aunt Alice and Uncle Joe; Aunt Margery's twin girls and only son, with Uncle Harry promised for the birthday; Aunt Mary, with seven olive branches, and Uncle Walter coming with Uncle Harry; Aunt Sue and Uncle Lewis, with their only child, Hester; and Aunt Polly, with ten children, and, grandma said, Uncle Phil, the biggest baby of the lot; I, all alone, but welcomed heartily. We were all there, as grandma said, all excepting Sydney.

It was a sad gap we knew for grandma. She had never had but one son, and he died one year after his marriage, killed by a lightning stroke. Three days after his wife kissed her baby boy once, and then joined her husband, leaving the hour old child to grandma.

He was her idol. She loved us all, but she worshipped Sydney, her child of children, her darling of darlings. We were too young when he was at home to speculate about the peculiarities that made older people sigh for the boy's future; but, looking back through the vista of years, I can now understand why older people trembled for Sydney.

Fair as a girl, frail as a flower, beautiful as a dream, this orphan boy inherited from his father an artist's soul, from his mother a sensitive, delicate body. He was a genius, living an ideal life, indulged in every fancy, and causing no other anxiety than that called forth by his feeble health. His mother's large fortune made him independently wealthy when he came of age, for grandma would have no part of it touched for his support or education in boyhood. He was an artist from babyhood. I think he was seeking for souls or fairies in the flowers when his baby hands pulled them into shreds, his great blue eyes looking mournfully and wistfully at every torn petal. Before he could speak, he would sit for hours watching clouds, raindrops, birds, any of the beauties of nature showered upon Elmsglade.

I think the greatest struggle of his petted life was his choice of a profession. Should he devote himself to music, he must give up his hopes of being a painter; if he elected to be a painter, where were his dreams of one day rivaling the master musicians of the past? Painting finally carried the day, yet to hear Sydney touch a piano or a violin made one sigh for him to spend his life in music.

Need I say he was the idol of aunts and cousins? Everybody joined the compact to spoil Sydney, but he would not be spoiled. He was hard-working and indolent by turns, studying as eagerly as a professor to-day, lying idly on the grass all day to-morrow. His college life brought him no special honors, but its temptations passed him and left him untouched. With his great, soul-lit eyes, his white, broad brow, his sensitive mouth, and fine features, his expression was childlike in its innocent sweetness.

I had not been an hour at Elmsglade when my especial pet and crony of cousins, Ella, came to take me up stairs.

"You and I are to have our old room, of course," she whispered. "Come, let's run off for a chat."

We were out of school some years ago; Ella, a fashionable young lady in society, I, a hard-working little music-teacher; but, when we were alone, we often curled up girl fashion on our broad sofa to exchange confidences.

"Nell," I said, as soon as we were comfortably settled, "why don't Syd come home for grandma's birthday? He has been two years in Italy, and we may never all meet here again."

"Sydia," said Ella, shortly.

Had she struck me I could not have been more astonished.

"How do you know?" I gasped.

"I don't know; I only guess. When were you here last, Ruthy?"

"I have not been here since Sydney left. You know I went to Boston my last holidays, and this visit is fairly stolen. I shall have to give extra lessons for my holiday. But about Sydia?"

"If you were not here when Sydney left, Ruthy, I was sure you had seen Sydia since."

"No, not even to-day."

"I was here for three months before Syd left. I am sure he was in love with Sydia; and, from a sort of cousinly regard, such as we all gave him, Sydia suddenly became a perfect miracle of stately propriety."

"O Nell! who could help loving Sydney?"

"Ruthy, I think she did love him, but she is so proud and so conscientious. You know there was some mystery about her father"—

"No mystery at all, only grandma don't like it talked about. He was mixed up in a trust fund swindle, a scapegoat for an unprincipled lot of men, and, when he found money and reputation both gone, he drank himself into delirium tremens, and so died."

"Is that the story? Bad enough it is, and Sydia thinks has forever disgraced her. She says nothing, but once, in a sudden burst of confidence, she described to me the angelic being Syd's wife ought to be."

"Nonsense! Syd, being rather too angelic himself for this work-a-day world, wants a good, common-sense, practical woman, to worship his genius if she will, and keep him in order. A nice mess the housekeeping would be if Syd married another angel. Sydia is just the wife for him."

"Mind you, Ruthy, this may be all a notion of my own. All that is certain is, that Sydney went off to Italy like a flash of lightning, grandma has grown twenty years older since he left, and Sylvia don't like to talk about it. She is a little sadder, and likes to get off by herself sometimes, but that may mean nothing."

"Or everything. There's the tea bell, and I have not taken off my travelling dress."

"Never mind. Nobody is very fine to-day. We will all beautify to-morrow. Come!"

There is nothing in the conversation given above to tell the reader what a harum-scarum madcap Miss Ella was. Rarely was she so grave as she had been during that little chat. The prime leader of every kind of mischief, full of animal life, overflowing with gay spirits, Nell was the merriest and most mischief making cousin of the group. Alfred, another cousin still, was usually her ally, aide-de-camp, or prime minister, whenever there was any especial trick or fun in prospect. It was impossible long to be grave where Al and Nell had any share of a festivity.

It struck me when I entered the room to meet the family at tea how aged and broken our dear grandmother had become, but a change almost as marked had come to Sylvia. I cannot describe it. She was as active in arranging for every one's comfort, as attentive to grandmother, as loving to all, but the old joyous ring was gone from her voice; her eyes had a sad expression in repose; her movements were as graceful as ever, but something of the spring was gone from her step. Subtle differences not easily seen by a casual observer, but I was thinking much of Ella's confidence, and during the evening noted so much change.

The birthday was merrily passed, every one had a gift, and on this occasion grandmother gave us each a keepsake. When all were distributed, she put upon the table where her own presents lay, a diamond ring, that we all knew had belonged to grandfather.

"This is for Sydney," she said to us all. "If I do not see my boy again, this is for him, and for his wife when he marries."

There was a hush in the room for some moments, and I saw Sylvia go softly away. Nearly an hour later I met her in the library, crouched down in a corner, white and still.

"I am tired, so tired," she said, when I came in.

"You have had all the trouble, while we took the pleasure," I said.

"Yes, that is it," she answered, eagerly, as if anxious for an excuse.

"Grandma has enjoyed it," I said, "but it was very evident she missed Sydney. He ought to come home, or he may never see her again."

"O Ruth, he ought to come home to her!"

It seemed as if the exclamation was forced from her, for a moment later she said—

"But he is learning a great deal. He writes that he never knew what it was to be an artist till he saw Italy."

"Does he write to you?"

"I answer for his grandmother. You know I read and write all her letters."

"True! If you are so very tired, Sylvia, go lie down till bed-time, or go to bed, and I will undress grandmother and read to her to-night."

She accepted the last offer gratefully, and I returned to the drawing-room and made her excuses.

The next day the whole household went crazy. It was April Fool's Day, and every one of the busy beehive of young folks tried to outdo the other in the magnitude or mischief of the tricks. Practical jokes were the order of the day. Nobody was safe. Even grandmother joined in the innocent merriment, and gave us for dessert a wonderful pie made of shavings, white cotton, wool, and crimson worsted, a delectable compound so skilfully concocted that half of us tasted it before we discovered our white of egg was wool, or preserves worsted, and our pie crust wood shavings. Sylvia seemed to catch the merry tone. Nobody's surprises were more startling than hers, but she was so wonderfully on her guard that at dusk nobody could boast of having once "fooled" Sylvia. Nell solemnly declared that she would not have one wink of sleep if she did not play one trick on Sylvia, but owned herself puzzled as to the modus operandi.

I had gone from the house down to the gardener's lodge some little distance, but on the grounds, on an errand for grandma. Returning, and walking rather rapidly, for it was growing dark, I met Ella hurrying towards me.

"Ruth, Sid is here."

"Here!"

"He meant to be here for the birthday, but the steamer was one day behind time. Ruth, I was right."

"I don't understand you."

"About Sylvia! I did not mean to listen, but I was in grandma's dressing-room when he came to the bed-room. Nobody had seen him, and after a few words of greeting, he asked her, 'What do you think?'"

"O Nell, ought you to tell?"

"You won't betray me. He don't know whether Sylvia loves him or not, and grandma has not found out in two years. She would be glad, Ruthy, to have Sydney happy in his own way, but she cannot say a word to encourage him to hope."

"It seems too bad."

"He is so thin and so pale, Ruthy. She will kill him, hard-hearted as she is."

"Pshaw! Men don't die of love."

"But Sydney is not like other men."

We were at the house by this time, and could see the whole party assembled in the drawing-room excepting grandmother, who was still in her own room with Sydney. Sylvia was at the piano playing a waltz, as we opened the door. Just as we did so, I heard grandmother on the stairs, saying :—

"How surprised they will all be to see you, Sydney," and at the same moment Nell whispered to me :—

"I'm going to play an April fool's trick on Sylvia, and catch her."

It seemed but a second, and I could still hear grandmother's slowly descending steps, when Nell dashed into the drawing-room crying :—

"Oh! have you heard that Sydney is dead?"

Every face paled, and a cry of consternation broke from every one, but there was a more ominous sound still, a heavy fall, and Sylvia lay insensible upon the floor.

It was a cruel experiment. Sydney's self in their midst relieved the others, but he saw nothing but Sylvia. Only to hear her speak again, only to see her eyes open again, he pleaded as if for his life. We opened the windows and let the cold evening air blow upon her; we drenched her face and hair with water; and, finally, Nell coaxed everybody away but Sydney and myself.

"Will she ever waken, Ruthy?" he said to me, with white, stiff lips.

"It is only a fainting fit," I answered, chafing the cold, lifeless hands. "You heard Nell's cruel joke?"

"Was it that?" he asked.

Oh, the selfishness of men! His color was returning, and a look creeping into his eyes of fond exultation.

"Sylvia," he said, bending his lips to hers, "you are mine now."

She heard him, for a faint color came to her cheeks, and she tried to move. I saw she was reviving, and I left them together. Nell met me in the hall.

"I have got them all in to tea," she said. "Ruthy, have I killed her?"

"No, indeed. Go tell grandmother all is well now."

"You don't mean"—

"I don't know; I only guess," I said; "but I guess we'll get our wedding."

And I was right. Having betrayed so much, Sylvia gave her love fully and freely as her nature was. She let her pride sleep, and Sydney went no more to Italy, for grandmother leads for her best beloved child to close her eyes when they shall open no more in this world, and Sylvia thinks no home can be like Imshglade. You can't make Nell say she did wrong thing.

"I was awfully frightened," she will own, but I am as glad as I can be I caught Sylvia once on April Fool's Day."

THE SPRING SNOW STORM.

BY ALPHA.

THE apple trees out in the orchard
Were robed in garments of green,
With a delicate trimming of blossoms,
The prettiest ever seen.

The peaches vied with them in splendor,
The plums were as dainty and gay,
While Robin sang out in the branches
To herald the coming of May.

He had built him a nest already,
With his little shy brown mate,
And they laughingly whispered together
That the others were "always too late."

Little violet down in the meadow,
With the grasses played "hide and go seek,"
Or toyed with the perfumed breezes
With many a mischievous freak.

And all of old Nature's darlings,
The trees, and the birds, and the flowers,
Rejoiced in the April sunshine,
Refreshed by the April showers.

But grim and greedy old Winter,
With bitterness in his heart,
Looking back on this scene of beauty,
And loth from the earth to part,

Crept back under cover of darkness,
Spring's wary, cunning foe,
And laid on each tree and blossom
A weight of glittering snow.

The apple trees, with a shudder,
Shrank 'neath the burden chill;
Poor Robin crept under the house eaves,
And his cheery song was still.

Little violet closed her eyes gently
Under the shrouding veil,
And the bluebells, nodding together,
Were weary, and sad, and pale.

But Spring remembers her children,
And orders her bright sunbeams
To dispel the ruthless invader
With their armor of golden gleams.

By night they are laughing at Winter,
For his troops in dismay have fled,
And their harsh and wicked leader,
The vallant Jack Frost, is dead.

RELATIVE POSITION.

BY MARY E. COMSTOCK.

CHAPTER I.

THE Hadly family were at breakfast, and animation of manner betokened some topic of greater interest than usually had place at that rather sleepy and informal meal. Alfred and the girls were in the habit of sauntering in one after another when their elders were half through the meal, or finished and gone, and conversation was usually exceedingly desultory. This morning it was different. Paternal permission had the night before been obtained to have invitations issued for a party in honor of the return of Mrs. Jacob Jackson, and the household were unitedly determined it should be such a party as had never before been given in Jacksonville. Hence each had suggestions and remarks to offer, and the sitting was a remarkably lively one.

The Hadlys, speaking peculiarly, were a rising family in Jacksonville. This busy little place was a manufacturing town that owed its prosperity, and, perhaps, its existence, to the energy and business foresight of the Jackson family, of whom Jacob Jackson—J. J., his wife sometimes called him—was the present representative. The Hadlys, or rather Lawrence Hadly—his brother Edmund was not openly identified in the business—had within a few years risen to the carrying on of a branch of the Jackson manufactories, and was expecting shortly, by the introduction of improved machinery, to pay the principal, get rid of interest, and rival the established, original works. The prophetic ramble and whirr of the prospective machinery was imaginary music to which the expected proprietor's thoughts and plans all set themselves.

Mrs. Lawrence Hadly had a large share of social ambition. What she called "position in society" was the ultimatum of her desires. When Jacob Jackson brought home his second wife, Mrs. Hadly spared no pains to ingratiate herself in favor at the newly-fitted up house, that was at once the pride and envy of Jacksonville.

The two ladies were of congenial tastes and feelings. Mrs. Jackson was one of those who constitutionally need an admirer, some one ready to take opinions and self-valuation unquestioningly; and Mrs. Hadly was glad to attach herself to one whose intimacy, through the influence of "position," in her world of social village life, gave new prestige.

Mrs. Jackson had been a half year absent from home, and brought with her, on her return, a married sister, wife of a millionaire. Her chief adherent and friend considered this a favorable opportunity to pleasantly astonish Jacksonville, by exhibition of new and expensive plate and renewed parlor furniture, and at the same time pay a handsome compliment to Mrs. Jackson and the wife of the millionaire.

"Seems to me you're putting things up at a pretty high figure," slightly remonstrated pater familias, as confectionery and tropical fruits from the city entered into the list of things pronounced indispensable.

"But, pa," exclaimed Emily, "as long as you undertake to do a handsome thing, you don't want to stop at trifles."

"If we are not to have something a little out of the ordinary humdrum line, I say drop the whole thing," seconded Alfred.

The mother, at this juncture, said nothing, but a satisfied smile betokened sympathy with the sentiments expressed.

"Well, well, you'll have your own way, I expect," was the complaisant rejoinder. "When will you have out the invitations?"

And the list of the to-be-invited opened new discussion.

"I declare, pa," said Mrs. Hadly, "I wish you could give Edmund more salary. I suppose Kate will wear that old black silk of hers again. The family are positively dowdy. As long as everybody knows who they are, why, of course, we have to invite them when we do others."

"Of course," said Lawrence Hadly, emphatically.

"Aunt Kate's black silk is very old-fashioned, really shabby," answered Emily.

"I never saw auntie look shabby; I don't believe she could," struck in Lily.

"Little girls should be seen and not heard," reminded her mother, at which Lily fidgeted uneasily in her chair.

"Edmund has as large a salary as young Lyndhurst," reflectively spoke Mr. Hadly.

"Mrs. Lyndhurst and Marian dress with excellent taste," asserted Emily. "That is the loveliest new mantle Mrs. Lyndhurst wore Sunday. I wish I had one like it. They spend a great deal in carriage-hire, too, and Uncle Ed never does. I know Aunt Kate might keep up better. She ought to for the sake of Susie. She dresses her like a child. Why, I had on long dresses a full year and a half before I was as old as Susie is."

"I don't care!" exclaimed irrepressible Miss Lily, "Aunt Kate and Susie are both just as good as they can be."

"Lily, how little you can understand," and "To be sure they are," spoke Emily and her father, simultaneously. "Your mother only thinks they need a little more of her faculty for appearances," continued the latter, "which very likely they do."

"If Aunt Kate only would wear a waterfall and some rats," exclaimed Emily, "but somehow you can never suggest anything that way to her."

"That's where of the two I rather admire Aunt Kate," frankly admitted Alfred. "Waterfalls are an exaggeration. I think a waterfall on Aunt Kate would be a monstrosity."

"That's because you don't know," submitted Emily. "Some people never can acquire an air; but I wish Aunt Kate would try, whether it were possible or not."

The mother and daughter spent the morning hours in consultation.

"It's a good thing that I would have the new sitting-room carpet," said Mrs. Hadly. "I had this party in my eye then. I knew we would have to have a carpet some time, and might as well get it first as last, and done with it, though your pa was minded to hold back in the beginning," and she gazed approvingly at the handsome Brussels. "May as well have things all off the same piece, now we've got the plate and the new parlor furniture. It's every whit as nice as Mrs. Jackson's, I'll be bound." And the question of invitations and dress was discussed.

"Make it worth while, ma," directed Alfred, passing through the room. "If we're going to have a party, let's have a stunner. I'll get the wines," with which stipulation the young man passed out at the street door.

"I hope you'll make yourself agreeable to the millionaire's wife," said Mrs. Hadly to Emily. "It is worth a great deal to a young girl sometimes to have such an acquaintance. I think she seemed pleased with you. I noticed her eye ran over every article of your dress the day we called. I was glad you wore your ermine."

And preparations for the party began in detail.

"I declare I'm tired!" gasped Mrs. Hadley, as evening coming on she sank into the nearest chair, after one of her busiest days. "I'm dreadful worried for fear the things won't get here in time from the city. Goodness! if they should fail, I don't know what I would do. I see my way all clear about the meats, and the chicken salad, and the oysters, and the ice cream; but I've depended so much on that lot of extras that's ordered, that if they fail everything does."

"The trouble is you're tired, ma," said Alfred. "They don't fail. I've told you so ten times. You've been bothered doing things, and you get up that bugbear."

"Well, I have been bothered, that's a fact. Emily was trying on her dress, and I had to see them folks that called, and Miss Leverett she come to see about Lily. She seems to be very fond of Lily, and says she has taken a good start in school. I don't think she knew we had put her into the public school, she looked so surprised when I told her."

"What induced you to do it, mother?" exclaimed Alfred. "I wondered at the time, though I had something else to think of, and didn't say anything. The public school is a perfect jam, and the teachers this year are a rather poor set. Miss Leverett has started a first class school, and I'd support it."

"Her charges are very high, and Lily's a mere child," hastily returned his mother, "and we are going into so many expenses this year; your pa sometimes quite alarms me about it, but I tell him we must make a certain appearance. Now that he is taking a new start, it's really necessary. Why, the Jacksons, and Hudsons, and Emersons seem to want to be quite intimate here lately. Your father's credit will be a great deal better, too, if it's seen what style of living he can afford."

"Then, for the sake of appearance, don't you think you ought to give Lily to Miss Leverett?" logically questioned Alfred.

"Well, no; it don't weigh much about Lily now, on the whole. She can go to some finishing school a year or two, same as Emily did, and we can just as well save expense now till she's older. I declare I forgot to send word to Margaret I shall want her help to-morrow," and tired Mrs. Hadly bustled out of the room to despatch the said message.

It was a wee bit of a house on a by street, from which through crimson curtains the light shone cheerily. The one large room that served as both sitting-room and dining-room was always very bright in the evening. Mrs. Edmund Hadly, on taking the house, had stipulated to have the partition taken down that had made the one room two, that the small habitation might possess one commodious family gathering place; a true home room, rather than pretentious cramped divisions. The broad chintz-covered lounge, and the chairs with corresponding cushions, looked home-like and comfortable. The three-ply carpet was of cheerful though modest color and design. A well-filled bookcase was supplemented by two sets of hanging shelves containing most used authors and school books. A United States map also had place on the wall, and every other available place was filled with choice engravings. A handsome mounted globe was on a side table; several ornaments graced the mantle, and a stand by the window held a few plants, over which hung Susie's bird. The table, always in the evening drawn to the centre of the room, had grouped around it to-night the members of the family. Here in her low rocker sat the mother at work on a child's garment; little Nettie busy with her French lesson, beside her; Miles sat with a Latin reader open before him; and Susie, her face shaded by clustering curls, was in the animated glow of composition.

"Your help a moment, please, mother," she spoke, impulsively. "I cannot choose between two adjectives." And she brought her paper to her mother.

"Your first is best," said the lady. "The second pleases your ear by its alliteration, but it does not give your meaning as clearly."

"Oh, yes, I see now!" returned Susie. "I was puzzled. Thank you, mother," and the quick tracery began again on the white page.

"Mother," shortly after, spoke Miles, raising his knit brow, "whatever does this old heathen mean?" And he brought his book and the result of his efforts towards construing, and the mother and son laughed softly, not to disturb the others, at a very natural blunder.

"Please, mamma, give me that rule once more," asked Nettie; and the mother, whose thoughts in the moment's space, and in some irregular way that housekeepers can understand, had strayed off to the fact that coffee must be browned for to-morrow's breakfast, replied absently, giving a Latin rule, and Nettie opened wide her blue eyes.

"Why, mamma!" and the lady slowly perceived her mistake.

"I don't know about this confusion of tongues," she said, laughingly. "You two young persons must leave me a margin of time between your appeals; 'the effect is like mixing wines.' Now let us see, little one. 'One verb following another must—'"

"Oh, yes," interrupted the little girl, going on with the rule, "I remember now, mamma!" and presently papa came in, bringing the evening mail.

"What do you think the nomination is?" he asked his wife, unfolding a paper as he spoke.

"Ah! here is a letter from your favorite correspondent!" and he passed it over. "Those are splendid coals for pop-corn, Nettie." And study hour being over, Edmund Hadly and his youngest daughter resolved themselves into a committee of two to visit the store-room for pop-corn, and said coals did excellent service. Susie lingered later than the others.

"I've finished it, mother, ready for copying!" she exclaimed, exultingly, and she showed the title to her father—"The Palace of the Sea King"—and then in a little space she left them too.

Edmund took up an envelope from the table. "Ah! what have we here? A party invitation?"

"At Lawrence's," supplemented his wife.

"Quite elaborate, isn't it?"

"So it seems. Shall we go?" and the face raised to his was very questioning in expression.

"Certainly; I suppose so; just as you say about it, of course. I presume you are agreeable to the proposition?"

"I do not know what is the matter with me lately," said Mrs. Edmund. "I am losing all relish for going out socially. I would rather stay here with the chicks by far. It isn't good for one to shut themselves away from others, I know, and I'm not going to yield to the desire, but I come home from these parties so weary, depleted; it's a positive dread to me to think of them."

"Don't go to another one, then," said Edmund, in his straightforward way.

Tears actually came into Aunt Kate's gentle eyes. "The fault must be with myself," she said. "In our little village gatherings at home I always used to find so much good; came home feeling better and happier. There were always so many kind, graceful things said and done. Everybody used to look beautiful to me; and in R——, with Aunt Ella, though society was different there, and not so much like that of one family as in our little village, yet I always got good. The Eldons and Raymonds and all that circle had so many good things to say. It was quite a feast to go where they were, though not really better than the home freedom and heartiness. But here"—and she stopped.

Edmund laughed. "Well, just so, here; how is it here?"

"I don't know," and, evidently, genial-hearted Mrs. Kate was puzzled. "I like these people; at least, I think I do, but it will seem to me sometimes that there is nothing real about them. It's all stereotyped, and like a show. I don't want to be uncharitable, but it seems as though they thought a great deal more of what one wears and has than of what one is."

"Not far out of the way, Kate. That's pretty much the tone, I think myself."

"This morning I had been doing over some preserves. I was heated and tired. The children were at school, and I wanted a few minutes refreshment with somebody. I hastily put on my shawl and hat and went over to Mrs. Herrick's for a few minute's sociability. I was shown into the parlor, which, by the way, was chilly, and Mrs. Herrick came, in the most formal way, to receive me. 'Let me come right in where you are sitting,' I incautiously said; 'I just came over for a bit of a talk, but I don't want to interrupt you in the least.' 'Not at all,' she said, 'she was not busy.' We talked about the weather, and the fashions, and the accidents, but some way I felt myself freezing right up. Mrs. Jaynes and Miss Herndon came in, in full calling costume, and offered nearly the same remarks we had been exchanging. I did not sit long after they came. I think we separated without our real selves once coming to the surface. I suppose the trouble is with myself in some way. I will go to this party and see if I can feel better."

"On the whole, I think I would," said Mr. Hadly. "I imagine they are taking a great deal of pains, and it would hardly do to stay away. It is some time, too, since we have spent an evening out."

The next day Mrs. Edmund Hadly said to Susie: "You saw the invitation to Aunt Lydia's, didn't you, dear?"

"Yes, and Lily had told me before," replied Susie. "She says every one is invited, and she wanted to know what I was going to wear."

"The inevitable question," a little morbidly, perhaps, thought Aunt Kate.

"And, mother, she asked what you would wear."

A flush came to the fair cheek. "I suppose Aunt Lydia would like to have us take pains," she said. "What shall I wear, dear?" and the childlike question was very characteristic.

"Your light silk," suggested Susie.

"I would have to get new trimming for it, dear," musingly; "but I will think about it," and, as usual with Mrs. Kate, she executed while she thought.

The anticipated night came. The desired confections had duly arrived. Emily's dress and her mother's were faultless, every arrangement was completed, and Alfred pronounced things "really quite in style." Alfred had spent a winter in town, and had attended parties at several handsome houses, furnished almost precisely alike by the upholsterer, and supplied with refreshments on these occasions by the best city caterer, and he was considered family authority.

"Aunt Kate has had the grace to wear her pearl-colored silk," said Emily to her mother. "She has taken off those old-style bretelles, and made it quite presentable," and the daughter moved away to greet other early guests.

It was late when Mrs. Jacob Jackson and sister made their appearance, and the hostess greeted them with marked expressions of welcome.

Mrs. Jackson appeared in the newest of city styles and the most elaborate detail of trimming and ornament. Her glory was not eclipsed, but rather enhanced, by the brilliance of the millionaire's wife, Mrs. McGibbon, whose heavy silk, that was commented upon next day as "thick enough to stand alone," together with the costly little cap of real lace, which bore upon its delicate texture a miniature flower garden—the effect of all heightened by a liberal flash of diamonds—created quite a sensation. Mrs. Jackson was of a nervous, animated carriage and style of conversation, but portly. Mrs. McGibbon enunciated her words as though they were expected to have the weight of an oracle's. She was communicative, too. Among strangers though she was, the greater part of the assembled company had, before the evening was over, been informed how great a favorite her son John was in society, that he was travelling in Europe now; also how much trouble her servants gave her, particularly the coachman, who was so exacting, and many other items of corresponding public interest.

Musicians arrived with their instruments, and dancing began and continued. Mrs. Lawrence congratulated herself that all was going well, but her satisfaction reached its height when the luxurious variety of the supper-table won looks of surprise from united Jacksonville. Wines circulated freely, and young men, with kindling excitement in their eyes, came to tell her what "a handsome thing" she had done. "Such a supper was never got up in these parts," they averred, and Aunt Kate involuntarily looked a degree of surprise at the gracious rather than tolerative way in which rather coarse encomiums were received.

"Can it be," she thought, "that Lawrence has imbibed sudden political aspirations?"

Alfred wisely induced some of the young men, who were rather too giddy to pay fitting devoirs to Terpsichore, to adjourn to a snug little room for cards. Some young ladies had done reluctant duty at the piano, and Jacob Jackson, who cared little for bravuras and fantasies, petitioned for a song.

"Don't you sing?" he asked of truthful but unwilling Susie, who, however, after her mother's quiet word, "Do not be disobliging, dear," gave her two little simple ballads. Susie's voice had little compass, it is true, but its expressiveness charmed Jacob Jackson, who vainly petitioned for one more. These were all that Susie's memory could enable her to give.

"Well, give us 'Auld Lang Syne,' then," said Mr. Jackson, and Susie simply gave the opening chords, while several young ladies laughed as though in appreciation of an intended joke on Jacob Jackson's part. That gentleman, who had once upon a time been church chorister, was in remarkably good voice to-night, and took up the sweet old air with excellent spirit. Aunt Kate immediately joined him, and others gathered gladly round, and the familiar refrain was borne on with increasing zest and sweetness. I can see Aunt Kate, now, as the song progressed, leaning on the piano, color mounting into her cheek. The pearl-colored silk, with soft lace at the sleeves and throat, was very becoming; and, if her lustrous, wavy hair had been in the modern style of arrangement, it would have spoiled that pretty, unconscious trick she had of tucking it up over her ear in any moment of animated fun or feeling, as she did now under the impulse of fellowship that sprang from the on-flowing united voices. Aunt Kate enjoyed that hearty rendering of "Auld Lang Syne," that, like a serenely-sparkling stream throwing off ice fetters, broke through the congealing influence of the very handsome, very new furniture and elaborate evening toilets of these people, who, though blessed with such appendages, seldom let their hearts come to social light.

The next morning at breakfast Emily said: "Susie would be a very pretty girl if she would only dress more like a young lady. That white muslin and sash were what any school girl might have worn."

"I thought she looked very pretty," said her father. "Jackson was quite pleased with her singing."

"Her voice hasn't a bit of power," said Mrs. Hadly. "It's lost entirely by the side of our Lily's. I wonder how Mr. Jackson liked Susie's treatment of his son?" with an accent of blame.

"How so?" Mr. Hadly made inquiry.

"Why," explained Emily, "Cady asked her to dance, and, when she got on the floor and found it was a round dance, she refused outright. She said she would dance the next quadrille with him, and after supper, when he came for her, she refused him again."

"Cady was hardly equal to tripping the light fantastic toe just about that time," laughed Alfred.

"Might have been rather too fantastic," said the father. "Served him right. Susie mustn't put on airs, though."

Evidently the party was a great success. It furnished talk topics for the village for a week after, and, in fact, "Mrs. Hadly's party" was long after mentioned as an event of importance. Mrs. McGibbon had the grace to appreciate the compliment offered, and was very gracious. The intimacy of the Hadlys and Jacksons grew apace. Emily was invited to make one of the Jackson summer travelling party, and Mrs. Hadly took care that her wardrobe should satisfy the ideas of the ostentatious people she accompanied.

The dressmakers of the little village began to quote to their customers the style of the Hadlys' raiment, as much as they had hitherto done that of the Jacksons.

"Mrs. Edmund Hadly?" questioned a plain little lady, on being recommended a pattern like one Mrs. Hadly selected.

"Oh, bless you, no!" replied the dressmaker. "She's as quiet as a Quaker. Mrs. Lawrence Hadly, that lives on Pleasant Street, I mean."

"Oh, yes!" spoke the customer, quite abashed at seeming not to know Mrs. Lawrence. "She is very fashionable, I believe?"

"You may always be sure what Mrs. Lawrence Hadly has is best style and quality, and no expense spared," said the workwoman, glad to own her patronage. "She always gets whatever's wanted, and the more work that's put on the better. I wish I had more such customers."

"Well, make it just as you please," said the frightened little woman. "I didn't know as I had cloth enough to cut it in the way you spoke of, and I got the last of the piece."

The clerks, too, began to make mention that Mrs. or Miss Hadly took a pattern like those of which "only one remained;" and Drayton, the merchant peddler, showed handsome jewelry "exactly like a set he sold Mrs. Hadly," or "like a set ordered by Miss Hadly." What the Hadlys had, did, or were going to do, were items of information exchanged among the villagers, either enviously or harmlessly, as the case might be. Mrs. Hadly decided she must have a city cook; their position demanded they should entertain so many. Sundry improvements were added to house and grounds, and Mrs. Lawrence increased in cares and satisfaction. Alfred drove fast horses, and indulged in wine; was courted by Jacksonville mammas, and was envied by the sons.

Meanwhile, Mrs. Edmund accused herself of uncharitableness and want of sympathy. She did not think she envied Lydia her pleasant things. How could she? But try as she would to enter into the household plans and enjoyments, certain it was she got no comfort from going there. Lydia curiously made her feel a want of confidence in herself. She felt constrained and ill at ease; "put down," in some way; for, though Aunt Kate was very independent and firm where principle was involved, socially she was dependent, and needed the felt approval of her friends. Edmund was so busy she saw him little now; he seemed too tired to talk evenings. The clergyman even seemed to have got the busy manufacturing element into his soul. His sermons seemed manufactured, not inspired. All this was very depressing for Aunt Kate. She had pleasure, however, in "keeping" her wee nest of a house, in helping the children in their lessons and amusements, and in taking counsel about them with earnest, warm-hearted Miss Leverett.

CHAPTER II.

"How would you like to leave Jacksonville?" asked Edmund Hadly one evening as he roused himself from an apparent reverie.

Mrs. Kate looked the surprise that did not at once form itself into words, and then a sunny, hopeful gleam came into her face.

"Oh, I should like it of all things, I think! Most any change you would be likely to make would be for the better, it seems to me," and Mr. Hadly was surprised at her eagerness, betraying secret discontent so bravely borne.

"Do you really think of going, Edmund?"

"It must come to that sooner or later, and the sooner the better, in my opinion. I would have left long ago if I could have got the means I invested in the business, even without any interest. But Lawrence begged me to wait; I 'must not jeopardize him.' The best, most honest thing he can do, in my way of thinking, is to let the works, improvements, and all, go back to Jackson, and start in some new place. I've seen it some time, but it's hard for him to give up. It's well you insisted upon saving your college fund for Miles, dear. This has been a losing business for me ever since Lawrence inveigled me into it. I ought to have known better."

"Where do you think of going, Edmund?"

"I have a place in my mind where I could find something for myself, and it wouldn't be a bad place for Lawrence. There are manufacturing interests there that with his experience might be taken hold of with advantage. The grave old town of Reamington is quite remodelling itself under railroad influence."

"Reamington! Where you graduated? Where the university is? and Mrs. Littlejohn's school? and where Doctor Seaver's church is?" exclaimed Aunt Kate in a breath.

"The very same."

"O Edmund, if we could go!" And a strange little flutter of eagerness came into gentle Aunt Kate's manner, and then—she was quite alone there in the home-room with her husband, you know—she actually burst into sudden tears, and then laughed at herself the next moment.

"I didn't know I cared so much till the prospect of change came," she said, "but I've been so lonesome, hungry-minded here! With you away all day, and the children in school, it had seemed like being in a vacuum, and if I went out, through some fault or weakness in myself, I suppose, I have not seemed to get any good, for I can't, Edmund, I can't think so very much of dry goods!"

Edmund laughed heartily. Aunt Kate laughed, too.

"It has seemed to me in the quiet here as though I was in some way losing identity," and there was another flash of tears through the laughter.

"My darling Kate, I had no idea it was so bad as this. I knew you must be lonely, but I did not dream of the whole truth," and within a few days a little journey through lovely scenery, and a visit to a dear old clergyman uncle was improvised for Mrs. Kate Hadly, and it did her great good.

It was some time before Lawrence Hadly could by circumstances be induced to take the view of his affairs that his brother's clearer vision discerned as the only true one. When serious embarrassments came crowding upon him, however, as usual, he relied, without knowing that he did so, on his brother's calm judgment, and prevailing upon him still to be his right hand in business, together they went to Reamington.

"Reamington is a larger place than this," said Mrs. Lawrence to her daughter. "They say it is a very rich, aristocratic old town; a great many old families live there. I hope pa will not think too much about the little reverses he has had lately. It is very important that we take the right position there in starting."

And the lovely old place left vacant by Professor Gilbert was, through united solicitation, secured, though not without many demurs on the part of Lawrence Hadly, who, notwithstanding late experiences, yielded anew to the representation of the position "the children's prospects" demanded.

Owing to the new influx of railroad people, such a house as Edmund felt must suit his own family could not be procured, and nothing remained but to yield to Lawrence's proposition that they should for the time remain with him.

Sensitive Kate shrunk into herself more and more under the felt, rather than expressed, criticism of Mrs. Lawrence. Only the beauty of the rare old place in anywise atoned for an intangible sense of being found fault with, which she had invariably felt of late years when with the wife of her husband's brother, for under any vague provocation, Aunt Kate always kept the relationship in mind. "She is Lawrence's wife, and Edmund, thinks so much of Lawrence."

"It's curious," said the senior Mrs. Hadly to her daughter, as they noted the two gentlemen walking down the street together, "what a different choice those two brothers made in marriage. Now, there's a great deal of Edmund. Your pa says his business faculty is excellent, but with that quiet wife of his, without any stir or ambition, I don't wonder he is kept back in the world. If they are going to stay right here in the house with us, I shall certainly give her some hints about making a little more show of style. We shall have to present her in our set, of course."

The old residents being sufficient unto themselves, were not especially anxious to receive new comers; but the Hadlys, in taking the Gilbert place, had, as regarded locality, come right among them, and the occupants of that hospitable old house seemed in an intangible way to have a certain claim upon them. Besides, there were some of his old class still there who remembered Ed. Hadly, and none were more ready than Reamington people to acknowledge a claim of the past.

The wives of the clergyman and of the president of the college called, and Mrs. Lawrence sailed down resplendent in rustling silk and choice jewels, and was profuse in wordy welcome. The inconveniences of "getting settled" she treated of at length, descending upon household advantages she had been forced to relinquish in this change of residence, and quite silencing and casting in the shade quiet Aunt Kate, whose kindly eyes had somehow given more response to their greeting than Mrs. Lawrence's extended volubility.

Other callers sauntered in from evening promenade, quite in Reamington way of easy sociability, and a pleasant circle quietly formed, in which Edmund Hadly felt early days renewing themselves. A young gentleman was à l'été with Emily, and a sudden lull in conversation—such, as by some mysterious law of social intercourse, so often unexpectedly occurs—gave to the room the benefit of a very well-turned sentence, humorously bearing upon the title of a serial then appearing in a popular monthly, and occasioning considerable discussion on account of peculiar views advanced. Emily received the bon mot rather blankly, and, not having read or known the existence of the serial, made a most inapt reply, to cover which a gentleman sitting near commented on a singular case of extortion on the part of a wealthy and well-known New York merchant, whose name was being quite indignantly handled by the papers.

"A regular Shylock, madam," he said, turning to Mrs. Lawrence Hadly.

"I want to know if you know Shylock?" exclaimed that lady, a merchant who had invaded Jacksonville having drawn upon himself the obnoxious cognomen.

"I think he out-Shylocks Shylock in that the Jew of Venice had some respect for the letter of the law," interposed Mrs. Kate, in her clear, sweet enunciation.

But Mrs. Lawrence had no mind to brook an interruption. She had been sitting rather ill at ease. Accustomed to take a leading part in conversation, although met with the greatest courtesy, she yet found it rather difficult to maintain it now.

"I bought a carpet of that old fellow once," she stated, in dominant tones. "I never shall hear the end of that bargain from Mr. Hadly. I saw after he began to measure it that it was a poor thing, and said I: 'I b'lieve I'll look a little further before I make up my mind.' 'Oh!' says he, 'you'll have to take it, now; I've begun to measure it off,' and he just clipped into it with the scissors. 'It's cut, you see, and you'll be obliged to take it.' I guess I spent half an hour talking about that carpet. He sent it down to the house with the bill, and, rather than have a fuss, Lawrence—that's Mr. Hadly—said I'd better pay for it. He never minds what he pays for anything," with a laugh of self-complacency. "Lawrence said it all come of my love of making bargains. The man had got mad at me about some edgings before that. I hope you don't have any like him at Reamington?"

"I believe the most prominent representative of that class that we have among us at present is a music master," replied the gentleman addressed.

"One might welcome such a one for Seraphael's sake," said Aunt Kate, but further remark or reply was cut off by Mrs. Lawrence.

"Well, really, I'm glad to have a chance to ask about the music teachers here. Our Lily's dreadfully out of practice. We think she has a taste for music, but she got quite discouraged with our teacher at Jacksonville."

"I think you would find Mr. Goldsmidt all that could be desired. He has had the training of some advanced classes in both New York and Brooklyn conservatories, and has himself published some very graceful compositions," spoke Miss Carrie Oliphant.

"How nice it must be to have music in a conservatory," said Mrs. Lawrence, seizing upon the word to introduce the information, "We were going to have one this year if we had stayed in Jacksonville, opening right out of the back parlor. Emily got a promise from her pa."

Emily, notwithstanding she had been taught to pride herself upon her "style," looked slightly embarrassed, having a vague intuition that personalities were in some way inharmonious, and also having an instinctive impression that the conservatories Mr. Goldsmidt had taught in might be different from the contemplated domestic improvement alluded to.

"Yes, madam," said a gentleman. "The opening of musical conservatories in our American cities is, doubtless, going to have a most favorable influence upon art among us. Except in the manufacture of superior instruments, America has, as yet, done little, musically; but acquaintance with the works and institutions of other countries has rapidly increased within the last few years, and there is a growing appreciation of true art."

And the history of the Paris conservatory, its development by Napoleon, and the impossibility of his rendering justice to Cherubini, were discussed between the gentleman, Carrie Oliphant, and Aunt Kate, and the talk branched off into little aside questions of abstract justice and art questions, and gave rise to a gay little banter of opinion; and, as Aunt Kate's silvery, amused laugh rang out softly once, the others stopped talking to listen, and Mrs. Lawrence Hadly was surprised at Kate's soft glow of color, and lively, earnest play of words, and at the gentleman's roused attention, and a certain slipping off of a degree of conventionality, that had sat gracefully, into real interest; and Carrie Oliphant, upon leaving, slipped her hand into Mrs. Kate's in a way much as though she had known her all her life.

"I don't yield the point quite, Mrs. Hadly," she said, with playful wilfulness. "I shall keep combativeness active on the subject till I see you again," laughingly; and in some way, though polite adieux were made to the others, yet the lingering sparkle of kindness, and humor, and fellowship seemed to linger around Mrs. Kate, and she looked as refreshed when the last genial good-nights had been spoken as though she had been strengthened with a real cordial.

Mrs. Lawrence had gone down the street the next morning. A carriage came to the door, and Mrs. Porter and Carrie Oliphant asked company to Moorshead for the view.

"The light will be just right this morning. I do so want you to see it," said Carrie. And, when Mrs. Lawrence returned, Emily met her in the hall with an account of the same.

"And don't you think, mother," she added, "Aunt Kate went and wore that brown gingham, and just took her hat and sack from the rack, and went off with them? I had my hair in crimping pins, and didn't go down. I never saw Aunt Kate go on so."

A strange discontent came over the family of Lawrence Hadly. Long accustomed to have their mental horizon bounded by self, an atmosphere of general culture, where each was considered and thought himself but as one of many, and where claims of heart and mind were paramount, proved burdensome. Mrs. Kate's painful realization of vacuum was in their case in a manner reversed. There seemed no balancing force within their own spirits, and it was the outside unconscious pressure that was hard to bear.

In vain Mrs. Lawrence was more than usually particular about the family outfit for the season. In vain she attempted a grand party, remembering the social success of an earlier effort of the kind. She could not solve the trouble. Though kind, simple, and unceremonious, she "could not feel at home with these people." She was sorry when Edmund took a snug little home of his own. Kate had given her a certain support, an intangible help she could not explain or acknowledge, and she missed it painfully.

Trouble increased when Mr. Lawrence Hadly gave up the Gilbert place, and likewise took a small, unpretending house, averring "it was no use to hold out longer. Such expenses could not be afforded, and it was folly to attempt it." Chagrin and discontent settled down upon the household like a cold, gray vapor.

Lily Lawrence was growing to be quite a thoughtful girl. Too thoughtful in some respects, perhaps. Some trouble seemed brooding over her, and one day she came in tears to Aunt Kate.

"Auntie, can't you help me? If you can't, no one can."

"My dear Lily, I certainly will if I can. You must tell me how, dear."

"Do you think it is too late for me to begin to get an education?" asked the young girl, with sudden resolution in her manner.

"It is never too late to improve ourselves, Lily; nor shall we ever cease to have need to do so."

"I don't know anything well, Aunt Kate. I didn't learn hardly anything at the public school, and here the girls of my age are all so far in advance of me, I can't bear even to go. I suppose ma would let me leave school, but I want to know something; I really do, Aunt Kate, and if you think it isn't too late, I'll just go into the little classes and work my way up."

"My dear Lily," said Aunt Kate, putting her loving arms around her, "resolution is the very foundation of achievement. I think I see how I can help you in the same way I have helped Nettie and Susie." And no better, more sympathizing, and hence patient helper, could Lily have found than Aunt Kate proved herself, and the young girl found in the intelligent exercise of her really bright mind a delight she could not before have supposed possible; and hence, notwithstanding the fogs and mental miasma of the household, she dwelt much of the time in a clear, sunny atmosphere of her own.

"It is very strange," said Mrs. Lawrence, "that Edmund's family have taken such a position here. Kate is on the most intimate terms with the Porters, Oliphants, and Wheelers, just like one of the family, and Susie is going to be bridesmaid for Jenny Andrews. And to think that Edmund is going to take the Gilbert place we left, buy it out and out. I think you must be helping him to funds!" in an exasperated tone.

Lawrence Hadly moved uneasily. He was becoming weary of innuendoes. Whatever was said, some secret sentiment of blame for their present restricted circumstances seemed to run through like an undertone.

"So far from my helping him," he replied, with some heat, "it is he that has been helping me from his hard savings, and to my shame be it said, it is impossible to tell when I can refund what he let me have the use of when he came to Jacksonville. Though nominally with me, he has kept his interests separate from mine since we came here, and he has come right up. He says I needn't worry about the old amount; that he is doing well now. I declare, Ed makes me believe in the Christian religion."

"Susie is going to teach in the high school at five hundred a year," vouchsafed Lily, looking up from her books, "and the money that Aunt Kate saved for Miles to go to school with, she can use towards the house, because Miles can board at home and go to the university."

"Seems to me you're pretty well posted," said Mrs. Hadly, with an unpleasant intonation.

"Nettie told me," said Lily, very simply, returning to her books; and further remarks on the social matters of Edmund's family were indulged in ad infinitum.

"Who do you think I saw on the street, Emily?" asked Mrs. Lawrence, coming in one day quite excitedly, and continuing, without waiting for an answer, "Mrs. McGibbon and Mrs. Jackson! We'll have to have them here, of course. I wish we were in the other house. I wish they had come before we got cooped up here."

"Did you speak to them, mother?"

"No, I was so flustered, and they were coming across the street, not very near to me, but I'm sure it was them. I wonder where they stay?"

"Mrs. McGibbon and Mrs. Jackson were you speaking of?" asked the sewing woman, who, aside from Emily, was the only occupant of the room.

"Yes, some old friends of ours," returned Mrs. Jackson, concisely.

"They come here nearly every year," volunteered the woman. "Used to be milliners here; come to see their mother."

"Probably you are thinking of some one else of similar names," returned Mrs. Hadly. "We have been acquainted with these ladies a number of years; quite intimate, I might say."

"That may all be well enough, but I guess I know the Knox girls. Lucindy, they say, married very rich; her husband made a power of money out West; and Adaline married a well-to-do man. They say the place where he lives is named after him. They've known what hard times is, though, as well as anybody."

"I saw Professor Andrews talking to them. I guess their position is good here in society," said Mrs. Lawrence, in a rasped tone.

The sewing woman emitted a gleam of fun from her eye. She understood Mrs. Hadly.

"Certainly, perfectly good. The Knox girls were plain, industrious girls, and always respected. Professor Andrews' family were their first friends; gave them free rent of their shop till they got a start, and were their first patrons. Seems to me it was the professor that introduced McGibbon when they went South for goods; and I've heard tell it was at McGibbon's house that Adaline met Mr. Jackson."

It is lamentable to relate, and I do not like to do it, but truth compels me to state, that after the first greetings, there was felt to be a decided lack of warmth and interest on both sides in the Reamington intercourse between the Hadlys and the Jacksonville ladies. It doesn't speak well for human nature, I know, but there was no real bond of heart or mind to keep them together, and the bond of sympathy, in mere externals and local ambitions, is a most flimsy one, and not better than a cobweb against circumstances.

Mrs. Kate Hadly, on the score of old neighborhood, invited the ladies to her house, and albeit there had never been professions of "intimacy," the spirit of true-hearted hospitality made itself felt to such a degree that the visitors were charmed into their best selves unadvisedly. Baby Floy, a new gleam of sunshine that had come to the Hadly home, quite won Mrs. McGibbon's motherly heart by her pretty ways, and although Mrs. Kate felt a little sudden recoil, something as a single aspen leaf may shiver in a whispered breeze when that lady, in a confidential, complimentary tone, volunteered the information, "I wish my John could see your Susie;" nevertheless, she was gladdened on the whole by the visit. Mrs. McGibbon had let a certain kindness in her nature be evoked by the wonderfully genuine home atmosphere, and Mrs. Kate never suspected it was in a manner the reflection of her own spirit that had brought the flecks of gold to the surface.

Cady Jackson had a great many inquiries to make concerning the Hadlys, when Mrs. Jackson returned from Reamington. Disappointed in matrimonial speculations which his planning stepmother had suggested and approved, he averred that "he knew a girl who wasn't so strait-laced in her notions, and who wouldn't think a glass of wine a heinous crime. He believed he could have Emily Hadly for the asking."

"But, Cady, you can make a more advantageous connection than with the Hadly family if you only reform a bit and take up business," said Jacob Jackson's wife.

"And let myself be mewed up in bands of propriety and sanctimoniousness! No, ma'am! I'll have a home of my own, and I am persuaded I shall keep a will of my own as well."

And Emily Hadly embarked on this perilous sea of matrimony. She had in her young lady life been careful to avoid what her father had in those days stigmatized in Susie as "putting on airs," and she was true to her habit of thought and feeling now.

Alfred, who knew what the young men of his set really were, alone remonstrated, but in vain.

Lily, under the gentle guidance which she asked of Aunt Kate, bloomed into lovely and loving intelligent womanhood. She spent much time with Nettie, and the sweet home influences she there enjoyed were like genial sun and dew, promoting true growth.

Alfred, unable to depend longer upon his father, was forced to go from the paternal roof and trust to his own resources, which were slight enough, poor young man!

Mrs. Lawrence, in the lives of her children began gradually to learn the genuine from the false; began to understand dimly one of Lily's casually dropped assertions.

"It is only what we have within us, ma, that makes us really rich, you know, after all."

Notwithstanding this, however, failing to go back to first causes, Mrs. Hadly used frequently to assert:—

"It was an unlucky day for us that we ever came to Reamington."

Externals are but external, "after all," as Lily said.

I suppose we all expect to change our abode, sooner or later. We all hope to go to live with the angels by and by. I hope we shall not feel as little at home as Mrs. Lawrence Hadly did with the genial, cultivated people of Reamington. I hope the angels will know us for their own as the Reamington people knew at once dear, gentle Mrs. Kate Hadly.

GODEY'S COURSE OF LESSONS IN DRAWING.

LESSON XVII.

PERSPECTIVE DRAWING. (Continued.)

IRREGULAR figures are shown in perspective by finding their points or angles by means of visual lines and diagonals to the distance-point. An example of one such figure will sufficiently explain the mode of proceeding, to comprehend which, however, the mode of finding any point in perspective must first be shown.

Let B H C E, Fig. 15, be the plane of the made equal to K N. From the position or plane of the object O (in this case a flag-staff) draw O G perpendicular to M N, intersecting it at H. From G, with the radius O H, describe an arc intersecting A B at I, and making G I equal to O H. The diagonal D I will intersect a visual line G S at the required perspective position of the object.

In drawings made on this principle, in which a plan of the object is first laid down, with the positions of the station and plane of delineation, paper more than twice the size of the proposed picture is required, which is sometimes inconvenient. This objection may in many picture, S D the horizontal line, B H the base-line, S the point of sight, V the station, and D the point of distance; S D on the picture being equal to K V on the plan. Let M N be the position of the plane of delineation on the plan, and C that of any object (say a tree) beyond that plane. Required the perspective position of such object.

Draw the visual ray V C, intersecting M N at F. From C and F draw C G, F H both perpendicular to M N and H B. Draw the perspective visual ray S I, which is a perspective view of V C. Its intersection with F H is the required point, representing the position of the object.

The same result may be attained in another way. In the following figure (16), the same letters refer to corresponding points as Fig. 15. But the point of distance is now made use of, as in the perspective drawing of squares; its distance D S from the point of sight being cases be removed by inverting the plan, and making the base-line of the picture serve the double purpose of the base of the plane of delineation and of its position on the plan. In this case the station-point, of course, is placed above the drawing, instead of below it, and the plan of the object is shown inverted, below the drawing.

In parallel perspective, the points of sight and of distance have been those chiefly made use of for determining outlines; but in oblique views they are of comparatively little use, and the sizes and forms of objects are chiefly regulated by vanishing-points, the rules for finding which will now be explained. In the street-view, Fig. 2 (September, 1870), and in all views in which lines and plane surfaces are in plan at right angles with the plane of the picture, the point of sight is the vanishing-point of such lines and planes; but in angular views, such as that in Fig. 4 (September, 1870), the vanish-

ROSE LEAVES—NO. I.

BY JOHN S. REID.

AWAKE, again, O long lost harp!
 Resume thy strain, O sounding lyre!
 With all thy warmest, holiest fire
 Imbue with love my aged heart,
 And let us range the mountain's side,
 Or wander through the birchen glen,
 And sing the songs of youth again,
 Which oft we sang at morning tide.

Like mountain bee, from heather bloom;
 Or evening's wind, from fragrant grove,
 Let us extract the sweets of love,
 The essence of its rich perfume;
 And then, as with a diamond pen,
 Inscribe the thoughts of youth and age,
 And bind in gold each virgin page,
 And thus embalm love's flowers again.

Oh! let no thought find entrance there,
 Whose blush would tinge the cheek with shame,
 Nor break the bleeding heart, nor blame
 Too rashly age's brow of care;
 But trace as with the softest line,
 And form with all the limner's art.
 A photo of the human heart,
 Where flowers and fruit their leaves entwine.

For life is but a morning's dream,
 A dewdrop in the ocean's wave,
 An echo from the lonely grave,
 A sand grain by Time's flowing stream;
 Yet oftentimes some flow'ret fair
 Is found within life's vale in bloom,
 Like beauty smiling o'er the tomb,
 Cheering the heart of weary care.

Come, then, O harp, youth's golden lyre!
 Beloved by me in early morn,
 While yet the silk was in the corn,
 And life was full of young desire;
 Come, let us garner up those flowers,
 And make one sweet and rich bouquet,
 Which heedlessly I cast away
 In morning's bright and rosy hours.

And thus we bind, as on one stem,
 The fruits of age and flowers of youth,
 And teach, with words of love and truth,
 The human heart, that priceless gem;
 For who can tell, when time is o'er,
 What that immortal soul may be,
 Though now a sand grain in the sea,
 Which loves death's dark and unknown shore?

MA BELLE.

BY WILLIAM SIDNEY GREGORY.

That you ever think of me,
 If but once a day it be,
 Is an honor;
 For, by those ever brilliant eyes,
 Every thought of thine I prize,
 Madonna!

For, when the twilight, grown apace,
 Your tender thoughts of me efface,
 Supinely,
 Mine, ever constant, round you bide,
 Like ocean, swelling up his tide,
 Divinely.

And when the midnight hour is rung,
 And guardsmen take it on their tongue,
 Repeating,
 My thoughts of thee to dreams are grown,
 The height of any monarch's throne
 Competing.

My every hour of day or night,
 My every thought, or dark or bright,
 Is given
 To you, ma petite reine of earth,
 So near akin of angel birth
 And Heaven.

AT GLENDIMMON FARM.

BY LOUISE S. DORR.

"ORPHANED, beggared, jilted, and all at one fell swoop," wailed Claudia Holt, her proud head bent, her magnificent eyes hazy with grief. At her feet, where it had fluttered from her nerveless hand, lay a tiny, scented note. Its graceful chirography, in the dozen lines it contained, was an ornament to the satiny page. Here were no sharp angles, no erratic individualities, outcropping through the finished elegance of its style. But Claudia Holt had believed its writer "only a little lower than the angels."

Sorrow seems often to be cumulative, and this girl's had come with crushing suddenness. Black night had followed glowing day without the softening transition of an intermediate twilight. Who wonders if, in its primal bitterness, she thought "there is no sorrow like unto my sorrow"? Orphaned, beggared, jilted, the last the unkindest cut of all. She had so trusted Ansel Kingsley! had so exalted him in her heart of hearts! Well, he was fallen. He was of the earth, earthy; a summer friend; a suitor to her wealth and proud position; nothing more. Ah! why had he ever been so much?

But, by and by, her native spirit, of which she was by no means destitute, came to her aid. "Let him go," she said; "he is not worth a sigh. His noble qualities were of my own imagining. They will fit another as well as Ansel Kingsley. It is as if a writer had conceived for her story a hero of lofty character, and had then become enamored of her own creation. Let such folly be for dreamers; I have had my awakening."

She got up, and with nervous haste began collecting together the trifling gifts she had received from him. There were a bunch of pansies, a photograph, graceful, smiling, handsome, like himself; a dried rose, a sea shell, a sketch of herself, sleeping upon the verandah, with a clambering vine falling into a wreath around her head, just as he had found her one glowing summer day; a ring, with their initials wrought together; a volume of poems; a fragment of wood, cut into a profile of herself. These, with a package of his letters, she made into a little parcel, and thrust in a scrap of paper, upon which she had hastily written:—

"What one has discovered to be worthless, one loses without regret. When you are a truer man, I shall wish for you the happiness of which I once thought you deserving.
CLAUDIA HOLT."

Then, having written the address with a steady hand, she called a servant, and ordered the parcel taken to Mr. Kingsley's hotel. She felt an overpowering weariness when this was done, and would gladly have taken a respite from thought. But there was still a grave question to be considered, and she would not put it off. How should she live? What could she do in self-support? Teach? Sew? Paint? Write? She set these several vocations in review before her, honestly considering her fitness for each, and ended by honestly deciding herself unfit for either. Then came again the urgent question, "What can I do?"

Just then there was a gentle tap at her door. Opening it, Claudia found a girl, scarcely older than herself, dressed in travelling costume, lithe and willowy in figure, and having the cheeriest, most sunshiny face imaginable.

"I see you don't intend to recognize me," said the girl, in a light, cheerful tone. "I am your cousin, Bessie Glendimmon. Have you no welcome for me?"

Claudia recoiled from her cousin's caress, and, crouching in a chair, buried her face in her hands. It was one of the aggravations of her grief that Bessie Glendimmon's property, held in trust by her father, had suffered wreck with his own. How could she look the smiling, unconcerned Bessie in the face, having previous knowledge of what must so soon come to her ears? But the smiling cousin was not to be balked of her caress. She came and knelt by Claudia's chair, throwing one arm around her.

"I know everything," she said, softly, "and am so sorry for you, Claudia. But I have come to do you good. Listen now, and see if I have not. I must tell you first, though, that I consider myself the most fortunate girl in the world. Don't shake your head and look so incredulous. It is really and truly so."

"She can't know," thought Claudia. "Oh! what will she say when she does?"

"It is true that, to a certain extent, I am a sharer in your misfortune. I met Uncle Holt's lawyer, on my way here, who told me all about it. Dear Uncle Holt, I wish he could have known how little I would regret the loss."

"Have you no reproach for him, then?"

"No, none whatever. I know he never meant to wrong me. He believed the investment sure to pay me double, perhaps treble interest, or he never would have made it."

Claudia was weeping now, and clinging to her cousin, whose blue eyes also swam in tears, though she was still smiling resolutely.

"But I have not told you yet what I came here for," said Bessie, softly smoothing the other's hair. "You know it was mother's wish that Uncle Holt should have the care of my property, but that I should live with Uncle Dana Goffe, unless something unforeseen should happen to make a change desirable, in which case I was to come to you. While Aunt Margaret lived, I was like a daughter of the house; but when Uncle Dana had a second wife, it certainly was not quite so pleasant. Aunt Eunice is so genteel, you see, that one need be always conning an etiquette book to get on with her at all. Then Una did not like me, I am sure, though I tried to gain her good will. Una is Aunt Eunice's daughter, you know; and then there's a Jerome whom I have never seen, because he is absent on his travels. But I have a conviction that Aunt Eunice was trying to get me worked over to suit the Paulding idea of gentility, so that I might get a chance of picking up Le Grand Seigneur's royal handkerchief when he should have returned. But I did not like the making-over process, and I didn't hanker in the least for the royal handkerchief. So when it was announced that Jerome was coming home, I determined to come here and visit you, thinking it exceedingly probable that I might not return immediately. That probability has since reduced itself pretty nearly to a certainty. The truth is, Claudia, I have made up my mind to live with you."

"Where? In the street?" asked Claudia, bitterly.

"No, indeed!" with a ringing, bell-like laugh. "I haven't mentioned, have I, that I am still an heiress? The property consists of a farm in Holbrook, worth about two thousand dollars; and personal effects valued at half as much more. It was Grandpa Glendimmon's, and you and I, Claudia, are going to turn farmers, and live on our estate. Superb, isn't it?"

"Farmers, Bessie?"

"Yes, indeed!" with a repetition of the bell-like laugh. "I don't mean exactly that we are to plough, and dig, and plant. I am not quite strong-minded, nor yet strong-handed enough for that. And, to tell the truth, I shouldn't quite know whether squashes and turnips are to be planted whole, or cut in pieces, if we should desire a field of those vegetables."

"Perhaps they have to be grafted into something, like apples and pears," Claudia suggested, looking very much as if she would like to smile, if she did not feel it her duty to be so very miserable.

"Well, I shouldn't wonder much, but I shall find out in time. I have already bought two or three treatises on farming, and I intend to book myself up on squashes and kindred topics at the earliest opportunity. I mean to surprise Holbrook farmers by my practical knowledge of their craft. But I may as well tell you, in confidence, that if I should be invited to deliver the address at the next agricultural fair in Holbrook, I have made up my mind to respectfully decline. There! I knew I should make you laugh. Now come out of this close room, and see how the blessed air outside is laden with sunshine."

"The sunshine came in here with you, Bessie. I believe you are a magician, and have wrought a spell upon it, compelling it to follow you wherever you go."

"In that case," said Bessie, laughing merrily, "I shall walk often among my grain-fields when sunshine is needed for ripening their crops. I hope I shall be a specific against mildew and blight in a rainy season."

"I believe you will," returned Claudia, echoing her laugh.

It was late in April that they arrived at Glendimmon Farm. There was a plain, unpretentious cottage on the place, a little dingy upon the outside, owing to the action of wind and weather upon its white paint; and not quite delightful within to the fastidious taste of the city-bred girls. A farmer and his wife had been engaged as the working force upon the place, and were already there. Good, tidy-handed Mrs. Dunn had done her best to make the house attractive, and, to the extent of scrupulous neatness, had succeeded admirably. But the floors were bare, the furniture cheap and inelegant, the ornaments atrocious.

"Never mind," said Bessie. "We shall have a chance to exercise our ingenuity at improvements. Do you know, I always fancied I had a talent for that, hidden away somewhere in a napkin? Besides, I have several years' numbers of GODEY packed in my trunk, and a woman who can't make a house elegant by their aid don't deserve—to own a farm in Holbrook."

I am not going to particularize their various efforts at improvement. It is sufficient to say that shell-work, moss-work, Berlin wool-work, bead-work, wax-work—all were used, and with admirable effect. They had brought with them books, some rare knick-knacks, and a few fine pictures. With these, and the work of their deft fingers, a surprising change was gradually effected. The floors were yet bare, however. Carpets were beyond their means, and there is, unfortunately, nothing that can be substituted for them.

"Never mind," said Bessie, cheerfully. "We shall have to wait. May be the farm will produce a crop of carpets, one of these years, and, in the mean time, we can please ourselves with a glimpse of pre-Raphaelite simplicity whenever we choose to look downward."

At first, the young mistress's practical knowledge of farming certainly was not much to boast of. Farmer Dunn, as in duty bound, always came to her for directions, and very remarkable ones he got sometimes.

"I suppose you will want the barley-ground seeded down?" he said, when a field of that grain had been sowed.

"Yes, I suppose so," was the doubtful answer. "Won't it be a good deal of work?"

"Oh, no! I have only to sow grass-seed over the field."

"Will the field come up to grass, then?"

"Yes, if we get a good 'catch.'"

"But it seems a pity to waste the barley-seed, now it is all sowed. Perhaps you had better use the grass-seed and the 'catch'— whatever that may be—somewhere else this year."

"Yes'm, if you say so. But what sort of object, now, might you suppose a 'catch' to be?" asked Mr. Dunn, quite gravely, but with a twinkle of drollery in his eyes.

"Perhaps a trap to keep the birds from picking up the seeds."

At this there came an explosive laugh from a corner where Mrs. Dunn was administering pepper to an ailing hen; and, genuine laughter being usually contagious, the farmer's gravity gave way at the same time.

"Now, I suppose I have made one of my stupid blunders," said Bessie, with perfect good-humor. "And here is Claudia trying to look as wisely amused as the rest. Perhaps, if you should explain, she would not have to pretend quite so much."

So Mr. Dunn informed her that the grass-seed was for next year's crop, and that "a good catch" meant its coming up well, whereupon Bessie confessed herself much enlightened. But the "capshaf" of all, according to Mr. Dunn, was when he told the mistress, one morning, that they would want plaster for the corn.

"Plaster!" said Bessie, in a bewildered way. "Oh, yes! I know, now. I saw a lot of sticking-salve" (she meant grafting-wax) "in the granary, and Claudia and I will spread it right away. But how do you use it?"

"Well, we tack strips of it along the edges of the corn-field; and, when the crows go to step over, they stick their feet into it, and there they stay. Don't you see?"

Bessie did see the drollery in the farmer's twinkling eyes, and understood that better than she did "plaster for the corn," until the latter subject had been duly explained, when they all laughed together, Bessie as heartily as the rest.

Fortunately Mr. Dunn was shrewd, capable, honest, and a practical farmer, withal, while his worthy wife was as good as a host in the management of dairy and kindred matters; so that affairs, within and without doors, were not likely to suffer from mismanagement.

One day, when the girls had gone into the village to do some simple errands, driving themselves thither with one of the farm horses, they had to wait a little in a store, until some customers, earlier upon the spot, had been served. Two gentlemen, standing near them, were talking about some anniversary service that was to be held in their church the next day, expressing great concern because their organist would not be able to attend, and, like Honestus Woodman when his axe was gone, they knew not where to get another.

"Why don't you offer to play for them?" asked Bessie, in a low tone.

"I would, if I thought they would like it," returned Claudia.

"I am sure they would."

So Claudia ventured to tell the gentlemen that she knew something of the organ, and would willingly play for them if they found no one else. They thanked her warmly, and would be glad to depend upon her, without looking farther. It was accordingly so arranged. Probably her ministration proved acceptable, for within the following week the leader of the choir called to engage her permanently as their organist, offering her a salary of two hundred dollars yearly—not much, to be sure, he admitted, but it was all the society could afford to pay. Claudia accepted the offer gratefully.

"We can have carpets, now, and everything we want to the extent of two hundred dollars," she said, gayly. "I never felt so rich in my life before. And only think! less than a year ago I paid a thousand dollars for a shawl, and never thought of the many to whom such a sum would be a small fortune."

It was a tranquil life which these girls now led at Glendimmon Farm. I do not pretend that it was Arcadia upon which they had fallen. They missed many enjoyments to which they had been accustomed. They were sometimes brought in contact with coarse people. Of society, such as they could have enjoyed, they saw almost none. But what was disagreeable in their lot they bravely bore, and for its many quiet pleasures they were truly thankful. They loved Nature, and, holding communion with her visible forms, drew diverse lessons from her various languages. In summer they cultivated flowers and some of the smaller fruits, looked after their poultry, sewed, read, or sketched. In winter they had always plenty of employment, having usually so many plans ahead that time flew too quickly for the accomplishment of all they wished to do. So the third summer of their residence in Holbrook came around, and so, too, into the church where Claudia was organist came the Rev. Adam Underwood. The former pastor had grown too infirm to continue his labors, and the gentleman we have mentioned came in his place.

I claim that the Rev. Adam Underwood was a man of great strength of character. Perhaps you will agree with me when I tell you that he had been seven years a minister, and was still a bachelor. Let one consider the temptations he must have withstood in the mean time, taking the shape of tea-drinkings, slippers, dressing-gowns, lovely penitents seeking comfort, and various other expressions of feminine sweetness. Alas! that it should all have been wasted upon the desert air, and I think none will wish to dispute my proposition. Mr. Underwood was a slightly-formed man, pale and scholarly-looking, with a massive brow above eyes of veiled fire, a straight nose, sensitive lips, and somewhat of squareness in the chin.

His manner was full of nervous force, his tastes scholarly and æsthetic, his opinions stamped with something of the old Puritanic severity, his intellect clear and incisive. Of whatever subject he presented he struck straight to the root. His sermons were full of pungencies. None knew better than he how to command attention. None desired more conscientiously to use his power for the good of souls. His own emolument was a secondary consideration, though to that he may not have been quite indifferent. I think few men, even among ministers, are. In the parish where he had been lately located there came one of those crises from which the best disciplined ecclesiastical bodies are not always exempt. A division arose. The minister's power became as naught. He foresaw that his usefulness there was ended, and resigned his pastorate. It was about this time that the vacancy occurred in Holbrook, and he accepted a call from the parish there. The society was smaller, and the salary less, than in the place he had just left; but it seemed to be the only opening at the time, and, doubting not that the work for his hands was to be found there, he prepared to do it with its might.

On the first Sabbath of his ministration to this new people, Mr. Underwood became conscious of a pair of keen, magnetic eyes, which watched him from the gallery with unswerving attention. Of course, the eyes were not detached from the usual features that make up a face. Very agreeable features they were, too, and in an ordinary face worth particularizing, perhaps; but in this they only formed the setting for those incomparable eyes. The preacher's manner grew more than ever nervous under their steady glance. He seemed to feel that every sentence he uttered was taken up and tested, and the verdict of true or false flashed back to him in their glowing scintillations. When the sermon was done, and the closing hymn being read, he noticed that the owner of the eyes left her seat for one facing the organ. Then came the organ prelude, in which it was apparent that the player had perfect control of her instrument. The minister could almost have believed that her eyes had wrought upon it a mesmeric spell, compelling it to yield up all its wealth of noble sounds to her control.

"Who is your organist?" he asked, as carelessly as he could of the worthy deacon who walked from church with him at noon.

"Miss Holt. She is considered a fine player. We thank ourselves very fortunate in having secured her."

"Does she live here?"

"Not in the village. It is some three miles, I should think, out to the Glendimmon Farm."

Mr. Underwood asked no more questions, though he may have had to put a strong curb upon his masculine curiosity in order to refrain from doing so; for, in the distribution of propensities at the creation, I am far from believing that woman appropriated all the curiosity.

"How do you like him?" Bessie inquired, when they had gone home that afternoon.

"Like whom?"

"The minister, of course!"

"I liked his sermons very well, if that is what you mean. I can tell better how I like him after we are acquainted."

"Are not his sermons exponents of himself?"

"They may or may not be. I think I have heard that the author of 'Tristram Shandy' wrote very good sermons."

"O Claudia! Sterne and Mr. Underwood! How can you compare the two?"

"I do not. I am only illustrating a general principle."

The Rev. Mr. Underwood sprang into sudden popularity in his parish. He got through a vast amount of tea-drinking within the next month, and submitted to wholesale petting with the patience of a Gymnosophist. In the mean time he had not met Miss Holt; but every Sunday her eloquent eyes criticized his words, with flashes expressing approval or dissent. In preparing his sermons, he began sometimes to find it impossible not to wonder how this stirring thought or that pungent laconism would be received by them. This weakness distressed him greatly, and he tried conscientiously to get the better of it, but with indifferent success. Then came a Sunday when Claudia had left home for a week's visit. Consequently there was a new and much inferior player at the organ. After Miss Holt's it was necessary to "make believe" very much, in order to think the playing nice, like the orange-peel and water of Dickens's Marchioness. People wondered somewhat at the deep humility of their minister's petitions that day. They did not know that he had found preaching stale work in the absence of one pair of eloquent eyes, and that his conscience accused him of having set a human feeling above his Master's work.

Later in the week, while passing the village hotel, he saw Miss Holt alighting from the stage. As she sprang lightly to the ground, her veil was lifted by the wind, and fluttered down at Mr. Underwood's feet. He restored it promptly to its owner, and felt a thrill in every nerve, when, for a brief instant, their eyes met, as she uttered her quiet "Thank you!"

That night the Rev. Adam Underwood held communion with himself. "Whither does all this tend?" he questioned, with the air of one who approached a dreaded subject. Then came up old memories—scathing recollections of a love which had once "burned into his bosom's core;" for which he had been upon the point of yielding up truth, his divine work, perhaps heaven itself, encountering rather the judgment pronounced upon him who putteth his hand to the plough, and looketh back. He had conquered the human weakness, but through this experience he had lost faith in the magnanimity of woman's love. If he had not been a Christian, he might have become a woman-hater. Now, in his review of the old ordeal, he renewed a resolution made years before, that, as long as he lived, he would become no woman's lover. And, in order to make assurance doubly sure, he determined to avoid an acquaintance with Miss Holt. Thus, in his self-communing, the Rev. Adam Underwood settled the matter with himself. It was masterly, but of rough hewing without doubt, which, however, was still subject to the "divinity that shapes our ends."

The next day, while returning from a visit to a parishioner in the outskirts of the town, Mr. Underwood came upon a stretch of road cut through the heart of a densely-wooded forest. It was a sultry afternoon in midsummer, rendering this shadowy retreat peculiarly refreshing. He accordingly lingered to enjoy it. Having converted his bridle-rein into a halter, and the trunk of a tree into a hitching-post, he bethought himself of his herbarium, and walked a little way into the forest to see what specimens it might afford him. Presently he heard voices at a little distance, and soon became aware that the subject under discussion was himself.

"For shame, Claudia Holt!" said one voice. "I am surprised at your want of charity. One would think you had some personal spite against Mr. Underwood."

"And one would think you had caught the infatuation with which all Holbrook is infected. I don't deny that he may be a very good sort of person; but the trouble is that all you enthusiasts are determined to perch him upon Alps, and, when you get him there, it is as much as a dim-sighted mortal like myself can do to see him at all."

Mr. Underwood walked quickly away, not wishing to hear more. His herbarium was enriched by no specimens of that day's gleanings. He went back to his carriage, and drove at a most unclerical pace, until the open road was gained. By that time, the prick which had wounded his sensibility, or it might have been his pride, was somewhat eased of its smart.

"It is all the better," he said, reins in his horse, and proceeding at a slower rate. "If I needed a safeguard, I have it here. The pigmy upon Alps, whom Miss Holt has such difficulty in seeing, will find his own vision clearer through the medium of her scorn." He had now come opposite a farm-house, fronting which was a garden gay with flowers. "I suppose this is where she lives. I've half a mind to leave word here that I can lend her a medium-sized telescope, which may assist her vision, and then send her a sermon on humility," he thought, grimly relishing the idea. Then suddenly he halted, and sprang from his carriage—not, however, for the purpose of carrying out the caustic retaliation he had mentioned. Instead, he called loudly through an open window: "Your house is on fire!"

Worthy Mrs. Dunn ran out, nearly distraught in her terror. "What would she ever do, and Mr. Dunn off to the village, and the neighbors so far away?" she ejaculated, helplessly.

"How can I get to the roof?"

"I can fetch a ladder."

"Do so quickly, then, and give me some palls. I can save the house, I think."

The fire had but just caught when it was discovered. With the active co-operation of Mrs. Dunn, he was soon able to subdue the destroying agent. When the last pall of water had been poured upon the blackened shingles, and Mr. Underwood had his foot upon the ladder to descend, he saw Bessie and Claudia coming hastily toward the house. Whether the smoke had affected his sight, or his unwonted elevation (though one might have thought it was nothing to Alps) made him giddy, will never be known; but, at that moment, he made a misstep, and fell to the ground. The three women ran to his assistance. His head was cut and bleeding, and one hand hung useless from its wrist. He was quite insensible. By great good fortune Doctor Rand chanced to be passing at the time. If not a tower, he was, at least, a good-sized column of strength to the frightened women. By his aid the minister was removed to the house, where he speedily revived, where also his bruises, which were not at all serious, and his broken wrist were properly cared for.

"I have got to go to Ladd's Hill," said Doctor Rand, "or I would drive you home. You are not fit to go alone."

"Mr. Underwood will stay here," said Bessie, quickly. "He got hurt in doing us a service. We must not be so ungrateful as to let him go until he is quite able to do so."

But Mr. Underwood would not be persuaded to remain, though Mrs. Dunn declared it would be madness for him to think of going, and Claudia joined her remonstrances to Bessie's.

"A wilful man maun hae his way!" quoted Dr. Rand, "though, if it were myself, I should not need much persuasion from such pleaders. Which of you two young women is the best horsewoman?"

"Claudia!"

"Then she had better drive Mr. Underwood home. She can return, I suppose, with Farmer Dunn. It would be nonsense, sir, to think of driving a horse like yours with a broken wrist."

Mr. Underwood made a feeble protest against giving so much trouble, and Claudia's speaking eyes shot a glance at Bessie, which told that she was not quite grateful for the preference given to herself in the arrangement. She got on hat, shawl, and gloves, however, thus signifying her willingness to go. It really seemed almost a pity that Mr. Underwood should have taken such trouble with his rough-hewing, since it was to count for so little. He had settled it all with wonderful cleverness only the evening before, and now behold the lady whose acquaintance he had resolved to avoid, seated beside him in his carriage! Undoubtedly there were plenty of young women in Holbrook who would willingly have taken Claudia's place, and would then have thought it a folly worse than Alnaschar's not to make themselves as charming as possible while the opportunity lasted. But Claudia appeared in nowise to regard the occasion as a godsend. Her mood was unaccountably perverse. In nothing that Mr. Underwood advanced would she agree.

"It had been a warm day," he remarked, by way of opening the conversation.

"Had it? She had thought it delightfully cool."

"How fine the landscape on the right! a bright mosaic of brown and gold, and diverse shades of green, rimmed in with purple hills. Did she not admire its quiet beauty?"

"She thought it would be improved by a Niagara or two in the foreground, and a Mount Washington, or something of that sort, among the blue hills in the distance."

"Had she ever visited Mt. Washington?"

"Oh, yes."

"In his opinion, fashion had done a good thing in making that a popular resort. One could not fail, however frivolous or haughty, he thought, of getting truer views of one's self, and of nature's grandeur, while standing on its summit."

"Unfortunately, she had forgotten to bring her pocket mirror when she climbed the mountain, so that she failed to get a view of herself at all from that point of loftiness."

After this manner the conversation proceeded until Mr. Underwood was driven to his boarding place, and very nearly to distraction as well. In taking leave, Claudia hoped he would not suffer greatly from his mishaps, and congratulated him that if the cut on his forehead would leave a scar, it might be concealed by his hair. This was said as seriously as if she thought that a matter of the gravest consequence to him. Perhaps he did feel some solicitude on that point; I can't say. But if he did, I am sure he would never have made any parade of it, and very wicked it was in Claudia to pretend that she believed he could have given the subject a thought. Mr. Underwood, I must say, though he was, may have wished it were not unclerical to indulge in some such mild conjuration as "Bother her impertinence!" But he knew his duty and forgave her directly. How could he help it, indeed, when he considered that, in spite of her perversity, she was the most charming woman he had ever met? You would scarcely have thought him a person to indulge in the infantile diversion of setting up blocks or resolutions for the sake of tumbling them down again. Yet it is undoubtedly true that he spent considerable time at that gainless exercise, while recovering from his bruises. And all because of Claudia Holt.

But I beg her pardon. In following the diversions of Mr. Underwood, I have nearly forgotten to get her home. She was fortunate enough to find Mr. Dunn at the post-office, and in due time reached the cottage in safety, being the bearer of a letter for Bessie, which proved to be rather important.

"They are all coming," said the latter, with a touch of dismay in her tones. "Uncle Dana, Aunt, Una, and Le Grand Seigneur!"

"When?"

"The twenty-ninth; and it is now the twenty-second," meditatively.

"I hope you are not thinking of running away again to escape Le Grand Seigneur's royal handkerchief?" said Claudia, mischievously.

"No need of that. I'm not a rich heiress now, you know. I hope we can make their visit pleasant for them. I don't mean Uncle Dana. He will be sure to be pleased whatever we do. But Una and the rest."

"Will it be difficult?"

"Perhaps not. But Una is a little peculiar, and Aunt is very genteel, and Jerome, judging from their descriptions, is a compound of both. At least, we shall enjoy Uncle Dana, however, and we'll do our best to make it pleasant for the others."

From that time until the day of the arrival, they were all, as Mrs. Dunn expressed it, "up to their elbows" in preparations. The guests came in a handsome barouche, drawn by a pair of spirited thoroughbreds.

"It isn't exactly an irruption of the Goths, but of the Goffes," said Uncle Dana, kissing Bessie and Claudia, and making toward Mrs. Dunn for the same purpose, but she discreetly threw her apron over her face, and bobbed out at the nearest door, while Aunt Eunice, who, as we have heard, was ultra genteel, administered a curt rebuke to her liege lord for his boyishness.

Pending this connubial setting to rights, Una kissed the girls with a rather underdone affection of vivacity, and presented her brother, Jerome Paulding. These two were in no respect alike. Una was a soft, gentle creature, with dusky eyes and hair, and a languid color on cheek and lip. She was sadly wanting in animation herself, and therefore expected everybody to be at great pains to amuse her. When this was done, she was gently amiable, so that people who did not know her intimately were accustomed to speak of her as "not brilliant, certainly, but so good." Yet, underneath this plastic exterior, the nature was cold, exacting, selfish. Besides the personal attractions we have mentioned, such as they were, there was the collateral one of wealth. Una Paulding was heiress in her own right to a handsome fortune.

Jerome's eyes, like his sister's, were dusky, but, unlike hers, they were capable of an almost infinite variety of expressions. He could be grave, or frolicsome; intensely active, or dreamily indolent; proud as a patrician, or gentle as a woman; but, whatever his mood, Jerome Paulding could be no otherwise than a gentleman. Bessie lost her old dread of Le Grand Seigneur immediately, and they soon became very good friends.

There were now gay doings at the hitherto quiet farm-house, first and foremost, because it was necessary to amuse Una; and secondly, because Uncle Dana, Jerome, Claudia, Bessie, were not indisposed to amuse each other. Whatever the success of their first intention, that of their second was unquestionable. Fronting the house was a green, level field. A portion of this was converted into a croquet ground, where much of their time was spent. One afternoon they were all there, inducting Uncle Dana into the mysteries of the game to which the ground was devoted, and waxing very merry over his funny sayings thereanent, when a wagon stopped at the entrance to the field, and from it alighted the Rev. Mr. Underwood and Ansel Kingsley. The latter had only that day arrived in Holbrook, having come thither partly because his cousin was there—Mr. Underwood—partly because of the hunting and fishing, which were fine in its vicinity, but chiefly because Una Paulding, to whom he was engaged, was visiting at Glendimmon Farm. Now this gentleman, be it known, had no more idea of the impending meeting with Claudia Holt than he had of then and there encountering the sovereign of the Moon, whatever may be the name and titles of that worshipful potentate. Possibly Claudia was better prepared, for Una was very proud of her lover, and was not likely to have been silent concerning his expected coming. At all events, the meeting on her part was characterized by cool, high-bred courtesy; on his, by a nervous shamefacedness, such as, it is fair to presume, the elegant Ansel Kingsley had never before been guilty of. Una was on the point of inquiring how it chanced that these two were acquainted, when she discovered that she had a surprise of her own to attend to; and Mr. Underwood, who had remained behind for a few moments to secure his horse, now advancing, recognized in her his own former love.

The meeting between this second pair of lang-syne lovers was eminently unsensational. Only the languid color in Una's face flamed up a little brighter, and the clerical cravat seemed to have got an undue amount of starch for the occasion.

"How do you do, Miss Paulding?" with a bow that was encumbered by the aforesaid cravat.

"How do you do, Mr. Underwood?" And then, with a want of tact habitual in women of her calibre, "What an odd thing that Mr. Kingsley's cousin should turn out to be you!"

"Why?" dryly.

"Oh, because—because—it is."

"A true woman's reason, Una," said Jerome, laughing, and croqueting a ball to a great distance.

"Are we interrupting a game?" asked Kingsley.

"We have only been skirmishing a little, thus far, this afternoon. But suppose we try a game now! Will you take the lead upon one side?"

"Willingly, if Miss Glendimmon will consent to take one of my colors."

"Oh, yes," said Bessie, but Jerome did not look quite pleasant. He had certainly meant that Bessie should play upon his side.

Uncle Dana declined playing, and Aunt Eunice was quite too stately to unbend in any such diversion. So the players were Kingsley, Bessie, and Una upon one side; and on the other, Jerome, Claudia, and Mr. Underwood. They were pretty evenly matched. Mr. Underwood had to learn the game altogether, but then Una was by no means skilful. In the common interest, Claudia found it expedient to forget her old perversity, being very vigilant in helping her clerical ally. Nor did she seem disposed to show favor to any upon the opposite side. The blue, in particular, that being Una's color, was always in her way; and after serving her own advance, and that of her party, it was generally left very much out of its owner's way. At last Una threw down her mallet in a pet.

"You never take my part at all, for fear of hurting Claudia, and I won't play any longer," she complained to Kingsley.

"I don't think Miss Holt is much indebted to my magnanimity," he said, coloring a little, "though, perhaps, it would be only fair if she were, for don't you see that Jerome loses no opportunity to favor Miss Glendimmon?"

"Yes, it's the same with you all. Nobody is worth taking any notice of but these farmer girls. I thought it would be different when you came, but you are just as bad as the rest."

By this time she had wrought herself up to the point of tears, and in that lachrymose state went off to the house. Of course Kingsley had to follow and comfort her, and the game was effectually broken up. A part of this little by-play Mr. Underwood had overheard, and he could guess the rest.

"And I," he thought, "have been making a woman like Una Paulding a standard by which to judge all others of her sex, even Claudia Holt. If I were to confess the impertinence, I wonder if I might hope for forgiveness."

But then he recollected the scrap of conversation he had overheard in the forest, and found he wanted courage for such a confession. He began talking with Mr. Goffe instead upon some general topic. When, by and by, Kingsley and Una rejoined the group, the former was very guarded in his manner toward Claudia. But his eyes followed her movements furtively, and he would break off in the midst of a sentence to listen when she spoke. The truth is, Claudia's beauty had been greatly enhanced during these quiet years at Holbrook, and there was a pith to her occasional utterances which made Una's paltry commonplaces seem sufficiently vapid. Was he contrasting the two, and thinking of what might have been?

Two or three weeks passed, and some part of each day was spent by Ansel Kingsley at Glendimmon Farm. He was sometimes accompanied by his cousin, but oftener not. There were sermons to write, parish and church affairs to look after, and Mr. Underwood was not a man to neglect duty for pleasure. It must be owned, however, that it was daily growing a greater effort of self-denial to allow Kingsley to start off alone. He was not unobservant of that young man's guarded attention to all that Claudia Holt did or said, and was sometimes dimly conscious of a feeling that since it is necessary to love one's neighbor as one's self, he would infinitely prefer that Ansel Kingsley were not his neighbor.

"Ansel, do you love the girl you are engaged to marry?" he asked, abruptly, one day.

"Why? Are you thinking of trying to win the prize away from me?"

"No. Not if the prize is Una Paulding."

"Who then?"

"You know who. It has not escaped me, at least, that even when you are talking to Una, you are thinking of Claudia Holt."

"You were always an observing young man, Adam. I wonder you have not already discovered a second satellite to the earth, or something else equally inscrutable to ordinary vision."

But though he spoke thus lightly, he averted his face, afraid, it may have been, that that would not sustain his pretence of carelessness. He walked to a window, brushed a speck of dirt from his coat sleeve, snipped off a withered leaf or two from an azalia, blossoming on the window ledge, hummed a fragment of the little German song, "Ich denke dein," finally put on his hat, and again faced his cousin.

"So you will not go this afternoon?" he said.

"I have told you it is impossible."

"Oh, yes; that unfinished sermon. Well, don't give the sinners any quarter. Here comes my horse."

On arriving at the farm-house, he found Una alone in the parlor.

"Where are the rest of us?" he asked, after placing a rose in her hair which he had picked in coming through the garden.

"Papa and mamma have gone to ride."

"Well?"

"Jerome and Bessie are driving the sheep out of the corn," with a look of extreme disgust.

"Well?"

"Do you mean Mr. and Mrs. Dunn? I really cannot tell you where they are."

"And Claudia?"

"Oh, yes, Claudia! If I had been missing, you would never have thought of inquiring for me, but it's quite a different thing if Claudia is out of sight."

"My dear Una!"

"I'm not so certain about the 'dear.' Are you sure you love me just as well as when we came here?"

"Quite sure. How can you ask?"

"Because Claudia has such dangerous eyes. And, of course, Ansel Kingsley would be a great catch for a poor girl like her."

"How strangely you talk, Una!" but he had a goaded look, and the adjective Una had applied to Claudia's eyes might have suited his as well.

There were now glorious moonlit evenings. It was arranged that this one should be spent on horseback. Kingsley and Jerome had each a fine horse. Then there were the carriage horses, and two others were procured from the village. Bessie had challenged Uncle Dana to ride with her. He accordingly consented to make the third cavalier of the party. But, when they were all ready to start, Una was seized with a sudden dread of the pawing, mettlesome-looking creatures that, "all saddled, all bridled," were waiting for their riders.

She had never ridden any horse but her own. These were all vicious-looking creatures, she declared. Not one of them would she ever think of mounting. Expostulations, entreaties were all in vain. She would go in the carriage, or she would not go at all.

"Are you sure you will be safe in the carriage with any of these vicious-looking creatures? Hadn't Kingsley better get the farm horses?" asked Jerome, teasingly.

"He can get what he likes, but I'm not going," was the petulant retort.

"Then I believe I will stay, too," said Uncle Dana, "and Kingsley can escort Bessie. The ride was of his own planning, and it seems a pity that he should lose it altogether."

"He can do as he likes," said Una, coldly.

It appeared that he liked to go. The party were speedily mounted, and cantered gayly off; Jerome riding at Claudia's bridle-rein, and Kingsley at Bessie's. After a mile or two, however, they all rode abreast for a little way; and, when they shot off in couples again, the movement known in chess as castling had been skilfully performed. Jerome was now at Bessie's side, and Kingsley at Claudia's. It is but fair to say that the latter gentleman was not responsible for this movement. It originated with Jerome.

Claudia and Kingsley were now left to their own resources. The former had never seemed so full of animation. There was possibly just a twinge of causticity in her humor, but its sparkle was not impaired by that ingredient. Kingsley was unusually grave, however. His spirits seemed to fall inversely as the other's rose.

"O Claudia, Claudia!" he cried, at last. "I never loved you in the old days as I love you now. Be generous, be magnanimous, and forget the past. Let the old relations between us be restored."

"I was not aware of any change in my fortunes," said Claudia, cuttingly. "Ansel Kingsley has, perhaps, heard that I am mentioned in somebody's will."

"I have deserved this, Claudia," he groaned. "But, now, at last, I need have no thought of fortune. Wealth has come to me from an unexpected source, and I offer it to you. Do you believe I could ever have given you up, if I had not thought riches as necessary for you, as I believed they were for me?"

"That does not matter, now. If you really care for me, I am sorry for you," said Claudia, more kindly than at first. "But, for your answer, you may find it in this:—

"The tender grace of a day that is dead
Will never come back to me."

The old love is in its grave. I have not the power, nor yet the wish, to give it resurrection, even if you were free from Una."

"A birthright for a mess of pottage," cried Ansel Kingsley, bitterly. "I will suggest the subject to Adam for his next discourse."

They were presently joined by the other couple, who were now returning, and who gayly accosted them as laggards. They all rode home together, two of the party, at least, being in joyous spirits. I speak of Jerome and Bessie.

The next day Kingsley found Una in a rather impracticable mood. His own was not quite so conciliatory as on former occasions of their lovers' quarrels, so that they did not get on smoothly at all. At last, instead of attempting to parry one of Una's querulous thrusts about Claudia, he related, with a kind of savage satisfaction, the history of his former acquaintance with her, and ended by describing the interview of the last evening.

"And now, Una," he said, "if you choose to marry me after what I have told you, I will keep to my engagement; but there must be an end, now and forever, of your taunts about Claudia Holt."

Una, finding she was really in danger of losing her lover, grew suddenly amiable, and promised to be good, with affected childishness. Thus they were reconciled. Kingsley left Holbrook that day, and the farm-house guests did not remain much longer. Uncle Dana slipped a roll of bills into Bessie's hand in saying "Good-by!"

"It is for your wedding, chick," he whispered.

Jerome outstayed the others by a day or two, greatly to the dissatisfaction of his stately mother. But Bessie, at least, thought that precious day or two the most delicious portion of the whole visit. During the time arrangements were made which rendered it probable that Uncle Dana's present would find speedy use. Claudia declared that Jerome was looking out for a rainy day, and meant to have sunshine in his house whatever clouds might hang outside. As for himself, he had already learned to call Bessie his Sunbeam, Blessing, Heart's-ease—all which loving pet names were not inaptly bestowed, I think, when applied to Bessie Glendimmon.

"Claudia is to live with us, of course," Jerome had said.

And Bessie had answered: "Of course," as if that were a foregone conclusion. But Fate and Mr. Underwood had other designs for Claudia.

"Do you think, Miss Holt," the latter asked, one day, "that you could make up your mind to marry a man, who may be a very good sort of person, but can never hope to make any great show if perched on Alps?"

"I dare say I could if"—

"If what?"

"If he loved me," was the blushing answer.

"He does, Claudia," said the Rev. Adam Underwood, with infinite tenderness in voice and manner.

So Claudia did not live with Mr. and Mrs. Paulding, after all, but the cousins are still the closest of friends. I have not heard that either of them has ever regretted her former residence at Glendimmon Farm.

PARENTAL EXAMPLE.—Your children will be more animated to vigor, perseverance, and self-dependence, the more they witness your exertions to provide for your future welfare. There are few who can witness the daily display of parental and provident care without having the desire created within them of doing something for themselves. "A thrifty father," says a Hindoo proverb, "may have an extravagant son, but a diligent father rarely has an idle son."

THE HARDEST TRIAL OF THE HEART is, whether it can bear a rival's failure without triumph.—Atkin.

SCENE I.—MRS. KILLORCURE and daughter (weeping) sitting in a neatly furnished apartment, supposed to be the family sitting-room.

Mrs. K. Cheer up, daughter. One would think you were one of those forlorn damsels storied in story, who wring their hands before the garret window to which a cruel parent has consigned them. Surely you have not yet arrived at this refined state of misery, and can afford to let the sunshine of hope into your heart. Cheer up, my dear. The proverb, "Faint heart ne'er won fair lady," is equally true if rendered, "Faint heart ne'er won fair gentleman, or stern father." Follow the example of the great Micawber, and patiently wait for something to turn up, and like him, you will be rewarded. You must carry a brighter face than this, to your grandmother's. You are always her pet, you know, and you will make the dear old lady miserable on your account.

Miss K. I know it, mamma, and I must and will control myself, but it is so hard. If papa could be content with opposing Charles! But that detestable Greenly must be forever quoted as his substitute. Ugh! the thought of him gives me the shudders. I have called on Hope long, I think she must be weary, and flies from me, as I have seen nothing of her cheerfulness since that last scene with papa. What should I do without you, dear mother?

Mrs. K. See, my dear, you are not entirely miserable; you have what so many have not—another who loves and can sympathize with you. I know this trial is very hard for you, but your only course is, to be patient, for I am a time only is needed to accomplish our wishes, for your father has a kind heart, which will yet wear out his prejudices. Charles is willing to wait for you, and you must bear the inconvenience of separation, and live in hopes the good time coming.

Miss K. Reason tells me it is as you say, but an indefinite time seems to be so far away, and trials of suspense are so irksome, Shakspeare says, truly: "Hope, thou art a parasite, a hanger on, a keeper back of death." Away, and welcome, grim despair, instead, that I may die. And then to have suspense made doubly tedious by the attentions of a man I despise. Oh dear! oh dear!

Mrs. K. Yes, love, though I do not think your circumstances justify the depths of despair you have quoted, I acknowledge you have reason for sorrow. I will try and obtain for you an interview with Charles before we leave the city, and the remembrance of that, with country air and surroundings, must make you less "pale and interesting" before we return. Just hear my prescriptions for you while there: A romp with Bruno, to be taken in open air, directly before breakfast; a large spoonful of ride on horseback, before dinner; a small dose of music, and a large one of nest-hunting in the barn, for afternoon. You must also wear a large plaster of contentment on the heart at all times, while all my remedies must be fortified by a bread and milk diet.

Miss K. (Laughing.) Really, mamma, just your recital has an exhilarating effect upon me. I will try and do justice to your system, and prove myself a worthy example of your skill. What a curiosity I have to see that dear old uncle Charles tells me of. He loves him like a father, though he has not seen him before in twenty years, and I love him already from hearing so much of his kind sympathy for us.

Mrs. K. He is very wealthy, is he not?

Miss K. Yes, and so eccentric. I wonder if the East Indies are not especially adapted to developing eccentric character.

Mrs. K. That is a question which might involve difference of opinion. But, my dear, we have some purchases to make before packing our trunks, and must delay them no longer. (Rising.)

Miss K. Sure enough, mamma; I had entirely forgotten them. I will meet you in the library when ready. [Exit ladies.]

[Curtain falls.]

SCENE II.—DOCTOR KILLORCURE, in travelling dress, arranging bottles from saddle bags, with powders, papers, etc. Apartment the same as before.

Doctor. The great science of medicine is reaching a point of perfection, which its first disciples, even in their wildest fancies, never dreamed of. Here but the other day I read of an operation where the occiput's back bone was entirely removed and again replaced, after going through the process of scrapus de lengthum. The patient is said to be doing well, and the searchers after the marvellous in surgery have received a fresh impetus in their labors, but I have a tedious round before me, and must be on my way. Where can Mrs. Killorcure be? I will ring and inquire. (He rings, and enters MRS. FLANIGAN.) Mrs. Flanigan, my good woman, will you desire Mrs. Killorcure to step here a moment?

Mrs. F. Is it yerself, docthur, that's forgotten that your good leddy, Mrs. Killensure, has gone to the counthry to spind a wake wid her mither?

Doctor. (Putting hand to his head.) Indeed, Mrs. Flanigan! Now you mention it, I think I do recollect something of the kind. Let me see—if I do not mistake, my daughter Arabella went with her.

Mrs. F. Bedad! it's the illegant mimery ye has, to remimber from the mornin' till noon. Of course Miss Arabilly went wid her mither, an' it's the long face Mr. Granelly will wear till she arrives back again, to be sure.

Doctor. Ah! that reminds me. Where is Mr. Greenly?

Mrs. F. He mintoned over a string of names as long as me arrum, where he was goin', an' it's not the likes of me that can repate thim all, but he tould me ye sint him, and he'd not be back till the afternoon belike.

Doctor. That is unfortunate, very. I have directed a number of persons to call in my absence, to obtain their medicines, and they must not be disappointed. I see no other course than to leave directions with you, Mrs. Flanigan.

Mrs. F. Arrah, and ye may do that same, docthur; an' it's meself that'll dale out the midcines for ye like a jewel. 'Twas a bashen of a docthur I was in me own counthry; sorry's the day I lift it (wiping her eyes), and not a cowlid or a hidache for all the counthry round but Margaret Flanigan was sint for to narse it the day.

Doctor. Silence, good woman, and attend to my directions. This bottle of medicine is for Mrs. O'Reilly's child; to be applied six times a day, certainly. Will you remember?

Mrs. F. That an' I will, sir; six times the day, ye said, sure.

Doctor. This bottle contains the extract of Hyosiamus, to promote sleep; it is for Mrs. Livingston. I will describe her to you: A large, fleshy woman, with a dull blue eye; she complains of sleeplessness because she cannot force nature into eighteen hours of repose. She also fancies herself afflicted with heart disease, and a dozen other ailments, when there is not a healthier woman in my acquaintance. This vial contains eye water; a gentleman will call for it. These two bottles look very much alike, but you will know them apart by the difference in the labels. This with the blue label is for Mr. Hartly's horse—Tom will call for it; while the one with the red label contains bitters for an old gentleman, with whose name I am unacquainted. Now, Mrs. Flanigan, are you sure you can remember?

Mrs. F. Shure, docthur, an' yer orders are as plain to me mind as the nose on yer face. Have no fears but I will supply your place to your admiration, sir.

Doctor. Very well; be careful.

[Exit DOCTOR.]

Mrs. F. Och! Margaret Flanigan, it's a great thrust ye has on yer hands, wid bithers, and eye-water, and the likes. Ye'd betther be after finishing up yer worruk, and thin put on yer bist gown to "do the honors of the house," as Miss Arabilly would be saying.

[Exit MRS. F.]

[Curtain falls.]

SCENE III.—Curtain rising, discovers MRS. FLANIGAN in all the dignity of full dress, wide bordered cap, large bows, etc. Apartment as before.

Mrs. F. Faix an' I'd give anything to have that saucy colleen Jennie O'Brien to see me now, wid Mary to tind the door, and me sitting up in me parlor to resave company like any other lady the day. (Bell rings.)

[Enter MRS. O'REILLY AND CHILD.]

Mrs. O. Will ye tell me, mim, if the docthur be at home?

Mrs. F. He's gone out the day, but he lift his orders wid me, and if ye are Mrs. O'Reilly, he lift some medicine for your little boy. Be sated, ma'am, be sated; and it's a fine little colleen ye has there. What may be the matter wid him?

Mrs. O. Shure and the docthur tould me it was the scalded head, mim; but it doesn't look rasonable to me mind, for it's not scalded or burnt he's been.

Mrs. F. Indade! Well, now, how long have ye been over from the ould counthry?

Mrs. O. But two years, mim, but it seems like two hundred, to be sure. It's not Ameriky that can iver take the place of ould Ireland in me heart, and quite sick I am for the sight of a good smart shillalah fight; an' it's not even a rispectible wake ye get, wid the counthry so hilly that nobody'll die. Bad luck to thim that'll chate honest folks out of their lawful pleasure.

Mrs. F. Arrah! an' it's not the ould counthry wakes we get in this place; but are ye at sarvice, if I may ask a bould question, Mrs. O'Reilly?

Mrs. O. Yis, mim; I worruk for Mrs. Graly just down the strate, an' it's a proper fine place, to be sure. Did ye iver see the likes of the ladies' dress in this quare counthry? It's not meself that can kape in the fashion at all, at all. I kape adding and adding to me water-fall, but it's niver so big as Miss Mary's, in spite of me, and I've put the flounces off and on to me gown till it's as thin as a sieve, to be sure, wid the pricking of the needle through it; but it's the bonnets that's the most diffikilt to kape in size, for I've cut and I've pared at me own, but still it's a thrifle too large beside Miss Mary's. It's thinking I am to tie a ribbon over me ears and lade the fashion meself. But here ye are bleating away, Biddy O'Relly, whin ye promised the mistress to be back immediately. An' did ye say, mim, that the docthur lift the midicine for me little boy?

Mrs. F. He did that same. (Hands her eye-water.) He sid to drop it on six times the day sure. (Bell rings.)

Mrs. O. An' it's going I'll be.

[Exit Mrs. O.]

Enter Mrs. LIVINGSTON.

Mrs. F. Take a cheer, mim; take a cheer. An' the docthur has gone out to spind the day.

Mrs. L. (Very haughtily.) Is Mrs. Killorcure at home?

Mrs. F. No, mim, an' she's spindin a wake in the counthry wid Miss Arabilly, but the docthur lift orders wid meself. Mayhap ye're the leddy he tould me was so slapy; an', if ye are, 'twas the hihosyhamis he lift wid me for yees, an' 'twill make ye slape like a pig in his pen, to be sure.

Mrs. L. (Angrily.) Do you know whom you are addressing, impertinent creature?

Mrs. F. Impartinent, ye says, mim! An' it's well I knows who ye are, wid yer lazy ways, slaping away yer time, and ye think ye are sick, too; but the docthur tould me all about your disases, that there was nothing the matther wid ye at all. Arrah! go along wid yer midicine, slandering an honest woman in her own house. (Offers medicine.)

Mrs. L. (Rejecting it.) I will touch nothing from your hand, insolent baggage! I shall inform Doctor Killorcure of this insult, and then I have done with him. (Going.)

Mrs. F. An' it's not the docthur that'll be waping for the loss of ye or the likes of ye. Indade, he spakes truth whin he says, "It's hard work docthurin well people." Good-day to yees! I hope ye'll slape well. (Exit Mrs. L.) Och! good riddance to the ould thing, wid her blarney about impartinent craythurs and the likes. The docthur'll be after thanking me for telling her a piece of his mind. Indade, an' it's meself that can do the illegant business for him, an' I hope me sarvices will be appraciated in his mind. (Bell rings.)

Enter Mr. HOWELL.

Mr. H. Ah, my good woman, I was directed to call here to procure a vial of eye-water. Perhaps you have some knowledge of it?

Mrs. F. An' I has that same, sir. The docthur says to me, says he: "Arrah, Mrs. Flanigan, an' it's not another person in the univarse I'd trust wid me medicines but yerself." An' highly honored I am by the good gentleman's preference, to be sure. 'Twas this leetle bottle he tould me to give yees. (Hands him medicine for scald head.)

Mr. H. (Going.) I'm much obliged to you, ma'am.

Mrs. F. Oh, not at all, sir; not at all. (Exit

Mr. HOWELL.) It's nothing at all to be a docthur. Sure it's the work I'd like, all the days of me life, to be sitting up in the parlor, daling out leetle bottles of medicine.

Enter GROOM.

Groom. It's the medicine for me masther's horse I've come after, and maybe ye knows where it may be, ma'am?

Mrs. F. Yes, indade, an' I do, sir. "It's the bottle wid the red labil ye are to give to Mr. Hartley's hoss," says the docthur to me, before he lift this morning. This is the one, Mr. Mulronee, and proud I am to deliver the docthur's orders. (He takes bottle designed for Mr. DELMONT.)

Groom. The top of the day to ye, mim.

[Exit GROOM.]

Enter Mr. DELMONT.

Mr. D. Is Doctor Killorcure at home?

Mrs. F. Faith! an' he's not thin. Perhaps ye're the gentleman as was to call for the bitthers? Be sated, sir. (Mr. D. is seated.)

Mr. D. Yes, ma'am, that was the object of my call. Is Mrs. Killorcure at home?

Mrs. F. 'Twas but the mornin' since Mrs. Killemsure an' her daughter lift for the counthry, sir, for a wake's visit. An' it's pining away me young lady has been for some time, an' her mither damed the counthry air neces-sary to her hiltth.

Mr. D. Ah! your young lady is out of health?

Mrs. F. No, indade. It's not out of hiltth she is, unless ye call love a disase; but it's losing the red in her cheeks and the light in her eyes she is, because of the ould haythen, her father.

Mr. D. (Silly.) Ah, I see! The young lady is in love with her father.

Mrs. F. Get out wid yer blarney! Faix! an' ye'd be blackguarding me. It's not that I mint, at all, at all, but that me young lady wants to marry a young gentleman, but the ould docthur will niver consent, but declares she shall marry the man of his own picking, bad luck to him!

Mr. D. Indeed! Who is this young man whom he wishes her to marry?

Mrs. F. Mr. Granely, to be sure, the young midical student of the docthur's.

Mr. D. What is the young lady's objection to him?

Mrs. F. Objection ye says! Arrah! an' his limbs are that long, yer honor, and he's that awkward and grane that me mistress detists him, an' is like to wape the purty eyes out of her head she is, wid the ould gentleman's obstinacy in his favor.

Mr. D. A sad state of things, certainly. But who is the person the lady prefers?

Mrs. F. Oh! it's young Mr. Dilmont ye mane, and a proper, fine young gentleman he is. Faix! and ould Doctor Killemsure says he shall niver step his feet in the house again, sure, which was like a death-blow to Miss Arabilly.

Mr. D. Is Mrs. Killorcure also opposed to the young lady's choice?

Mrs. F. Ah! the good lady is Miss Arabilly's own mither, and it's not a straw she would lay in the way of her happiness, bless her good sowl! It's working on the ould gentleman she is, like water on a rock, but it's the long time she has to wait for his obstinacy to wear away that discourages me young lady.

Mr. D. I am sorry for Miss Killorcure. Certainly a lamentable state of affairs, very. May I trouble you for a glass of water, ma'am?

Mrs. F. Yes, indade. An' I'll get ye a sup of fresh wather that'll do yer heart good, sir. Here are yer bitters that the docthur lift for yees. (She hands him bitters.) [Exit Mrs. F.]

Mr. D. Loquacity is an evil which may be turned to good sometimes. Bless me! what's this? (Examining bottle.) "An invariable remedy for all external diseases pertaining to horse flesh." Ha, ha, ha! My good hostess cannot read, I infer, or else has mistaken me for a specimen of horse flesh. This joke must not leak out. I should be saddled and bridled wherever I went. (Puts bottle in his pocket, and thinks a moment.) Good! capital! just the thing! (Rubbing his hands.) "It's an ill wind that blows nobody good." Ha, ha, ha! What an idea! But I'll do it, though. Yes, that's the very thing. My bitters cannot hurt the horse, while I, being ignorant, swallow this delightful compound, which proves fatal. Of course, I then appear to the doctor as a ghost, and charge him with my murder and its consequences. That's it! "The end justifies the means."

Enter Mrs. F., with a goblet of water.

Mrs. F. A fine cowl'd sup of wather I have for yer honor. (Mr. D. takes water and tries to drink, bursts out laughing, chokes, drinks again.)

Mr. D. Excuse me for laughing, but I am troubled with a ticklish sensation in my throat at times. (Going.) Good-day, ma'am!

[Exit Mr. D.]

Mrs. F. Troubled, indade! An' it's more like he's poking fun at me, the ould haythen!

[Curtain falls.]

SCENE IV.—Curtain rises, discovering DOCTOR KILLORCURE sitting in an arm-chair, in dressing-gown and slippers, reading a newspaper. MRS. FLANIGAN sits near, sewing. Apartment as before. Bell rings loudly.

Enter MRS. O'REILLY, and flings herself down in a chair.

Mrs. O. Upon me word, it's a swate, purty thrick ye've been after playing on me, Doctor Killycure! But I'll be up to yees yet, ye murtherin' ould villain! (Shakes fist.) An' ye thought I'd niver know the difference, may-be, wid me poor leetle boy's head swelled clear up to the ceiling the night. Oh! it's me hubint that'll dot the two eyes of ye, when he comes home this day week. 'Twill please me, it will, to see him tap ye wid his shillalah, and it's meself that'll duck ye wid hot wather if ye comes near me door.

Doctor. What do you mean, Mrs. O'Reilly, by this tirade? Explain yourself. Did not the medicine I prepared benefit your child?

Mrs. O. Is it benefit ye says? Whin me little boy roared as he'd go into fits, when I drapped the vile stuff on, sure, and then his head commenced swelling and swelling, and I kape drapping it on, for ye said six times the day, and me boy is a sight to behold this blessed minit. Is it that ye calls benefit, ye ould villain?

Doctor. Mrs. Flanigan, I fear you have given her the wrong medicine. Without doubt, you gave her that eye-water intended for Mr. Howell, for this is precisely the effect it would produce, while I fear the other medicine will destroy his sight. I must attend to it the first thing in the morning. Please remind me. (To Mrs. O.) Mrs. Flanigan has made a sad mistake, and given you a wrong medicine, but I will prepare a wash that will neutralize the effects somewhat. [Rises and leaves the room.]

Mrs. F. An' it's sorry, it's sorry I am, Mrs. O'Reilly, that I have caused ye so much trouble. Is the little colleen in much pain?

Mrs. O. Och! an' it's rooring pain he's in all the day, an' ye has rason to be sorry, maim. The docthur had better be daling out his own midcines than to bethrusting an ignorant Irish craythure like yerself wid his fiery stuff, to be sure.

Mrs. F. An' whin ye talks about ignorant Irish craythure, I'd like ye to look at yerself the while, an' if ye were not in trouble from me hand, I'd make ye ate yer words, ye insutting huzzey!

Enter DOCTOR.

Doctor. Here, Mrs. O'Reilly, bathe your child's head thoroughly in warm water, and then apply this as often as once an hour during the night. I will call on you in the morning.

Mrs. O. I hope, docthur, ye'll forget the angry words I said to yees, when it was the fault intirely of that dirty craythure. (Glauncing contemptuously at Mrs. F.)

[Exit Mrs. O.]

Doctor. Mrs. Flanigan, this is a bad mistake, very bad, and I fear Mr. Howell will be seriously injured before I can warn him. I fear this is not your only mistake. Did Mrs. Livingston call?

Mrs. F. Is it the slapy lady ye mane? Troth! an' she did, but she got riled at me, and floeing down her midcine and went away. Sure! an' I ould her jist what ye said about her, and that 'twould be little ye'd wape for her loss.

Doctor. Mrs. Flanigan! Why, woman, what have you done? One of my most influential patrons. Was there ever such a succession of blunders in one short day?

Enter GHOST, dressed in trailing sheets, with a deathlike mask. He advances to MRS. F. DOCTOR starts back.

Mrs. F. The saints protect us! Ooh, good Mr. Ghost, do go away! (She starts up to fly, and, stumbling, falls against a door. GHOST comes to within a few feet of her, and stops.) And what ails ye, poor craythure, that ye lave yer grave to trouble honest folks? (Pause.) Is it unasy ye are in your grave? An' thin it's mesilf that'll pray for ye that ye may have rest, if ye'll only go back. Ooh hone! ooh hone! (Puts hand to her face to shut out the sight. GHOST stretches his arm, and points to the DOCTOR, who, very much agitated, addresses it.)

Doctor. What is your business here, fearful presence? What have I done that I should be thus visited? Speak, if thou canst!

Ghost. (In sepulchral tones.) Murderer!

Doctor. By what right do you use that fearful word?

Ghost. You placed the tools of death in ignorant hands. Behold your victim!

Mrs. F. O docthur, it's the spirit of the poor fat gintleman, sure! An' I must have given him the horse midicine, Docthur Killemsure. Heaven forgive me! Oh, me unlucky stars! (Wrings her hands, and weeps.)

Doctor. Is this true?

Ghost. It is. Your act has brought me to my present state; here I remain until you have expiated your sin of carelessness.

Doctor. How can this be done?

Ghost. You have a daughter, whom you are wronging. Unite her to the man she loves, and to the grave I bear the wrong you done me, never to be resurrected.

Doctor. How knowest thou this?

Ghost. Spirits know all things.

Doctor. Is there no other alternative?

Ghost. The name of murderer branded on thy forehead with hot iron. (DOCTOR buries his face in his hands, and groans.) Choose! I will be present to witness, or perform, thy choice to-morrow at this hour. Adieu!

[Exit GHOST.]

[Curtain falls.]

SCENE V. — TABLEUX. Curtain rises, and discovers a richly-furnished parlor. DOCTOR KILLORCURE in great agitation. MRS. FLANIGAN the same. CLERGYMAN. Enter GHOST at outer door, glides along, and takes station at a window. Enter MRS. KILLORCURE, followed by the bride, leaning on CHARLES DELMONT'S arm, and looking very happy. GHOST glides along, and takes station behind bridal pair. CLERGYMAN rises, and stands before them. GHOST extends his arms, as if to bless them.

PONDROUS PAPERS—NO. 4.

AFTER we left Stockton, we concludid we had time for a trip to San Francisco before goin' up to the big trees, as June is early enough for goin' there, we was told. So we joggled off down to the city.

We didn't have no adventures worth mentionin' on the way, but when we got to the city, Mr. Pondrous was most as much surprised to find it had grewed so, as I had been at every-thing I had seen since I left home.

We rode through the streets, and rode, and rode, and didn't know nothin' where we was agoin to; we was like cats in a strange garrit. We drove by lots of houses lookin' for the sine of a tavvern, but couldn't see none. Bime by John asked a man where was the hotel.

"Which you wish to go to?" says he. "Russ House? Cosmypoilyton? Kneepoilyton? or what? There is the Cosmypoilyton right over there."

"O John, don't go there!" says I. "It strikes me chilly to go into such a grand place. I should lose myself; it is worse than the one at Stockton."

"Don't you know some little quiet hotel, Mister?"

"No, I don't, but my cousin keeps a boardin' house on the next street, No. 246; I know she has an empty room, and I reckon she'd let you have it."

The man went off laughin', and we turned up the street he pointed out to us. Mrs. Freeman, his cousin, didn't care about lettin' us have the room; she might have a chance to rent it for the year before we were ready to leave.

I told her I did not care if I left the city the very next mornin'; it was too confusin' for anything.

"Why, you haven't seen none of the sites yet," says she.

"Well, what is there to see except streets and houses? I have seen enough of them aready."

"Oh, you must go out to Woodward's garden, and to the north beach, and the Cliff House."

I like gardens, and thought if they had a very fine one down here, I'd like to see it. Mrs. Freeman concludid to let us stay, and took us up to our room, which was real cosey. When I got rested, I begun to like San Francisco better. I could see from my window, houses up and down the street, all painted stone-color, with little gardens in front, with a glow of bright flowers among the spruce looking trees. I don't mean that they were spruce trees; they looked more like little cedars, but they was all trimmed up, some of 'em as slim as a dandy with corsets on, and some their branches spread all out close to the ground, like Mrs. Fanham's hoop skirt, and come up in a point at the top. Perhaps it was their natural way of growin'; I don't know.

The next day we went out to Woodward's garden; Mrs. Freenan's little girl went with us. We rode in a street car, and of all the people that got in and out, I never see the beat. It seemed as though I must be dreamin'. The ladies was rigged out in ev'ry kind of stile. There was one woman sittin' by me, she must have been as old as I am, to say the least, and she had one of those little spots of lace bonnets on the top of her head, and her hair was combed back from her face, iron-gray in color, and on the back of her head were great braids of jet black hair. I never saw the like before.

When we got to the garden, where a flag was wavin' over the gate, we went in, and a man who was standin' at a window in a kind of little room among the trees, nodded to us; so says I to him:—

"Howdy do, Mr. Woodward; we've come to see your garden."

He kind of smiled, and said: "Two bits a piece, and children half price."

Then John gave him some money, and we went along a few steps further, when Mary Freeman said:—

"Don't you want some water, Mrs. Pondrous?"

I told her I did, because she seemed to wish me to; so she pulled at the top of an iron post set near the path, and water ran out of the post into a cup.

"Now drink," says she, "and then I'll show you everything about the garden. Now there's a statue. Do you like statues?"

I did not like it much; it had such dirty feet and queer toes; so had all the statues in the garden. I wonder if a baby's toes, left to themselves, would grow like them? I don't think they would.

So we went along a little further, and there was a house like the palace in Beauty and the Beast; and there was the beast, too, sure enough. Right over the front door, jest as though he had stepped out of the chamber window to growl at us, was a great white bear.

On each side of the palace, were long glass houses full of flowers. I thought the garden would have looked better if they had been planted outside round among the trees. We went into the outer court of the palace, and there was a fountain with goldfish swimmin' round in the water; and on each side were great glass cases full of all manner of birds, with gay feathers, green, red, blue, and yellow. I begun to have a faint idea of what the birds of Eden must have been like, only they were living, and these did not look as though they were alive. We went through a door beyond the fountain, and there was a room hung all about with pictures; very beautiful they were, I'm sure. Among them was one in which, as I looked at it, the green leaves shook, light and shadow went and came, and the scarlet flowers were like reality. I went nearer, eagerly. Why, it was reality. I was jest looking through a picture frame into one of those glass houses full of flowers. I soon found my way round among them, but I must say they did look best through the frame; distance had lent enchantment. When I put out my hand to pick a bud, Miss Mary said:—

"Take care, Mrs. Pondrous, you mustn't pick the flowers."

"Why, will the beast be after me if I do?"

"No, the beasts are shut up in cages at the other end of the garden. But it is against the rules to pick the flowers, or grapes, or anything. Shall we go and see the beasts now?"

So we went out the other side of the beasts' palace, and there was a rotary boat just as big round as the pond it was in, and little children were rowin' it, highly delighted that they could make it move with their own hands. Up on the hillside opposite at some tables under the trees were a party of grown-up folks having a picnic. I saw their wine bottles glitterin', and felt like goin' up and giving' them a temperance lecture.

Jest then John come along, talkin' so fast and eager with a gentleman.

"Look here, Janey, do you know who this is?" Then, seein' I didn't, says he: "Why, it's our old friend Mr. Sunbrite that we used to know to home."

"I'm proper glad to see you, Mr. Sunbrite," says I. "And I'd like to see your wife, too. Where is she?"

"That's jest what I've benn tellin' Mr. Pondrous. We live over the Santa Cruz Mountains, and I'm goin' to start for home to-morrow mornin', and I want you both to go with me. Millie will be enamored tickled to death to see you, that's so. We'll go in the cars to Santa Clara, where I left my team, and then I'll take you right on over to my home. Hurrah!" he burst out, givin' John a slap on the back. "Tell you what, ma'am, I never was so glad to see anybody since I come to Callforny, as I was to see John Pondrous this day. Says I to myself, says I: 'I've struck gold this time.' Now, you'll go over, won't you?"

"I'll be real glad to go, Mr. Sunbrite."

"Yes, and I've been tellin' Mr. Pondrous to sell out his ranch, and come down this way to live. Splendid climate; want you to go over and find you a place near by us."

"But it ain't so easy sellin' an out of the way farm like mine; nobody wants to live there," said John.

"Oh! well, well, you may have a chance, you may have a chance. There's nothin' like havin' your eye out."

"The lawful sakes, Mr. Sunbrite, do you really think so?" says I, for he had lost one of his eyes when he was a little boy, and I always supposed before that he considered it a real misfortune, havin' it out.

"Yes," says he, "like enough you'll have a chance to sell when you least expect it, and it's well enough to know there's better places in the State than your'n is."

By this time we had walked all round the garden, and, as we was goin' out, John asked Mr. Sunbrite if he wouldn't go with us out to the Cliff House in the afternoon. He said he would, as he had got about all his business attended to. So about one o'clock he come round with Mr. Pondrous, and we started. Mr. Sunbrite said he would drive, as he knew the city pretty well. I don't know which way we went, but bimeby we left the city behind us, and there was the broad sky and the country hills.

Mr. Sunbrite pointed out the lone mountain, though the graveyard wasn't in site. However, we had a good view of the German graveyard, and it was the most curious one I ever lid see. Mr. Sunbrite called them semeterys. After a while we come to a very level road, and Mr. Sunbrite said it was a race course.

"I've seen some pretty little races here in Californy," says he, snapping the whip cheerfully. "Even the ladies get excited about them, and watch the trot with as much interest as the men."

"Do ladies go to races here in Californy? Why, how dreadful! We never used to think of such a thing back in our good old New England."

"But ladies go there, now, as much as they lo here; now, that's so."

"Well, I declare, how can they?"

"I shouldn't wonder a bit if you should go to one before you get back home, Mrs. Pondrous. Now, there's a team comin' up on the track behind us; they mean to pass us, but I guess"—

And then he touched the horse with the whip, and the horse lay back his ears as though he knew what Mr. Sunbrite guessed, and away he went about as fast as John Gilpin ever rode. The wind blew hard before, but it seemed to blow a great deal harder now, and I had all I could do holdin' holt of my hat, veil, and shawl. I was oazed, but Mr. Sunbrite's one eye twinkled with satisfaction; and, when we got to the end of the track, and the team went by us, he asked if it wasn't exciting.

I told him it was, for I was almost excited enough to take the reins away from him. But the first thing I knew we was at the Cliff House, which is built on a cliff close to the sea. We turned down a road that had been cut in the rock, and so we got down on the shore where the waves came rolling up on the sand. Away out from the shore some great rocks rose up out of the water, and there were the lazy seal at play upon them.

"The famous Seal Rocks," said Mr. Sunbrite, with a wave of his whip. "And look, Mrs. Pondrous, here is a dead seal washed up on the sand."

"Poor little seal, how pitiful!"

"Do you like ruins? There is a ruin, no mistake."

The wreck of a ship, a sad-lookin' old hulk it was, but it added as much to the interest of the scene as a ruined castle would have done. I got out and picked up a few shells, and we soon drove back to the city. When we got there, I went to a store and got some little books for Mrs. Bally's children, and Mrs. Denmak's, too. Then I got a present for Miss Spencer; she had been so kind to me.

I went to bed early, and slept well till long towards morning, when somethin' seemed to strike the corner of the house an awful blow that made it reel, and the bed heaved up, too, so it didn't take much effort on my part to git out on to the floor. Before I could hardly ketch my breath, I heard the rushin' of feet, slammin' of doors, and cries of women as well as children. I never was so scart in my life before.

"John, what is it—an earthquake?"

"Yes, but don't be afraid," says he, holdin' on to the bedpost.

"Where is the key to our door, John?"

"There is no use goin' out there, Janey. You're safer here than you would be in the street; the house is not goin' to fall. Do come to the window, and see what frightened frights are in the street now."

Even in my terror, I couldn't help noticin' how an English woman in the next room was tryin' to get her children out of danger.

"Come hout quick, children, or hi'll kill you, hevry one hof you. Come back 'ere hand 'elp me, 'Arry," she continued, to her retreatin' husband.

"He is airy, sure enough," said John, as we saw him appear in the street below, in his drawers, without coat or hat.

I told Mr. Pondrous I was glad we were goin' to leave San Francisco that mornin', for I'd had enough of its earthquakes. About eight o'clock we took the cars for Santa Clara. I felt bad to leave our good old horse in the city; but John said they'd take care of him at Fenessy's stables, unless there come a very big earthquake. Now, what I think is—that John Pondrous was just as scart as I was when he clung to the bedpost. JANE PONDROUS.

A WISH FULFILLED.

BY CORA HUNT.

"I HOPE to Heaven, Fred, you will get your deserts some day for your nonsense!" And pretty Sue Raynor, all flushed with anger, and trembling with the fright her mischievous brother had given her, continued her way along the hall to her room.

Fred, however, only laughed gayly, and sauntering out of the front door, betook himself off to his father's office, where he assisted in the capacity of book-keeper. He was a young man of twenty-two years of age, quite tall, and had fine dark eyes, ever beaming with mischief; chestnut hair, inclined to curl, and a young moustache, which he was given to petting, and which partly concealed the ripe, red lips, ever ready to smile. In fact, he was at once the pride and pest of his mother and sisters, for he never let pass an opportunity unimproved to frighten or trick the ones he loved best; so it happens that we hear his sister Susie desiring him to meet with a just reward for his misdeeds.

"I think it is too bad of Fred," said she, on reaching her room, where her younger sister Clara was reclining lazily on a lounge reading a novel, and going to the basin she bathed her flushed cheeks.

"What has he done this time?" asked Clara, looking up.

"Oh, nothing unusual," was the reply; "he just sprang out from the recess in the hall—you know it is somewhat dark there—and caught me with such a fearful gripe, and kissed me. I thought he had gone to the store, and was totally unprepared for such an encounter; you know I'm nervous anyhow."

"Yes, I know," said Clara, in a sympathizing tone of voice, for she had often been a victim herself. "I think it is wrong. It does not affect me as it does you, though, to receive a fright. I wish we could retaliate, but he is not easily scared. Oh, say, Sue, wouldn't it be fun if he would only mistake a stranger for one of us, and kiss her that way. Oh! what a joke!" And the mere idea of such an accident made her laugh until the tears streamed over her cheeks. Even Susie now laughed, and said:—

"Let's find some way to be revenged. It would be such a satisfaction."

While these two are plotting, we will peep at Fred, who has just settled himself in the office chair, at his father's place of business. "Jupiter! how lovely she is to-day!" he exclaimed, as a lady with blonde hair passed the window. She certainly was a beauty. Fred was quite right when he expressed his admiration. He had seen her very often as she passed the office where he sat, quite unconscious of the havoc she was making in his heart. He was very much in love, and often when she passed, he walked a little way after her, in order to see her more nearly. He did not know her name even, but he knew that she had very lovely golden hair, in which the sunbeams seemed imprisoned; a lovely complexion, and peachy cheeks, and eyes of heavenly blue. No wonder Fred loved. How he wished that by some means she might enter his father's office. He would certainly be able then to discover, at least, her name; and what bliss it would be to talk with her. It was while he was thus thinking that she passed, and more than usually charming even. In mad haste to get another look at her, he gathered up his hat and rushed to the door, never perceiving that the unknown lady had paused, and had placed one hand on the knob. Consequently, when he reached the door, he gave it a fearful jerk backwards, and brought her in rather suddenly, while he was in the act of rushing out. The inevitable result was a collision. To say that both were astonished is to put the case very mildly. The concussion caused both to lose breath. The next instant the lady recovered, and her blue eyes flashed dangerously, as with heightened color she exclaimed, in indignant tones:—

"You're no gentleman, sir!"

Our hero blushed to the roots of his hair as he stammered:—

"I beg your pardon. I—I—had not the least idea—"

"So I should imagine!" said the lady, curtly and, turning her back, walked out again.

Fred looked after her in bewilderment, then returned to the seat he had so hurriedly vacated, and sat down to think over the adventure that fate had so unkindly led him into. "What had she come for?" "Who is she?" were questions that vexed him for many a long day after. When he went home that night, he was unusually quiet, and ate his supper in silence. His father had not seen the misadventure, for he had stepped out a moment before, and therefore was as unconscious as the rest. His sisters, however, only conceived it to be the prelude to more mischief, and were correspondingly watchful; but they were secure, for Fred remained quiet enough.

Retiring early, he did not rest well. Repeatedly he called himself a fool; indeed, he could not but remember that she had expressed her doubts as to whether he could think. A hundred times he bewailed the unkind fate that had driven her from the door, when, had she been allowed peaceable entrance, he would in all probability have made a favorable impression; then, too, he might have discovered her name and residence. He could get no further, but go over and over the unfortunate event, and reiterate that he was a fool. At last he fell into a troubled sleep, and dreamed all sorts of impossible things, and curiously mixed up with all kinds of absurdities was the face of the lady he had so outraged. Morning dawned, and Fred hastily ate his breakfast, then walked savagely towards the office.

"What in the world has come over Fred?" said Susie to her sister. "I do hope he is not in trouble," she continued, with sisterly solicitude, her face a little anxious, and a serious look in her brown eyes.

"Perhaps your sisterly wish of yesterday is being fulfilled," said Clara, half-wickedly, but inclined to view the matter in a less serious light than her elder sister.

"I am sure I don't wish him any harm," sighed the other.

"Oh, let him alone," laughed Clara; "he will be all right in a day or two."

After Fred had reached the office, he remained quietly busy for some time, but his eyes would frequently wander to the street. For some days he watched in vain. "She has chosen some other street than this to pass to wherever she goes," he thought. The next time he saw her it was through his window, but she was on the opposite side of the street, and she was casting furtive glances toward the door where she had been so unkindly received. But Fred took heart because that he had seen her at all, and so recovered his spirits. Once again his sisters had reason to complain of his mischief.

"Isn't Letty Carrol lovely?" said Clara as the sisters were discussing the pleasant little party they had attended the evening before. "I wish Fred had gone with us." Fred had a previous engagement, and they had been attended by their father.

"Yes," assented Susie; "and she has such lovely blonde hair, very much like yours, dear, only sunnier."

"I feel greatly flattered, I'm sure," murmured Clara. "But I thought her greatest charm lay in her manner. I felt acquainted right away. She told us to call her Letty, too, and was sure we would be such excellent friends."

"Yes, and she promised soon to come and see us," responded Susie, with enthusiasm.

A few days passed, and Miss Carrol came, but in the afternoon. Her visit was returned, and she came again and again. In fact, she became quite intimate in a short time, for the friendship of girls is of rapid growth.

Fred had heard of the visitor, but had never seen her. In fact, he thought little of it, for his sisters had many friends.

Once Miss Carrol came to spend the day—that is, she came about eleven o'clock, and, having been greeted and relieved of her things, proceeded to make herself at home. Soon after Fred came in, and started to his room to prepare for dinner. Hearing light footsteps, he stepped aside into an alcove in the hall, and waited for his supposed sister to come within his reach. A moment more, and he clasped a light feminine form in his arms, and printed a sounding kiss on the red lips. Shriek after shriek sounded through the house, and Fred fell back in dismay, for it was the fair unknown he had held in his embrace, and who was now bounding away in fright to his sisters' room. The whole house had been roused by Letty's cries of distress, and anxious questions and inquiring glances were bestowed on our unlucky hero, who looked the culprit he was. Fred fled to his room. Let us sympathize with him in his trouble and self-condemnation, as with the gentle Letty, for she had recognized her assaulter, and her astonishment and indignation cannot be described. Now she burst into a flood of tears. Susie and Clara, although desirous of mending matters, were nearly stifled with laughter because of the literal fulfilment of their desires.

"Does your brother—always—greet your visitors in that style?" sobbed the fair girl.

"Oh, no!" cried the sisters, in a breath, and both talked as rapidly as possible in trying to exculpate their brother.

"But I don't understand," persisted Letty, for she could not remember the last meeting without the first, and the sisters knew nothing of the former escapade.

"Indeed, Letty," said Susie, calmly, seeing how seriously their sweet friend took the affair, "it is Fred's usual habit to frighten us girls every opportunity that offers; he is so mischievous. He had not the least idea you were in the house; and, when he kissed you"—here Letty's tears flowed afresh—"he thought he had one of us, for, where he was, he could not see who it was until too late."

Here Clara stifled a laugh, while Susie continued, with what she imagined was conclusive evidence in her brother's favor:—

"Besides, he never saw you before; so how could he mean offence?"

"Didn't he, indeed?" muttered the offended Letty.

"Oh, no!" urged Susie, thinking she referred only to the latter part of the sentence.

Here Clara, seeing that there was but one way of settling the affair, darted out of the room, and in a moment more returned with Fred, who felt very much as if he were about to be hung. Clara had told him her name.

"Miss Carrol," he began, but she turned away. "Nay, hear me," he urged. "'Tis but right that I should have a hearing, when I desire most humbly to beg your pardon for my unfortunate mistake. I had not the idea of a stranger being in the house, and it was my purpose to catch Clara, whom I imagined it was, and give her a fright. I hope you will forgive my rudeness."

"But how can you explain your former attack?" haughtily inquired Letty, looking him full in the face.

Poor Fred reddened painfully, as he began:

"Indeed, Miss Carrol, I must beg that you will take my word for it, that then, at least, I meant no harm, since we were then strangers. I rose in great haste to leave the office, and most unexpectedly encountered you. I assure you my astonishment quite equalled your own."

"So you have met before?" cried the girls.
"Oh, tell us all about it!"

Fred and Letty looked at each other, and both burst into a laugh, for now the whole affair looked so ridiculous.

So they became reconciled, and Fred remained on his good behavior many a day after.

"Now, do tell us all about it," said Susie, when her brother had been dismissed, "for we can't understand."

So Letty told them, and they laughed until their faces were wet with tears.

"But you have not explained how you came to visit father's store," said Clara. "I'll wager it was to see Fred."

Letty blushed. "Oh, no! You see my uncle's office was the very next door beyond, and I was going there with a note from father, who had not time to come. You see I often went that way to walk or to shop, and in a fit of abstraction I stopped one door too soon, and that's all of it."

Fred found it necessary to take Miss Carrol home that evening, and she invited him to call on her. I am bound to say he did so—a great many times. He kisses her now, and she does not object. Clara and Susie are to stand as bridesmaids when the marriage takes place, which is to be before many months have passed.

THE POET'S DREAM.

BY EMMA NASH.

'Twas a golden dream:
All yellow with light,
Where fleecy clouds swam
In a sky all bright—

'Twas a golden dream:
As poets all dream,
With never a wave
In life's fevered stream.

With never a wave,
With never a sigh,
And the glorious sun
All gliding the sky—
All gliding the sky
(So the poet dreams),
And piercing dark clouds
With its sunny beams—

And chasing all care,
And chasing all thought
Of the earth's dull way,
As if earth were naught—
'Twas a golden dream,
Where fair flowers bloomed,
And the rosy air
With their sweets perfumed.

Thus the poet dreams—
As his yellow hair
Kisses the pillow
In ripples so fair—
As if molten gold
From his noble head
Had been poured along
His worn weary bed—

With his violet eyes
Of tenderest hue,
That looked as if bathed
In their own sweet dew—
Closed in soft dreams, and So modestly hid
'Neath the silken lash
And the illy lid.

Oh, blessed are the dreams
Of a mind so bright!
Which God illumines
With his own great light—
For the poet is
The favored of God,
If even in life
He kisses the rod:

Of sorrow and grief,
Of gloom and despair—
His beautiful dreams,
With visions so fair,
Of golden-hued clouds
And skies of azure,
Where the angels sing
In rhapsodies pure—

Is his other world
To which he can steal,
And his inmost soul
To his God reveal—
What cares he that this Sad everyday life
Is weary with thorns,
Of sorrow and strife?

He closes his eyes,
And flowers most fair
Spring up and conceal
The thorns of despair;
E'en a bed of straw
Seems the softest down
That ever was robbed
From the whitest swan.

His pure, radiant soul
Throws a golden hue
O'er the coarsest meal
And his garments few.
What cares he for gold,
With his golden thought,
Which is brighter far
Than what gold e'er bought?

What cares he for lore,
When the softest eyes
Appear in his dreams,
Like stars in the skies,
And shower their light
Of wonderful love
O'er his radiant soul
From the clouds above?

In the discovery of truth, in the development of man's mental powers and privileges, each generation has its assigned part; and it is for us to endeavor to perform our portion of this perpetual task of our species.—W. Herwell.

WORK DEPARTMENT.

CHILDREN'S CLOTHING.

CLOTHING FOR A GIRL EIGHT YEARS OF AGE.

To make a Plain Skirt.—Cut it long enough for a twenty-four-inch skirt; allow about two inches for the hem, and half an inch to turn in at the top. The number of breadths used in a skirt depend on the width. It should measure ninety-four inches all round at the widest part of the hem. Make the front width sloped away with a gore on each side. If the width of the material brings a join at the back of the skirt, make the two back breadths plain; but if there is only one breadth behind, let that only be plain; gore the side widths for a child.

terials as long-cloth, alpaca, etc., are the same both sides, and can be reversed. The size of the body can be ascertained by measure by the directions for measurement recently given, or can be taken from the pattern of a body for a velveteen tunic, which will follow, as it is useless to reiterate directions. The body should be lined with union, or, if colored, a black and white speckled gingham or linen; such as is sold for dresses makes a nice lining. The body is stitched together under the arms, and on the shoulders. The backs require an inch-wide hem; the stitches should only be taken through the lining. At the waist it must either

Fig. 1.

Fig. 3.

Fig. 1 shows the way the skirt is joined. They are, of course, one, two or three breadths each side (those marked B B), according to the width of the material. A is the front breadth, the dotted lines showing where it is gored; B B are the side breadths, and C half of the back breadth. To cut gores, the breadth must be folded on the slant, allowing enough at what is the broad end of the piece, after they are cut apart, to make the narrow end or top of the other. Fold it on a table, press down the fold with the hand, and cut it. The gores for the two sides must be folded different ways, as illustrated by Figs. 2 and 3. Breadths gored together can only be used for opposite sides, when the material has no reverse. Such mabe put into a band or piped, and the piping hemmed on the wrong side. To put it in a band, cut a strip of the material about two inches wide. Turn in two inches, pin to the body, and stitch it to it on the right side. Cut a similar strip of lining, and, after the bone cases are put on, pin it on the wrong side and hem it to the body. Turn in the lower edge of the band and of the lining of the band, and sew them together. To join the skirts, pin the breadths first, and then run them neatly, taking a back stitch every time the needle is inserted afresh. Keep the gored side uppermost. Overcast the edges afterwards. In working with a machine, tack the breadths when one is gored, and keep that one uppermost. Lay the skirt on a table to turn up the hem, and make a little plait in it wherever it is required. Pin it, and then run it neatly, taking a frequent back stitch. Plait the skirt at the waist, turning down half an inch first on the wrong side. Pin the plaits and afterwards sew them together. Then sew them to the band of the body. A good pattern for a sleeve will be given with the velveteen tunic. An easy way of trimming children's frocks is with braid or ribbon velvet. Black always looks well on any color, and any color on black. Lay the braid on the skirt or body, which should be spread on a table; steady it by a pin or two. Tack it along slightly. Then take the work in the hands, or to the machine, and sew on the trimming.

CAP BASKET.

Materials.—Claret-colored woollen reps, and silk of the same shade for lining; green silk braid of the usual narrow width; blue braid; corn-flower; blue, green, red, light, and dark yellow purse silk; straw-colored sewing silk; black silk cord; two black and yellow (mixed) silk tassels; two oval wooden beads, covered with black and yellow spun silk; card-board.

Our model, which is ornamented with braid and embroidery, consists of two box halves, of unequal breadth, pushed into each other, formed out of two rounds of card-board, the larger measuring nine inches in diameter.

The outer card-board edge is three inches broad, and the smaller edge must fit into the larger. Both the rounds for the bottom are worked in point Russe.

The striped patterns are worked in corn-blue and green alternately, and these, in the middle, form a square. The green braid is enlivened with separate stitches of red, and the blue with dark yellow silk. The arrow-like figures are in the same colors alternately. The green straps have red, and the corn-blue straps have dark yellow stitches. All the straps are ornamented on the outer sides with stitches of yellow sewing silk, and at their point with leaf-like stitches of light yellow purse silk.

The four square patterns of the middle piece, forming a star, are worked likewise in raised stitches of green and corn-blue silk, and edged with dark yellow.

The remaining patterns are in light yellow. Before the two bottom pieces are sewn to the corresponding edge parts, the broad embroidered edge on the inside only and the narrow edges on both sides, must be covered with silk.

Then both the bottom pieces must be covered inside with a silk lining, and a round of card-board firmly gummed on. Two black silk cords, fourteen inches long, are placed at the opposite side of the basket. Each of these ends is drawn through a round bead.

The tassels are of silk, to match the double silk cord. The whole is completed by a black braid riche round the outer edge.

DRUM PINCUSHION.

THIS pincushion is in the shape of a drum, with two pins with ornamental heads, for sticks. A straight piece of stuff, an inch and a quarter high, and four and a quarter inches wide is required, and two rounds, measuring an inch and a quarter. It is stuffed with bran and emery powder. The top and bottom are covered with a piece of white silk; the edge is ornamented with a little band of velvet; on the cross, with stitches of gold-colored silk. Black and white pins are placed in close rows and lines all over the sides of the drum.

NIGHT-DRESS SACHET, TATTING AND EMBROIDERY.

Materials.—Figured piqué; medium-sized twisted and red Turkish cotton; thick embroidery cotton; four yards of red sarcenet ribbon (one inch broad); a piece of sarcenet or ribbon of the same color three and a quarter inches square.

This pocket is twelve inches high in the middle, and fifteen inches broad at the straight and the tatting, with two threads, may be easily worked from design.

The separate closed eye in the middle of each of the outer scallops is easily placed in working the row of crochet chain stitch in the tatted picots, by carrying the crochet thread wound upon the shuttle through the stitch, and looping the separate eye close on to it in order to take up the crochet row again. The border is upper edge; it requires two separate parts. In cutting the part for the back, allowance must be made for the three and a quarter inches broad flap that turns over.

Fig. 3 gives the outer scallop trimming in full size; Fig. 1 the two middle pieces, with the colored ornamental part. The outer open border has a quilled ruche. The embroidery, which is made to suit the shape of the piqué, is worked with red and white cotton, and that fastened to the crochet edge by taking the crochet with the wrong side outwards, and working wide button-hole stitch upon the piqué. The button-hole edges of the foundation turned inwards are afterwards twisted round with cord-stitch. This ornamentation, which is worked for border and flap all in one, is finished off with embroidery, in the form of the round. The tatted parts of the middle are firmly fastened by their picots with button-hole stitch and the centre stitches filled up with guipure. At the flap, the narrow stuff edge outside the fastening of the border is turned inwards, and fastened with the ribbon ruche, and then the pocket is made with the calico lining. Round an outside black triangular piece, completes the form of the cushion. The brioche must be always worked on the same side.

Crochet always through the whole stitch, one double; then stick the needle in the next the outer edge, both parts of the stuff are joined with red button-hole stitch, which closely joins the crochet row, carried, however, under the tatted edge.

The pocket is fastened with buttons, the loops of which are carried under the bows ornamenting the flap.

CROCHET BRIOCHE.

Materials.—Six-thread fleecy or double Berlin wool.

This brioche is worked in separate parts, joined together.

The stitch is a single loop crochet stitch, called point Moscovite. Six parts, in alternate Turkish colors of red, blue, and green, form a large figure in the shape of a star, which, with stitch of the preceding row; draw one loop through, and work in this loop four chain: as the fifth chain cast off the loop upon the needle, and by that means fasten the loop formed by the five chain stitches.

Then one double in the next stitch of the preceding row; then one loop stitch in the following stitch, and so on alternately. In each following row work the loop stitch in the double, and the double stitch in the loop stitch of the preceding row, so that the loops are transposed. Begin each of the six large parts at the under point. Make a chain of three stitches, crochet one chain, then one double, one loop stitch, one double in the three chain stitches made. Now draw the needle out of the loop of the last double about to be made, pass the ball of wool through the loop, and carry it along the back of the work, and at the beginning of the second row draw as a loop through the one double stitch. In this one double stitch work first one chain, then one double, and one loop stitch. Here always work through the thread lying loose at the back as well as one double stitch in the next loop stitch, then one loop stitch, and one double in the last double each, however, at the broadest loop line, and form the triangle by decreasing. Each separate finished pattern must be worked round with one row of double stitch with yellow floselle. Then the several parts are properly arranged and sewn together, the yellow stitches being overcast with black cross stitch upon the right side. In joining the parts together, care must be taken to make all the loops of the of the preceding row, in which at the last stitch work through the hanging loop and the under thread of the edge stitch of the preceding row. Then, as in the last row, leave the loop of the last stitch hanging free, and carry the thread back to the beginning of the row, which is worked exactly like the second row, so that the third row also contains the described increase of three loop stitches. Work on in the same manner as the beginning, continuing the increasing upon the same side.

Work in this manner till the number of loop stitches has been raised to twelve, by increasing one in each row; therefore, in the same proportion, and in the same manner, one in each row will be decreased until there is only one of the two double stitch inclosed loops to crochet, and with this the pattern ends. During the decreasing, loop the thread at the beginning always on to the first loop stitch of the preceding row, and crochet in this one double; leave the first double of the preceding row free. At the end, crochet the loose loop already in the double stitch over the last loop stitch together.

The six three-cornered little pieces are exactly the half of the large pattern. Begin large patterns fall downwards. The beginning forms the under point.

The brioche must be neatly made up over a nicely-shaped cushion, and a loop of cord put in for the handle, round which a row of chain loops must be worked.

WINDOW BLIND IN MOSAIC.

Materials.—Silk or glazed calico in various colors, card-board, wool, wooden tassel heads, floselle.

THIS blind consists of hexagons joined together, as shown in full size in Fig. 2. Seven hexagons of three colors, forming a contrast, are inclosed in the white ground, forming a rosette. According to our model, the colors are irregularly placed, and in every possible variety. A dark red middle is surrounded by yellow and blue alternately; a mauve color by green and pink; a light yellow middle is surrounded by dark red and blue; a blue centre by two shades of yellow; a red by two greens; violet by blue and yellow; gray by blue and yellow. In this manner the colors may be varied according to taste. The joining hexagons of the separate rosettes are white throughout. With this, and all mosaic work, the greatest accuracy must be observed with regard to the size and form of the hexagon. For each hexagon, the silk must be fastened over card-board, the two straight side edges lying opposite to each other. The edges of the silk must be turned over on the wrong side, as shown in Fig. 2, and carefully fastened at the corner with a stitch. The two are then exactly fitted and sewn together, according to design. The even stuff edges represent the lead that unites the panes of glass in colored windows.

The piece of card-board is pushed out with the thumb, and may be used for other hexagons as long as it remains stiff. The whole blind is lined at the upper cross end, and at the two long sides a dark brown hem is placed an inch broad. At the bottom, the lining is cut to the pattern. The tassels are of bright-colored wool, and the wooden tops are covered with filoselle.

TUB PENWIPER.

A NOVELTY FOR A FAIR.

Materials.—Wood-colored Berlin wool, a little fine pack thread, a few strings of steel beads, No. 5; little pieces of black cloth.

BEGIN from the middle of the bottom, and crochet over the pack thread in double stitch, making the necessary increase for the ground to measure two inches in diameter. The height of the straight edge is one inch; this is also worked with the same number of stitches, and the pack thread regularly drawn round and worked over.

In the last row the handle is formed on both sides by working ten stitches only over the stitches that cover the pack thread, which close on again after the third stitch of the double stitch row.

By working over with double stitch without pack thread (in the third and eighth stitch three double), the handle acquires the pointed form shown in the design. Two little hoops of steel beads are formed by tying bead upon bead upon one thread, and then sewing that on separately. The middle is filled up by making a second ground, and working from the middle.

In each row, and with each stitch, a piece of cloth, three inches long and a straw's breadth, must be worked, which must be always looped in the middle with the stitch. If the strips should not appear thick enough when done, a row more may be easily placed in between afterwards.

inches long, including the curve, twelve inches wide. Fig. 1 shows the frame of the footstool; a piece of thick tape, two inches wide, is fastened across the stool, so as to give the cushion a firmer hold. The cushion is made of brown Holland, and filled with horse-hair; it is two inches high, and is tacked on the footstool. It is then covered on the top with gray and white striped ticking; the latter is ornamented with point Russe embroidery of colored purse silk. On both sides of this stripe, work small stars and a Grecian border in point Russe. The cushion is edged with a thick woollen cord.

THE VALUE OF GELATIN AS FOOD.

The general appreciation of articles of food more or less exclusively gelatinous, such as isinglass, jellies, calves' feet, cow heel, calf's head, etc., was, a few years since, denounced by some persons as an error; and, in opposition to the general experience and common sense of mankind, they maintained that gelatin and gelatinous articles of food were of no value whatever, and that the benefit of, say, half a pint of strong calf's foot jelly solely depended on the tablespoonful of wine which it did or did not contain.

The grounds on which this extraordinary opinion was based were chiefly twofold: firstly, that gelatin is not found in the blood; and, secondly, that an animal fed on nothing else than gelatin speedily dies of starvation. The absence of gelatin from the blood does not prove that it is not nutritious. Milk is the model food, the only substance expressly created for the nourishment of animals, and which has no other use in the economy of nature. Now the albuminoid, or flesh-forming substance, in milk, is the curdy matter, or casein; no one can deny its value, except, perhaps, the persons who say that gelatin is not nutritious; for casein, like gelatin, is never found in the blood. If we turn to the latest, and certainly the most exhaustive, treatise on physiology which has been recently published, namely, that of Marshall, we shall find that the value of gelatin is thus stated: "Gelatin is not found in the blood itself, but when digested, is converted into a gelatine-peptone, and so becomes absorbed as we have seen, but in what state is not yet known. Nor is its destination in the nutritive processes of the body certain. Either it may serve for the direct nutrition of the gelatin-yielding tissues, or—and this is very probable—it may by itself, undergoing oxidation, conserve other more important tissues, and at the same time maintain the temperature of the body. Its efficacy, as administered in jellies, etc., in cases of sickness, especially indicates its importance as an article of diet."

Doctor Edward Smith, F. R. S., in the fourth edition of his valuable "Practical Dietary," states that gelatin "exists very largely in the skin, horns, hoofs, tendons, and bones of animals, and in a less amount in the flesh. Hence we obtain it from calves' feet and cow-heel when boiled for that purpose, from the shin, and other parts of beef when prepared for soup, and from bones which have been broken and boiled for many hours in water. Whether, therefore, as jelly or in soup, this substance is largely eaten; and yet it is affirmed even to this day that it is innutritious, and therefore worthless as food. Experiments have proved that gelatin, like albumen, is transformed within the system, and leaves the body as urea, and hence it must have played its part in nutrition; but whether its nutritive value is quite equal to that of albumen, is another question. We believe gelatin to be a valuable food, and every one knows that, with the addition of wine, and other substances, it is a very agreeable one. It is, however, very probable that it is not an economical food as it is ordinarily prepared, but it may be cheaply obtained in soup from bones."

We now come to the second so-called argument by which the uselessness of gelatin is attempted to be maintained. It is said that an animal fed on gelatin dies rapidly of starvation and inanition. This is perfectly true; but the fact is, that no simple substance given alone will support life. The most nutritive materials, such as albumen, fibrin, gluten—to say nothing of such substances as starch or sugar—all equally fail to support life when given alone. Good wheat bread will support life any length of time; but separate the starch, gluten, and other constituents, and give them singly, and if the argument above adduced holds good, you could prove each of these substances to be totally without value as food, as neither will support life when used alone.

We believe that this false opinion respecting the valueless character of gelatin arose from some experiments on the feeding of convicts in some of the French prisons. They were supplied with a very small quantity of gelatin in place of other articles of food, and soon showed symptoms of starvation. The fact that dogs, though they die rapidly when fed on perfectly pure gelatin, will live any length of time if kept on soft bones, which consist almost exclusively of gelatin and bone earth, is a convincing proof that the gelatin is a valuable article of diet.

MISCELLANEOUS COOKING.

To Boil Salt Pork.—Allow one-third for shrinking; change the water as soon as it boils. Have ready a kettle of boiling water to fill the kettle. Let it boil very slowly. When tender, take it up; remove the skin and bones, and dot it with ground pepper. Serve with plain potatoes, turnips, and cabbage, each boiled by itself. Indian pudding boiled with the pork is a proper dessert, with a sauce of cream and sugar, or maple syrup. The same dessert is proper for boiled ham, bacon, and pork; but the vegetables of pork and bacon should be plain, while those to be used with the ham should be dressed. For baked ham, the pudding should be baked.

Pork and Parsnips.—After the pork is fried, it should be cut in small bits, and boiled parsnips mixed with it cut in small bits, and rolled in flour; let them heat through together. Some make a sort of parsnip stew with pork boiled in small pieces with parsnips. The pork should be well freshened before adding the parsnips.

Curled Cress.—Wash clean, and lay on a dish; let each season to suit themselves at table.

Fricassee Parsnips.—Cut the parsnips in chunks about two inches square, or as near square as convenient, boil until tender in salted water, skim them out, and brown gently in butter; when nearly brown, dust over them some flour, and let it brown, but not burn. Take them from the pan, and add to the butter a little of the water in which they were boiled; if there is not sufficient butter in the pan to form a gravy, add more; if not as thick as brown gravies usually are, add a little flour mixed, free from lumps, in a very little of the water from the parsnips, stir it in, and pour the gravy over them.

Boiled Rabbits.—To keep a rabbit white when boiled, it should, after being well washed, be allowed to lie in salt and water until perfectly cleared from blood, and then be tied in a clean cloth, and placed in water just about to boil, and having a little milk in it. A good white sauce should be made, and the rabbit well covered with it.

Mushroom Soup.—Pick and peel three-quarters of a pint of mushrooms, wash them thoroughly, and cut them up into dice. Stew them in half a pint of veal gravy. Prepare some good soup stock, season it to taste, and thicken with two ounces of butter and two tablespoonfuls of flour. Add the mushrooms and the gravy they have been boiled in to the stock. Boil all up together and serve.

Mutton Pies.—Raise some small pies with paste for raised pies; have ready a mince made as follows:

Take the lean of part of a loin of mutton and a little of the fat, mince it fine, put it into a stewpan with a small piece of butter, pepper, salt, chopped parsley, and onion, stir it about two minutes over the fire; when cold, place the meat in the pies, put on a puff-paste cover, brush them all over with egg, bake for an hour, take the top crust off, pour in some good hot gravy, and serve them hot.

Stew Soup.—Two pounds of beef, five onions, five turnips, three-quarters of a pound of rice, a large bunch of parsley, a few sweet herbs, pepper and salt, two quarts of water. Cut the beef up in small pieces, add the other ingredients, and boil gently for two hours and a half. Oatmeal or potatoes would be a great improvement.

Toad-in-the-Hole (a Homely but Savory Dish).—One pound and a half of rump-steak, one sheep's kidney, pepper and salt to taste. For the batter three eggs, one pint of milk, four tablespoonfuls of flour, half a saltspoonful of salt. Cut up the steak and kidney into convenient sized pieces, and put them into a pie dish, with a good seasoning of salt and pepper; mix the flour with a small quantity of milk at first, to prevent its being lumpy; add the remainder and the three eggs, which should be well beaten; put in the salt, stir the batter for about five minutes, and pour it over the steak. Place it in a tolerably brisk oven immediately, and bake for one hour and a half.

Braised Leg of Mutton.—One small leg of mutton, four carrots, three onions, one faggot of savory herbs, a bunch of parsley, seasoning to taste of pepper and salt, a few slices of bacon, a few veal trimmings, half a pint of gravy or water. Line the bottom of a braising-pan with a few slices of bacon, put in the carrots, onions, herbs, parsley, and seasoning, and over these place the mutton. Cover the whole with a few more slices of bacon and the veal trimmings, pour in the gravy or water, and stew very gently for four hours. Strain the gravy, reduce it to a glaze over a sharp fire, glaze the mutton with it, and send it to table, placed on a dish of white haricot beans boiled tender, or garnished with glazed onions.

Baked Minced Mutton.—The remains of any joint of cold roast mutton, one or two onions, one bunch of savory herbs, pepper and salt to taste, two blades of pounded mace or nutmeg, two tablespoonfuls of gravy, mashed potatoes. Mince an onion rather fine, and fry it a light-brown color; add the herbs and mutton, both of which should be also finely minced and well mixed; season with pepper and salt, and a little pounded mace or nutmeg, and moisten with the above proportion of gravy. Put a layer of mashed potatoes at the bottom of a dish, then the mutton, and then another layer of potatoes, and bake for about half an hour.

Asparagus Sauce.—One bunch of green asparagus, salt, one ounce of fresh butter, one small bunch of parsley, three or four green onions, one large lump of sugar, four tablespoonfuls of sauce tournée. Break the asparagus in the tender part, wash well, and put them into boiling salt and water to render them green. When they are tender, take them out, and put them into cold water; drain them on a cloth till all moisture is absorbed from them. Put the butter in a stewpan with the parsley and onions; lay in the asparagus, and fry the whole over a sharp fire for five minutes. Add sauce, the sugar, and sauce tournée, and simmer for another five minutes. Rub all through a sieve, and, if not a very good color, use a little spinach green. This sauce should be rather sweet.

CAKES, PUDDINGS, ETC.

Bath Buns.—Beat up together a quarter of a pound of flour, the yolks of four eggs and the whites of three, with four spoonfuls of solid fresh yeast, and set it before the fire to rise; rub ten ounces of butter into a pound of flour, and add half a pound of sugar and two ounces of carraway seed, well mixed in, then make up into the required shape, strew with carraway seed, and bake on tins.

French Pancakes.—Two eggs, two ounces of butter, two ounces of sifted sugar, two ounces of flour, half a pint of new milk. Beat the eggs thoroughly, and put them into a basin with the butter, which should be beaten to a cream; stir in the sugar and flour, and when these ingredients are well mixed, add the milk; keep stirring and beating the mixture for a few minutes; put it on buttered plates, and bake in a quick oven for twenty minutes. Serve with a cut lemon and sifted sugar, or pile the pancakes high on a dish, with a layer of preserve or marmalade between each.

Oat Cake.—Mix a handful of real Scotch oatmeal with a little water and a pinch of salt, rub in a little butter; make it of a proper consistency to roll out with a rolling-pin. Roll out a round cake about the thickness of a silver quarter, and put it on the girdle on a clear fire. When slightly browned on the under side, take it off the girdle, and toast the other before the fire. The materials for each cake must be mixed up separately.

Geneva Wafers.—Two eggs, three ounces of butter, three ounces of flour, three ounces of pounded sugar. Well whisk the eggs; put them into a basin, and stir to them the butter, which should be beaten to a cream; add the flour and sifted sugar gradually, and then mix all well together. Butter a baking-sheet, and drop on it a teaspoonful of the mixture at a time, leaving a space between each. Bake in a cool oven; watch the pieces of paste, and, when half done, roll them up like wafers, and put in a small wedge of bread or piece of wood, to keep them in shape. Return them to the oven until crisp. Before serving, remove the bread, put a spoonful of preserve in the widest end, and fill up with whipped cream. This is a very pretty and ornamental dish for the supper-table, and is very nice and very easily made.

A Very Simple Apple Charlotte.—Nine slices of bread and butter, about six good sized apples, one tablespoonful of minced lemon-peel, two tablespoonfuls of juice, moist sugar to taste. Butter a pie-dish; place a layer of bread and butter, without the crust, at the bottom; then a layer of apples, pared, cored, and cut into thin slices; sprinkle over these a portion of the lemon-peel and juice, and sweeten with moist sugar. Place another layer of bread and butter, and then one of apples, proceeding in this manner until the dish is full; then cover it up with the peel of the apples, to preserve the top from browning or burning; bake in a brisk oven for rather more than three-quarters of an hour; turn the charlotte on a dish, sprinkle sifted sugar over, and serve.

Dried Fruit Pudding.—One cup of sweet milk, half a pint of dried fruit stewed, one cup of molasses, one and a half pints of flour, one teaspoonful of cinnamon and spices, one teaspoonful of soda dissolved in milk. Eat with rich butter and sugar sauce.

Bread Griddle Cakes.—Soak the bread over night, add sufficient milk for a batter, a little salt and soda, with a handful of flour, and one egg to every pint of soaked bread. A bowl full of soaked bread in a pan of buckwheat batter, is considered by some a great improvement; no doubt the cakes are rendered more healthy by it.

CONTRIBUTED RECEIPTS.

Cream Pie.—Roll out one crust, putting it in a pie pan. Take one or two large apples, cut in about eight pieces; they must be good cooking apples; put the pieces of apple all over the pie crust. Take one eachful of good sweet cream, sweeten with sugar, stir in about two teaspoonfuls of corn starch, flavor with lemon, pour over the apples, and bake. Grate nutmeg over the apples before putting in the cream.

Fruit Cake.—Three-quarters of a pound of raisins, two small cups of currants, one full cup of sugar, three-quarters of a cup of sugar and fill the cup with molasses, one cup of sour milk, three cups of flour, two eggs, three-quarters of a cup of butter, a quarter of a pound of citron, one teaspoonful of soda, flavor with cinnamon, cloves, and lemon. In mixing the cake, I prefer putting only part of the fruit in the batter, all the currants, and part of the raisins. I then put in a layer of butter, then a layer of citron and raisins, until I fill the pan for baking, lastly putting in the batter; this prevents the fruit from being burned on the outside of the cake. Bake about an hour and three-quarters; it requires a good hot oven.

Ginger Pound Cake.—Three eggs, a quarter of a pound of butter, two cups of sugar, one tablespoonful of ginger, half a teaspoonful of cloves, one large teaspoonful of soda, one pint of milk (sour), one pint of molasses, two pounds of flour, sifted. We bake his cake in cast iron gem pans, heating the pan and filling each cup. It may also be baked in one large cake. We bake the small cakes about twenty or twenty-five minutes. Sweet milk can be used in either cake, using cream of tartar with the soda.

D. F. M.

Tapioca Cream.—Soak three tablespoonfuls of apioea in a little water (or milk) over night; then add a quart of milk, and steam it slowly, until it comes to a boil, or until soft. Then add a little salt, the beaten yolks of three or four eggs, two-thirds of a cup of sugar, scalded in, beating it to a cream first, adding a little essence of lemon or vanilla as a flavor. Let it away to cool in the dish you are to set on the table. When ready to use, whip the whites of the eggs, adding a teaspoonful of white sugar to one egg spread on the top just before setting on the table; essence improves the frosting.

An Excellent Cake.—Two cups of sugar, three of flour, one heaping cup of butter, two-thirds of a cup of milk, in which is dissolved half a cup of corn starch; two teaspoonfuls of baking powder, and the whites of twelve eggs. Beat well. F. A. S.

L. A. GODEY: I send you my receipt for Charlotte Russe, which is very fine, and different from any I have seen in your BOOK, in response to the many calls that have been made for it. Dissolve half an ounce of isinglass in a cup of sweet milk; have ready a pint of rich cream, into which stir powdered loaf sugar until it is very sweet; as the freezing destroys the sweet taste, flavor with vanilla, beat up the whites of seven eggs very light, stir the dissolved isinglass into the bowl of cream after it is sweetened and flavored, stir until it thickens, then stir in the whites of eggs. Put the mixture into a mould lined with sponge cake. The mixture, omitting the cake, put in moulds, makes what is called "Italian cream." It is not necessary to put it on ice, without the weather should be warm; setting the mould in cold water will be sufficient.

Respectfully yours, F. C. D.

Soap Ball for Softening and Whittening the Hands.—Take a cake of brown Windsor soap, and shave it all up; sift the flour out of one pound of oatmeal, add a little glycerine, and mix all up into a ball; add a little water if not easily moulded.

For Beautifying the Nails.—Take a piece of pumice-stone and pound it to a fine powder, and sift it; put into a little pot. Then glue a small piece of chamois leather on a piece of flat wood. Dip the fixed leather into the powder, and rub on the nails. This imparts a fine, glossy, pinky surface.

CLARKSBURG, HARRISON COUNTY,
WESTERN VIRGINIA, Jan. 28, 1871.

MR. GODEY: I see in your last August number, under the head of "Contributed," two receipts; one for gold, and the other for silver ink, from F. L., of California. It is obvious that its contributor compounds those articles for sale, as it is not likely that any one in these modern times would try to make the ink under his difficult directions. I will give you the receipts in the way I have often made it, and any child can make it in less time than it takes me to give it.

Gold Ink.—Gold bronze and thin gum arabic water, so as to flow easily from the pen.

Silver Ink.—Silver bronze and thin gum water as above. Write slower than with common ink. Bronze can be bought at a paint or drug store for 60 or 75 cents per ounce.

PROF. JOHN A. CAMDEN.

MISCELLANEOUS.

To Get Free from Ants.—Quicklime is most effectual in destroying ants, if some is put on the window sill, or wherever they get in. This was tried in a larder which was infested with them, and was quite successful, not one remaining nor reappearing, though the quicklime was put down months ago.

Mustard that will Keep.—The following is a receipt for mustard that will keep good a long time after it is made: Take best mustard, four ounces; salt, one ounce; mix thoroughly in a mortar; then take six ounces of water which has been boiled and allowed to cool; mix, and keep in small jars well corked. The best kind of stopper is the one with India rubber band and spring, which, when lifted, loosens the stopper.

Everton Toffee.—Warm, and rub a pan with a little butter, put in a pound of brown sugar, with three tablespoonfuls of water, let it boil on a slow fire till it becomes a smooth thick syrup, then stir in half a pound of butter; when it has boiled about half an hour, drop a little on a plate, and if it becomes hard and leaves the plate quite clean, it is enough; pour it about half an inch thick on a dish or tin well buttered. From twenty to thirty drops of essence of lemon stirred in, after it is taken off the fire, gives it a pleasant flavor.

To Clean White Wool Mats.—A piece of soap should be boiled in a little water, so as to make a very strong lather, and this is next mixed up in a sufficient amount of rather more than lukewarm water to wash the mat in, more of the boiled soap being rubbed on those parts of the mats which may require additional cleansing. Wash the mat well, and then prepare more water in the same way, and after a second washing, give it a third in similarly prepared water, which ought to be sufficient to clean it thoroughly. Now rinse it in cold water until all the soap is removed, and put it into another water in which has been mixed just sufficient blue to keep the wool of a good white, and prevent its having a tinge of yellow. After this the mat should be thoroughly wrung and shaken, and then hung out in the open air, where the sun is not very scorching, and with the skin towards the sun. It must be very often shaken while drying, as otherwise it will be crackly; and I should recommend its being frequently turned—I mean hung up first by one end and then by the other—until it is perfectly dry.

SOME HINTS ABOUT WORDS.

TWENTY years ago, Archdeacon (now Archbishop) Trench published his excellent little work, "The Study of Words." Its subject, as the author explains it, is "the study of the use and abuse, the origin and distinction of words, with an investigation of the treasures contained in them." Those who have not read this admirable book should procure it, if they desire to form a conception of the wealth of poetry, history, and moral teaching involved in many of the simplest words which form part of our every-day speech.

Doctor Trench's book has proved to be the first, and probably the parent, of a long list of works on the same subject or on allied topics. The last, and one of the best of these, is Mr. Grant White's interesting and instructive volume on "Words and their Uses,"* which we can commend to our readers as containing many suggestions likely to be useful to all who desire to speak and write the English language correctly. The author has the qualities of a true critic of language. He knows that there is a science in speech, and an art in style, and that both the science and the art have their laws. Any transgression of these laws is an offence to him, which he is prompt to detect and chastise, not so much in order to punish the offender as to amend the fault.

A large part of the volume is taken up with the examination of particular words which are apt to be misused or misunderstood. In some cases, however, the author generously appears for the defence, and throws the shield of his logic and learning over expressions which he deems unjustly assailed. Of the class of misused words, the following extracts will afford examples, and will also present good specimens of the writer's style, which, it will be seen, has plenty of pungency:—

"HELP MEET.—An absurd use of these two words, as if they together were the name of one thing—a wife—is too common. They are frequently printed with a hyphen, as a compound word; and there is your man who thinks it at once tender, respectful, biblical, and humorous, to speak of his wife as his help-meet; and this merely because in Genesis we are told that woman was given to man as a help that was meet, fit, suitable for him. 'I will make him an help meet for him'; not 'I will make a helpmeet for him.' Our biblical friend might as well call his 'partner' his help-fit or help-proper."

We suspect that most persons who use the term "help-meet" have "helpmate" in their minds; and if so, the error, though it remains one, is not altogether of the kind that Mr. White censures. In the following paragraph the author manages ingeniously to give a lesson at once in language and in manners:—

"PRESENT.—The use of this word for introduce is an affectation. Persons of a certain rank are presented at court; and the craving of every item of the sovereign people of this democratic republic to be presented at the Tuileries affords one of the greatest charms of the life of our minister resident near that court, and is the chief solace of his diplomatic labors. In France, every person, in being made acquainted with another, is presented, the French language not having made the distinction which is made in England between present and introduce. We present foreign ministers to the President; we introduce, or should introduce, our friends to each other."

* Words and their Uses, Past and Present. A Study of the English Language. By Richard Grant White. New York: Sheldon & Co. 1870.

Our last example will show the author in his more gracious mood, and at the same time display the armory of linguistic lore to which he can resort, either for attack or defence:—

"AUTHORES, POETRES.—These words, and others of their sort, have been condemned by writers for whose taste and judgment I have great respect; but, although the words are not very lovely, it would seem that their right to a place in the language cannot be denied. The distinction of the female from the male by the termination ess is one of the oldest and best-established usages of English speech. Mistress, goddess, prioress, deaconess, shepherdess, heiress, sempstress, traitress, are examples that will occur to every reader. Sir Thomas Chaloner, in his translation of Erasmus's 'Praise of Folly' (an excellent piece of English), makes a feminine noun, and a good one, by adding ess to a verb—foster:—

"Further, as concerning my bringynge up, I am not envious that Jupiter, the great god, had a goat to his fostress."

"Gower says that Clytemnestra was 'of her own lord moratrice.' Fuller uses buildress and intrudress; Sir Philip Sydney, captainess; Holland (Plutarch), flatress; Silvester, soveraintess; and Ben Jonson, victress. And could we afford to lose Milton's "Thee, chauntress, oft the woods among I woo, to hear thy evensong?"

"Indeed, these examples and this defence seem quite superfluous. There can be no reasonable objection made, only one of individual taste, to actress, authoress, poetess, and even to sculptress and paintress."

We do not often find occasion to dissent from any of Mr. White's opinions. Occasionally, however, there are conclusions expressed which seem to admit of doubt. Thus we are told by him that partially is often incorrectly used, even by educated persons, for partly, as in the expression which he quotes from an English writer: "If this view of the poem be wholly or partially correct." Partially, Mr. White says, being "the adverb of partial, means, with unjust or unreasonable bias." But it is surely right to say "a partial eclipse;" and if so, the word partial must, like many similar words, have a twofold meaning, and may be used with equal correctness in either sense. Mr. White also objects to the word section, as "an unpleasant Americanism for neighborhood, vicinity, quarter, region; as, for instance, our section, this section of country." He supposes that this use of the word originated in the West, from the custom of dividing the land, for purposes of sale, into subdivisions which are known as sections. This view may be correct, but the use of the adjective sectional, as opposed to national, is so well established by the example of good writers and speakers, and is, indeed, so indispensable, that it is not likely to be given up; and if so, the noun can hardly be discarded.

It is but just, however, to say that Mr. White is rarely at fault, and that, even when we are not able altogether to agree with him, we are sure to learn something from his suggestions. In general, his criticisms are such as at once secure assent and yield instruction. He has some excellent chapters on grammar, in which he points out the absurdity which has for centuries been persisted in, of teaching English grammar in the forms and with the rules proper to the Latin and other highly inflected tongues. The mental labor, perplexity, and loss of time thus caused to the students, and particularly to young children, who are bewildered by misapplied abstractions, when they might be acquiring really useful knowledge, are shown with great force of reasoning. If the author should succeed in bringing about a reform in this system, he may justly claim the title of a public benefactor.

AN INDICATION OF PROGRESS.

MANY besides Mr. Carlyle have found a great significance in clothes. In particular, the frequent alterations in the fashion of dress in Europe, contrasted with the unchanging attire of the East, have been often dwelt on as showing the difference in the character of the wearers. If so, there is an evidence of the manner in which Western ideas are now becoming diffused in Oriental countries, in the fact that the European garb—for men, at least—is fast becoming general in those regions. An American missionary to Asiatic Turkey, the Rev. L. H. Adams, giving an account of the city of Adana, describes it as presenting this particular sign of progress. A native tailor, who saw his "art and mystery" in danger of becoming obsolete, made sad complaints. "We tailors," he said to Mr. Adams, "have learned to make the proper style of dress" (by which he meant the Turkish), "but everybody wants your kind of clothes; and, if things go on at this rate, within twelve years nobody but old men will be seen in our dress."

As a suitable comment on the fact which this unlucky craftsman lamented, we are further told respecting Adana—which, we may mention, is a city of more than twenty thousand inhabitants, situated about twenty-five miles east of Tarsus, well known as St. Paul's birth-place—that it now "presents much of the bustling life of an American city. Western ideas are making singular strides. The impetus given to its cotton trade by the American rebellion sent it flying far beyond Moslem notions. Instead of the principal streets of ten years since, ten feet wide, with a foot of mud in winter, we now have them wide, straight, beautifully paved, and lined with shops, in which almost any description of dry-goods may be purchased." Better still, a Protestant church has been established, and is in a flourishing condition, having now an average congregation of two hundred and fifty persons, its mere existence being an evidence of the progress of tolerant ideas among the once bigoted Moslems.

The change in fashions has not yet reached the women, who still, in all those countries, are required to swathe themselves, when they go out, in unsightly wrappings and in the all-enveloping veil. But this incongruity cannot be long kept up. When all the men have given up the cumbersome dress which so well suited and indicated their indolent habits, and have adopted what may properly be called the working garb of the Western nations, their wives and sisters must soon follow their example. And then wonderful changes will ensue. When the fashion-plates are as much studied in Damascus and Pekin as they are in Berlin and London, we shall be sure that the old Eastern conservatism has finally given way, and that Western ideas, in art, science, government, and religion, are to rule the earth.

BOOKS FOR HOME READING.

THERE is a marked tendency in our time to popularize knowledge; to bring the facts appertaining to the different branches of science down to the ordinary comprehension by presenting them in an attractive form, in plain and simple language. Messrs. Charles Scribner & Co. have been foremost in this good work. They are publishing, in neat, well-bound volumes, "The Illustrated Library of Wonders," each of which deals with a single subject, and condenses into light and easy reading the most striking facts belonging to it. We have now before us "The Bottom of the Sea," by a French author, well translated; and, from a rapid perusal of the work, we may say that its readers will know enough about the sea bottom to pass a civil service examination.

Some idea of the book may be gathered from the headings of its chapters. "Submarine Orography," "The Water of the Ocean," "Submarine Life," "Man and His Work at the Bottom of the Sea," "Sudden Movements of Submarine Soil" are a few of them. The sounding apparatus, by which so many discoveries have been made, is well described, and the series of careful observations by which Maury and his helpers ascertained the shape of the Atlantic and the Mediterranean, their submarine mountains and valleys. But we have only space for one or two interesting extracts: e. g., this description of the sea bottom of the Indian Ocean:—

"Everywhere, throughout this region, the eye is charmed with the brilliancy of colors; delicate shades of sea-green, alternating with brown and yellow, rich purple tints passing from the most vivid red to the deepest blue; nullipores, delicately touched as the peach, covering decaying plants with a fresh development of life, and themselves enveloped with a black tissue of retipores resembling the most delicate carvings in ivory. Near by wave the yellow and lilac fans of the gorgona, worked like jewelry in filigree. Strewn over the sandy bottom are thousands of sea-stars and sea-urchins of the most curious forms and varied colors. The sea-anemones, looking like immense cactus-flowers, brilliant with the most glaring colors, adorn the clefts of the rocks with their waving crowns, or spread out their blooms on the sea bottom. Around the coral-bushes play the humming-birds of the ocean—brilliant little fishes, now sparkling with metallic red and blue, now with a golden green, or with the soft hue of silver. When the shadows of night spread in the deep waters, the exquisite garden which they cover is lighted up with new splendors. The medusæ and the microscopic crustaceans shine in the bottom like fairy stars; the pennatula floats in a phosphorescent light; every corner of the sea bottom sends out its ray of color; and, to complete the marvels of this enchanted night-scene, the large silver disk of the moon-fish moves softly through the whirling vortices of little stars."

The description is fascinating enough to make every boy long to be a Ceylon diver, and it has many fellows in this pleasant book. We are doing our young friends a kindness in opening to them such a storehouse of wonders; and the knowledge which they may gain from it is becoming every day more useful. The sea is now the connecting link of nations, rather than their separator; the highway of trade and the conductor of intelligence. The time will come when children will be taught the conformation and depth of the sea bottom as a branch of physical geography, but for a time the readers of this unpretending volume will be abreast of the knowledge of the time.

GERMAN PATRIOTIC SONGS.

GERMANY is a country of song. Its literature is wonderfully rich in poetry, and its poetry is chiefly lyric. Every student of German must have felt how the very life blood and marrow of the language seemed to be poured into their verses. Unlike the plodding and cumbersome prose, they are bright, and trenchant as a sabre, or tender as a flower.

In the October number of the London Quarterly is an article in which a number of the best patriotic songs of Germany are translated. The rendition of these songs into English verse has been carefully made, and the spirit of the original is wonderfully preserved. They are mostly directed against France; but the love of home and country which they breathe is as striking as their hate of the invader. When M. Thiers, in 1841, was stirring up the French to war,

Arndt wrote a battle song, which deserves quotation, not only for its vigor, but for its prophecy:—

"If the Frenchmen again must provoke us to fight,
And the storm-wind of war sweep our land,
Assemble, my Germany, rise in thy night,
And give them the gifts they demand!
Surround them with terror, pursue them with fear,
From hill and from valley, from far and from near,
And shout: 'To the Rhine, cross the river, advance!'
All Germany on into France!"

"They choose it. Then, patience of Germany, break!
From the Belt to the Rhine beat the drum!
The debt they have owed so long we will take;
Up, Frenchmen, bestir you, we come!
To the singing of swords, and the tilting of lances,
We'll lead you the wildest, the bloodiest dances,
And shout: 'To the Rhine, cross the river, advance!'
All Germany on into France!"

"My own fatherland, my brave Germany, on!
We'll sing them a terrible strain
Of what, ages ago, their base policy won
Of Strasburg, and Metz, and Lorraine!
They shall yield it all back to the uttermost mite,
Since for life or for death they compel us to fight;
So shout: 'To the Rhine, cross the river, advance!
All Germany on into France!'"

"All Deutschland in Frankreich hinein" is the epitome of the recent war. Never, since the fall of the Roman Empire, has a whole nation marched to the attack.

Our space is limited, and we must be satisfied with this specimen of the warlike spirit of these songs. The mournful and pathetic side of battle is well represented in the selections of the Quarterly; and, with a little song, a great favorite among the soldiers, and which loses much in the translation, we conclude, recommending our readers to the article itself:—

"I had a faithful comrade,
No better could there be;
The drum was beat, the charge was led,
Together to the strife we sped,
And he kept pace with me.

"A bullet came, and who could tell
For which of us 'twas bound?
Alas! for him the missile flew;
My second self, my comrade true,
Lay dying on the ground.

"He tried to clasp my hand once more;
I had my piece to load;
I cannot grasp thine hand; adieu!
I bid thee, O my comrade true,
Farewell, and trust in God!"

NOTES AND NOTICES.

A GLIMPSE OF PARIS IN 1867.—"Our first plunge into Paris was at nine o'clock at night, a soft, warm spring night, with the glittering shops of the Rue de Rivoli on one hand, and the dim glow of the Tuilleries Gardens on the other, while up and down, between light and shadow, flowed the continual human stream. To mingle in this French crowd was an entirely new sensation. The lazy gas-light strolling, the gay out-of-door evening life that seems to go on in Paris, and among a very respectable class, too, is to us unknown; nay, impossible. Only fancy a well-to-do Bond Street tradesman sitting with his family, sipping their social tea on the pavement of Regent Street quadrant, exposed to the gaze of all passers-by! And what decent English maid-servant would choose to saunter bonnetless, shawless on her sweet-heart's arm, staring in at the Strand shop-windows? Yet here they were, men and women, bonnes, ouvriers, boutiquiers, every rank of the bourgeois class, apparently, their day's work done, all strolling about, bent upon enjoying themselves. The women in spotless white caps, young and old, pretty or ugly (though I declare I never saw one really ugly woman all the time I was in Paris, for the very poorest and plainest of them were neat and clean); the men, acute of face, tidy of dress, and oh! so polite of manner; you overheard the very lowest of them addressing one another as 'Monsieur' and 'Madame,' and bowing or exchanging the civil hand-shake, which seems even commoner in France than with us, for the British workman considers it superfluous to greet his comrade with anything warmer than a nod of the head, and a gruff 'How do, Bill?'

"Perfect as we think ourselves, our lower orders might learn a good lesson from the Parisians. How much better, for instance, is a recognized costume, plain and neat, of the whole servant class, than the tawdry finery our maid-servants indulge in! If they only knew how much more suitable; nay, to touch still deeper the feminine soul—how much more becoming is the snow-white cap—what splendid black dresses these Paris women must be—than the tawdry bonnet stuck over with sham lace and dirty artificial flowers! And what possible harm can it do a man to greet his neighbor civilly, even ultra-politely, rather than grumpily? Why should he not, after work hours are over, wear a cheery face instead of a sullen one, and enjoy himself as much as he can?"—Extract from the last work of Miss Mulock, "Fair France."

MEDICAL EDUCATION OF WOMEN IN SCOTLAND:—

"The Edinburgh University has declared itself upon the matter of instructing women in medicine. At the Easter competitive examination, a young woman won the scholarship, but the faculty refused to grant it, on the ground that, although women are entitled to tuition, the university prizes belong to men exclusively. The professor of chemistry, Mr. Crum Brown, was disgusted at this action, and made an application to the corporation to put young women on the same footing as young men.

"The professors of surgery and anatomy appealed to the members of the corporation not to do it, asserting that they could not perform their duties decently when women were in the lecture-room. The professor of surgery declared that he would rather resign than lecture to a mixed class. He read a memorial from one hundred and sixty-one male students, protesting against the admission of females to the classes. But the professor of physiology replied that he found no difficulties as suggested; he could lecture to a mixed class as easily as to one composed of male students exclusively; women made the most expert dissectors, and in his judgment they are by nature better fitted for surgeons than men. The women were in a fair way to carry the day, when Doctor Christison, physician in ordinary to the Queen, came to the rescue and informed the corporation and professors that the 'highest lady in the realm' had instructed him to represent to them that she greatly disapproved of women studying medicine. Professor Burns's request was voted down by a majority of one."

The admission, by a Scotch professor of physiology, of the superiority of women as surgeons, is a striking proof that the prejudices of men are giving way before the light of the truth that women are fully competent for the profession. We agree, however, with the professor of surgery, that women should be provided with separate clinics, as they are in Philadelphia.

WOMAN'S MEDICAL COLLEGE IN PHILADELPHIA.—Extracts from letters of lady-professors in the College:—

February 2, 1871.

"Our College class numbers fifty-five, sixteen of whom hope to graduate. One of these is looking forward to missionary work, under the auspices of the 'Woman's Board of New York.' Another will open soon a dispensary and lying-in charity in the southern portion of this city. The young women have greatly enjoyed the clinical advantages provided for them at the Pennsylvania Hospital, in lectures separate from the young men."

February 4, 1871.

"We have a daily morning clinic at our hospital, conducted by ladies, and for women exclusively. We have, in addition, two clinical lectures weekly, one on diseases of women, the other on surgery. No gentlemen attend any of these clinics except the surgeon, who is lecturing in the surgical clinic. As several new colleges have been opened for women in the West since last year, we feel that we can congratulate ourselves on the success of our institution."

TILTON'S JOURNAL OF HORTICULTURE.—We are glad to see that this interesting and valuable monthly continues to prosper. The editors condense into a handsome monthly pamphlet all the facts, experiments, and items which bear upon the culture of fruits and flowers. To the nurseryman, the gardener, and the country gentleman, this periodical is invaluable.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—The following articles are accepted: "A Tale"—"At Last"—"A Wail"—"Fair Edith's Face"—"Mine and Thine"—"The Painter of Seville"—"To Will"—"Hallstones"—"Carl Elliot"—"May Queen"—"The Woodman" and "To a Friend."

The following are declined: "The Old Convent"—"Snow-Flakes" (too late)—"Under the Willow"—"Down the River of Time"—"Voluntary"—"The Gypsy's Prophecy"—"Mr. Highlow's Reflections" and "By-Gone Days."

"M. F. E." Charade—Madcap—accepted. So informed you by letter, but said letter has been returned by post-office.

"Mrs. A. C. B." You sent no stamps for a reply. We would advise your having the articles printed.

"We Never Miss Her. By Gerald." No letter, no stamps.

"S. E. Doran, Harlem, N. Y." Addressed you a letter; returned by post-office—"Not known."

"Miss Marguerite H. Dyar, Racine, Wis." Wrote you January 12: letter returned, uncalled for.

It is almost useless for us to write to authors, as nearly one-half the letters we send are not taken from the post-office.

NEURALGIA.

UNDOUBTEDLY, many of the readers of GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK know what it is to suffer the attacks of neuralgia. If one is ignorant in this respect, then, surely, "Ignorance is bliss," for it's a terrible malady, and one that any lady may well feel thankful of escaping if she has been fortunate to do so. We propose a desultory description of the affection for the benefit of the initiated. Neuralgia is purely an affection of the nerves, and is liable at any time to attack any portion of the body where nerves are to be found.

It is more frequent, however, in the head and integuments of the face than in other parts, and is known, when it occurs here, as the tic-douloureux, or "painful twitchings." This is the most violent form of the disease, and is probably accounted for by the presence of the large number of important nerves that occupy these parts. It seems to be confined to no particular spot when it occurs here.

First it affects the forehead and the regions in the neighborhood of the eyes, then the temples or the cheeks, and then, perhaps, the dental arches, the lips, or even the sides and end of the nose. Occasionally it follows the ramifications of a nerve, or shoots about from place to place, as if starting from no particular point. It is quite frequent in the jaws, and produces, when it attacks this region, the most agonizing varieties of the toothache. Sometimes the eyes are peculiarly affected; then there is much redness of the lids and conjunctiva, and great intolerance of light. In the nostrils it often imitates a severe "cold in the head," and in the throat the angina. Earache is another form of it, which is frequently terribly painful. The neck, the arms, the ribs, and the various internal organs are also subject to it. So is the back in its different regions, under the names of sciatica, lumbago, etc. etc., and even the limbs and the lower joints.

The causes of neuralgia are very numerous; some acting directly, and others indirectly, to produce it. As a general rule, it is caused by some source of irritation or injury to a nerve, either directly at the point of distress, or at a greater or lesser distance from it. A stomach, irritated by acrid secretions or some offending article of food or drink, may be the cause of a severe neuralgia in some distant part of the body, as the head or lumbar regions. Tumors growing in the brain or along the course of a nerve, diseases of the liver and urinary organs, impurities of the blood, the use of tea, coffee, tobacco (snuff is tobacco, ladies), etc. etc., are other causes. There are certain states of the system, also, that seem to favor its occurrence. Those who are broken down in constitution, or are weak and anemic from any cause, are much subject to it. Chlorotic women are apt to suffer from neuralgia; and malaria, a gouty or a rheumatic habit of body, impoverished blood, etc., are other prolific causes.

As to the exciting causes, the most frequent, perhaps, is cold. Exposure to a keen, cold air is very apt to induce the paroxysms, and cold combined with wet is still more effectual. Sometimes foreign substances, gaining admission to the cavity of a hollow or decayed tooth, is the exciting cause. We have in our mind a case strikingly illustrating this point. The patient, a young man of excellent general health, and not more than ordinarily "nervous," suffered in the greatest agony the repeated attacks of facial neuralgia. A breath of cold air, a sudden surprise, the slamming of a door was sufficient to bring on the most violent paroxysms. They resisted all manner of treatment; and, at last, he was about to give up his business—that of a tobaccoist—as the cause of all his troubles, when he discovered that the cleaning of his teeth immediately after his meals entirely relieved him of the difficulty. He remains entirely free from it to the present day, unless he neglects his after dinner exercice, and it was probably some source of irritation to the dental nerves, transmitted during the process of eating, that was the cause of it. We have seen neuralgia to result from a wound or a bruise; and fatigue, strong mental emotion, the retrocession of gout, rheumatism, or cutaneous affections are proverbially its strongest incentives.

We now come to the treatment of the disease, and this is the most puzzling part of it. To attempt to enumerate here the list of remedies, external and internal, that are used as instruments of alleviation and cure, would be utterly out of the question. Doctor Wood, in his treatise upon practical medicine, occupies six pages, as concisely as possible, in accomplishing this end. We can only mention a few of the most important, and confine ourselves strictly to the local applications. Narcotics, upon the whole, are the most efficacious remedies of this kind. Laudanum, or laudanum and camphor, may be applied, either by lotion or in the form of a cataplasm, with often excellent results. A strong tincture of aconite is highly recommended, used in the same way; but its use requires some care, as it is a powerful medicine. Tobacco, in the form of an infusion or paste, is also an excellent remedy; and ointments made from belladonna, and applied by friction, and pastes of the leaves are sometimes used with much success. Chloroform has, of late years, been employed with benefit. It should be applied upon a piece of linen saturated with it, and this should be covered with an oiled silk to prevent evaporation. Some burning and superficial pain may be experienced at first, and even a blister has been produced; but the relief of the neuralgic pain is often speedy and entire, and lasts for a considerable time. It may be incorporated with lard, and applied in the form of an ointment if desirable. Ice or ice cold water occasionally affords relief, and so does steam as hot as can be borne. Covering the parts with oiled silk, and then keeping it warm with a layer of carded wool, often has the same effect. Dry heat, applied by means of burning coals near the part, and continued as long as the patient can bear it, is another mode of obtaining ease that may be resorted to. Indeed, anything which for the time modifies the nervous condition of the parts may afford temporary relief. Gentle friction, even, with a smooth hand over the affected surface, sometimes quiets the pain as if by magic. A change of climate or residence, and exposure to a new set of scenes and influences, and prolongation of the novel impression until the system shall have forgotten the old altogether, is of most excellent service in old and protracted cases. A journey to Europe, and a residence abroad for a year or more, with its excitements and its novelties, its incidents—"pleasant and otherwise"—and its change of air, are remedies very effectual in the cure of obstinate neuralgia. If these objects are unattainable, a complete change of the mode of life at home often is attended with very desirable effects.

Literary Notices.

From PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia.—DOESTICKS' LETTERS; and What He Says. By Q. K. Philander Doesticks, P. B. This is a new edition of the original Doesticks letters, which were so celebrated a few years since. It is amusing to glance through the pages of this book, and be reminded of things as they were a dozen years ago, but which the events of succeeding years have, in many instances, so radically changed.

AFTER DARK. A Novel. By Wilkie Collins.

HIDE AND SEEK. A Novel. By Wilkie Collins. New editions of two of Collins' earlier works, which every one who has not already read them should now embrace the opportunity to obtain.

HANS BREITMANN AS AN UHLAN; with Other New Ballads. By Charles G. Leland, author of "Hans Breitmann's Party." The patriotism of Hans Breitmann, which was so characteristically developed during our recent war, has again been excited by the present war in Europe. He rides forth, through France, as a bold Uhlan, conquering and to conquer, and returns laden with the spoils of his victories in the shape of substantial aid for his stomach and pocket.

ADVENTURES OF CAPTAIN FARRAGO. By H. H. Brackenridge.

ADVENTURES OF MAJOR O'REGAN. By H. H. Brackenridge.

THE BIG BEAR OF ARKANSAS; and Other Sketches. Illustrative of characters and incidents in the South and South-West. Edited by William T. Porter.

POLLY PEABLOSSOM'S WEDDING; and Other Tales. By the author of "Major Jones' Courtship," etc. Edited by T. A. Burke, Esq.

These volumes belong to Peterson's "Library of Humorous American Works," and are all illustrated by Darley.

From HARPER & BROTHERS, New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS, LIPPINCOTT & Co., and CLAXTON, REMSEN, & HAFELFINGER, Philadelphia:—

FAIR FRANCE. Impressions of a Traveller. By the author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," etc. In 1867, for the first time in her life, Mrs. Mulock Craik left her native shores to visit foreign lands. One of the objects of her journey was to visit the Exposition at Paris, but, wherever she went, she kept her eyes open to what was going on around her. She was not so much a sight-seer as a close and careful student of human nature. Her British prejudices frequently obtrude themselves, and she finds the French altogether a different people from the English, in appearance, manners, and religion. Nevertheless, she confesses she finds much to admire and much to approve, while the novelty of everything she sees greatly interests her.

THE CRYPTOGRAM. A Novel. By James de Mille, author of "The Dodge Club," etc. A well-written novel of English life, by an American author (for such we are, perhaps, justified in calling Mr. de Mille), is one of the novelties of the month. The volume is profusely illustrated, and the story will prove satisfactory to the reader.

A SIREN. By T. Adolphus Trollope, author of "Lindsarn Chase," etc. Mr. Trollope's best stories are of Italian life. When he writes up English scenes and characters, he is apt to prose; but his Italian stories never lag in the telling, or lose their interest. "A Siren" is one of the best of these.

NOTES, EXPLANATORY AND PRACTICAL, ON THE GOSPELS: designed for Sunday-School Teachers and Bible Classes. By Albert Barnes, author of "Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity," etc. In two volumes. Revised edition. These notes, in their original form, were first published in 1832. Since then numerous editions have been issued, with occasional revisions, alterations, additions, and illustrations. The last revision was made by the author a little more than two years ago, at the completion of which he dismissed the work finally, as being completed to the fullest of his ability.

A GERMAN READER: to Succeed the "German Course." By George F. Comfort, A. M., author of "A German Course." The selections in this book are made from the works of the best modern German writers, and the greatest possible variety has been aimed at in their subjects and character. All the poetical compositions given are complete pieces, and the majority of them of the lyric order. The notes and references contain explanations of the more difficult passages and idioms, of historical events, and social customs. The volume is a valuable one to the German student.

SHAKESPEARE'S COMEDY OF THE MERCHANT OF VENICE. Edited, with Notes, by William J. Rolfe, A. M. The text of this play is that of the folio of 1623, carefully collated with the quartos, and all modern editions that have any critical value. It is edited in the same manner as Greek and Latin classics are edited, for educational purposes. The volume gives an introductory history of the life and works of Shakespeare, followed by a history of the play which the book contains, the sources of its plot, and critical comments.

HISTORY OF LOUIS XIV. By John S. C. Abbott, author of "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," etc, with illustrations. This volume belongs to Abbott's series of Histories, the volumes of which have been issued from time to time from the publishing house of Harper & Brothers. This edition is intended to become a standard one, and the utmost pains is taken to make it a reliable one. This volume not only gives a history of the reign of Louis XIV., but draws a picture of the times and narrates events which ultimately resulted in the French revolution.

From ROBERT CARTER & BROTHERS, New York:—
MEMORIES OF PATMOS. By J. R. Macduff, D. D. Doctor Macduff disclaims in his Preface any desire to be ranked among prognosticators and soothsayers. His book is a simple commentary upon the chief visions of the Revelation, and the appropriate lessons to be drawn from them. The author divides the Apocalypse into two parts; the first containing a prologue, and the epistles to the Seven Churches; the second, a prophetic drama in three acts, comprehending the vision of the Seals, Trumpets, and Vials; beginning, also, with a sublime prologue, and concluding with an equally sublime epilogue. The thousands whose imagination has been wrought upon by the grandeur and power of the Book of Revelations, will welcome Doctor Macduff's commentary.

MOSES, THE MAN OF GOD. By the late James Hamilton, D. D. This also is a series of lectures delivered to the author's parishioners. The leading events in the Hebrew Captain's life are delineated one by one, and appropriate lessons drawn from each. Like Doctor Macduff's, this work is excellently bound and printed. Messrs. Carter's workmanship is always neat.

LONELY LILY. By M. L. C.

From THE TEMPERANCE SOCIETY and PUBLICATION HOUSE, New York:—

THE LAW OF FERMENTATION, AND THE WINES OF THE ANCIENTS. By Rev. William Patton, D. D. A valuable work, destined to do a good work in the temperance cause.

JOHN SWIG; or, The Effect of Jones's Argument. By Edward Carswell. A short poem, written half in a serious and half in a comical vein, in illustration of the evils of intemperance.

THE TEMPERANCE ALPHABET, with Original Designs. By Edward Carswell.

From CARLETON, New York:—

THE VOICE OF PRAYER. A Poem. By Warren Sumner Barlow, author of "The Voices."

From SIDNEY E. MORSE & Co., New York:—

THE NEW YORK OBSERVER YEAR BOOK AND ALMANAC FOR 1871. This volume is an encyclopedia of statistical information, religious and secular. It contains a directory of ministers of various denominations, and has theological, collegiate, medical, legal, and agricultural departments, each one of which will possess interest for a large class of persons.

From LEE & SHEPARD, Boston, through W. S. TURNER, Philadelphia:—

BIRTH AND EDUCATION. By Marie Sophie Schwartz. Translated from the Swedish, by Selma Borg and Marie A. Brown. A volume of equal merit with "Gold and Name," which was the first of this author's works translated into English. It is not a Swedish story, as we might be led to expect, but a romance of the French revolution. Madame Schwartz is a voluminous writer, and no less than thirty more volumes written by her are announced to appear from the press of Lee & Shepard.

BATTLES AT HOME. By Mary E. Darling. A pleasant and profitable book for children of both sexes.

THE YOUNG PIONEERS OF THE NORTH-WEST. By Doctor C. H. Pearson, author of "The Cabin on the Prairies," etc. Illustrated. This is the fifth volume of the Frontier Series, a series of books for boys not by Oliver Optic, who produces a large proportion of the works of this class. As its title indicates, it is a story of hard work seasoned with adventure in the forests and prairies of the West. Boys always like such books.

From GATE CITY PRINTING AND PUBLISHING HOUSE, Keokuk, Iowa:—

IN MEMORIAM. Maymie. April 6th, 1869. By Kate Harrington. There is more poetical merit found within the covers of this little volume than we usually discover in books of original verse. The poetry is smooth and correct, and the sentiments of the highest order. The author promises to take a high rank among American poets. She is a credit to the State which claims her, and to which she dedicates her book.

REVIEWS, PAMPHLETS, ETC.

From THE LEONARD SCOTT PUBLICATION COMPANY, New York:—

THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW: October, 1870, and January, 1871.

THE EDINBURGH REVIEW: October, 1870, and January, 1871.

THE LONDON QUARTERLY: October, 1870, and January, 1871.

THE NORTH BRITISH REVIEW: October, 1870, and January, 1871.

We receive our Quarterlies with ever fresh pleasure. Their varied covers, with the Index, which tells us of the good things in store, have brightened our table for so long that we should feel the discontinuance of any one like the loss of a friend. We have space only for the briefest notice of their contents. The Edinburgh explains—what to many is still unknown—the origin of the old mythologies, according to Mr. Cox and his school; and contains Gladstone's famous article on "Germany, France, and England." "The Growth of a Trades Union" is well described in the North British; and "Prevost Paradol and Napoleon III." will help our readers to understand the cause of the melancholy tragedy of last summer.

From PROF. JOHN M. LEAVITT, Editor:—

THE AMERICAN QUARTERLY CHURCH REVIEW: January, 1871. This Review, the organ of the moderate party in the Episcopal Church, is carefully and ably written, and contains at least one article of general interest, the account of "The Fall of the Temporal Power." It is a brief history of the entrance into Rome of the Italian troops, and will interest many who dislike the piecemeal and incorrect information of newspapers.

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE: November, December, 1870, and January, 1871. The Living Age is so far the best of our eclectics that no single magazine could at all take its place. The variety and interest of its articles are great, while yet it is not filled, like most of its class, with trashy stories. Our space forbids us even to indicate the range of its topics for these three months, but we may say that it never was more interesting than now. A new story, "Seedtime and Harvest," by a famous German author, began with the New Year; and a story by George MacDonald is running in its volumes. We congratulate the editors of this veteran weekly on its large and increasing circulation.

From HENRY C. LEA, Philadelphia:—

THE AMERICAN JOURNAL OF THE MEDICAL SCIENCES. Edited by Isaac Hays, M. D. Assisted by J. Minis Hays, M. D. January, 1871. Price $5 per year.

Godey's Arm-Chair

APRIL, 1871.

OUR ENGRAVINGS.—Have you ever seen, dear reader, a plate where more expression has been given by the artist to the figures engraved upon it? Toby is one of those trick dogs attached to a show, and has been waiting anxiously for his call, to make his appearance before the audience. At this moment his little assistant makes her appearance, and signifies that his time has come. How he brightens up and listens, and looks pleased at the fun he is about to afford his patrons.

Another expressive engraving is given in the "April Fool" picture. If the old gentleman should happen to discover our young friend, won't he make a fool of him in return for the mischief he has been playing on him? Take warning, boys, and don't be caught playing April Fools.

A six-figure fashion-plate, as usual, is given.

As riding habits are seasonable, we have presented three designs on page 232, from which a selection can be made.

And to complete our fashions, we have given on the extension sheet thirty-eight engravings of the latest styles of everything adapted to the toilette of both old and young.

We copy the following from Scrüner's Monthly. It also applies to the LADY'S BOOK:—

"The question is often asked, Why we do not cut the leaves of the Magazine? We do not do so for three reasons, and we will give them all:—

1st. In binding the accumulated numbers of a magazine, it is necessary to trim the edges, and to do it very thoroughly. This trimming uses up all the margin there is to spare in a magazine printed with a decent economy of paper. To trim it as a magazine, and again as a bound volume, takes the whole margin, and spoils the look of the completed book.

2d. To cut a magazine properly, it must be done after the cover is on; and the pressure necessary to hold the leaves firmly, crumples the back of the magazine, and gives it a rough and shabby appearance.

3d. An untrimmed magazine is handsomer than its trimmed mate placed by its side. Any artist will say this, and every true artist will account it as dainty a task to open a magazine as it is to open a casket of jewels. The first fresh look of a magazine, with a paper folder in the hand, which we use as a key to unlock the pages, is a treat which the genuine lover of a magazine will not permit a publisher to slich from him."

As most of the LADY'S BOOK subscribers bind their numbers at the end of the year, we wish them to receive the monthly numbers so that they may present a good appearance when bound.

REGISTERED LETTERS.—On the 18th of February we received five registered letters from Texas, out of which had been stolen $52 30. The letters were duly received, but the money had been abstracted therefrom. We have warned our friends against this registry system from the time it was first started. It simply designates to the thief money letters. We would advise Texas subscribers not to send money, but drafts or money-order letters. Not one dollar out of ten mailed in Texas ever reaches publishers, and it has always been so in that State.

"One thousand five hundred and seventy-four registered letters were stolen last year."

"FALSE as woman's love." This is a great error of a great author, for nothing can be truer than woman's love. If he had said, "False as woman's hair," perhaps he would have been nearer the mark.

ASBESTOS.—This wonderful mineral, which differs from all others in possessing fine, silk-like fibres, which render it capable of being felted or woven into cloth, has within the past few years excited a considerable degree of attention from its evident value in the manufacture of materials for structural and other purposes, for which it seems eminently adapted, on account of its being indestructible under the most intense heat.

The peculiar properties of this anomalous substance have been known for ages, and it has been used experimentally for various purposes. Lamp wick, gloves, and fireproof dresses have been made of it; but, owing to its supposed scarcity, and consequent expense of procuring it, no practical use has been found for it until very recently. We have seen samples of this mineral from Italy, which, in strength of fibre, etc., resembled tow or flax; but, as it is procured from almost inaccessible mountains, the deposits, although extensive, cannot be considered of great value at present. But the very desirable qualities of this mineral now bid fair to prove of great importance, from the fact that, owing to the untiring exertions for several years of Mr. H. W. JOHNS, of New York, it has been found in large quantities in many parts of the United States and Canada; and this gentleman, who is known to be the leading manufacturer in his line, has utilized it for a number of purposes, which are evidently of great value. Some of the principal uses which have been made of it are a roofing material, a felting for covering steam pipes and boilers, and a sheathing paper or board for lining houses, etc.

WHAT HAS THE LADY'S BOOK DONE?—It was the first lady's magazine published in this country—that is, the first work of the kind that a lady could read—the first to give colored fashions that were not caricatures. It has aroused a host of imitators. Take up any lady's magazine published in this country, and compare with our work. You will find every department we have started has been similarly copied—at least, the idea is copied, but the execution is far from the original. How many have departed this life, and probably because the public saw that they were poor counterfeits of an excellent original. Perhaps, if they had originated something, they might have succeeded. Go on, gentlemen, there are graves enough left for you all.

TENNESSEE.

Do you not think it possible for one to feel something like a human affection for a periodical coming as they do, so regularly with their budgets of good things? At the risk of wearying, besides being pronounced "gushing," I must confess to the "soft impeachment" in the case of your Magazine, and tell you why. I have read it since childhood, and when I as a school-girl, pored over its delightful stories; through the time when I, as a newspaper writer, gave my "best notices" in return for the same, up to the present, when I have the honor to be a sometime contributor, I have always regarded it as a friend. And it is true that the friendship is human, after all, for the writers are intensely human, most of them; Marion Harland I love with all my heart. B.

We have recently had brought to our notice a trimming called "Cash's Snowdrop Trimming." It is made of fine cord, with a narrow linen tape passing through the centre of it, which adds strength as well as beauty to it. It is admirably adapted for trimming children's clothing, and will supply a want long felt, as it washes well, which, unfortunately, cannot be said of all cotton trimmings. We advise our readers who are in need of such an article to try it. It can be procured of Messrs. Horstmann, N. E. corner of Cherry and Fifth Streets.

A PACK OF CARDS.—More nonsense got up by the engravers to promote business. The following is given out as the programme of cards for a wedding party: 1, the bride's card; 2, bridegroom's; 3, if to a stranger, the card of the bride's mother; 4, the ceremony card for church; 5, the note-paper for the reception at the house; 6, the card with the married names in full; 7, a card, with "Please present this at the door," which is designed to keep uninvited guests from crowding the church. A better plan to keep "uninvited guests" out of the church would be not to give information to the flash papers in New York when and where the wedding is to take place. Why not have all these cards printed rail-road fashion, with coupons? Here is another one of the humbugs:—

"Hereafter no one will be received into good society in New York whose wedding-cards are not sealed with wax and stamped with the family crest. Engravers keep family crests on hand."

We advise all persons who wish to be or are gentle, to avoid the above nonsense. There are more knaves of hearts in this pack than kings or queens.

TALES, ETC.—There appears to be no attempt this year on the part of other magazines to compete with the LADY'S BOOK in producing first-class tales. The field has been abandoned to us. Occasionally a step has been taken in that direction, but failure follows.

"EVERY SATURDAY," published by James R. Osgood & Co., is certainly the best pictorial weekly published in America. Some of the engravings are from the London Graphic, but even these are printed better than they are in the foreign publication. We take one instance from the 57th number, "Listening to the New Year's Chimes." This is one of the best engravings on wood we have seen. The original pictures in this publication we prefer even to the foreign ones. The literature is good, and it is in every respect a first class publication.

A YOUNG lady, accompanied by a friend, went to a photographer to have her carte taken. She was observed to be very particular to stand upon her dress while being taken, much to the annoyance of the photographer, but no persuasion of his could make her stand in any other position. When asked by her friend why she was so particular in standing on her dress, she replied that she understood the operator viewed the objects upside down.

"A TRIP TO DAHOMBY," published in Lippincott's, is an excellent article. The writer speaks of seeing tomatoes there in plenty, a vegetable, as he says, not known here thirty years ago. This is an error. We saw tomatoes in the markets in New York more than fifty years ago. They were then called love apples.

STORIES are sometimes sent to us, the writer saying, "If you purchase this story, I intend devoting the proceeds to benevolent purposes." Well, if the story should be worth paying for, it is but little matter to us what the writer would do with the money. If, on the other hand, the writer supposes that we would purchase a poor story merely because she wishes to be benevolent, she is mistaken, because, in that case, the benevolence would be ours and not hers; but, as we are not purchasing at present, it does not matter much. We may add this, when sending a MS. to a publisher, say you want pay for it, or that it is sent simply for insertion; nothing more need be said. Anything more is against the sender; and, for goodness sake! don't send your "first story," and ask pay for it. It is presumptuous and ridiculous.

FREIGHT ON LETTERS AND PREMIUM ON DRAFTS.—Subscribers will please understand that when they send their letters by an express company they must pay the freight, and those who send drafts must pay the premium. We advise subscribers to remit a post-office order or a draft payable to the order of L. A. GODEY. The rates for postal money orders as established by law are as follows:—

"The postal money order system established by law provides that no money order shall be issued for any sum less than $1 nor more than $50. All persons who receive money orders are required to pay therefor the following charges or fees, viz: For an order for $1 or for any larger sum, but not exceeding $20, the sum of 10 cents shall be charged and exacted by the postmaster giving such order; for an order of $20 and up to $30, the charge will be 15 cents; more than $30 and up to $40, the charge shall be 20 cents; over $40 and up to $50, the charge shall be 25 cents."

FASHIONABLE INTELLIGENCE FROM NEVADA—A STYLISH BALL AT CARSON.—A correspondent of the White Pine (Nevada) News, writing from Carson, gives some peculiar particulars as to the fashionable customs in vogue there. Here is an account of the style in which some of the ladies dress:—

"Miss X——g was attired in point applyky dress, court train, with green linen overskirt, and hair a la pan yay. Her feet were incased in tournures of red velvet, with silver buckles.

"Miss L——x, of Ophir City, wore a waterfall of magnificent proportions, which a lady friend informed me cost $40 in Virginia.

"Miss M——n, of Sand Springs, was dressed in blamed tarlatan, with insect sleeves and illusion lace slippers, fluted and flounced, hair cut short, and a cabbage rose, set in diamonds, on her forehead. She was the stunningest looking gal in the outfit.

"Mrs. M——y, of Secret Canyon, looked magnificent in full suit of Mormon homespun, and wore her hair trimmed blas, which set off her masculine beauty to the greatest advantage.

"Mrs. A. C. C——d, of White Pine, was really, to my notion, the most handsomely dressed woman in the room. This is 'on the square.' She wore a white silk alpaca short dress, scalloped, and flounced and trimmed with silver fringe, and looked splendid. Some of these high-toned Carson folks thought it wasn't pretty, because there were not eight or nine yards of surplus silk dragging round the floor, upsetting bashful young fellows like me. But I thought it was, as Marcus would say, smooth as oil from the can.

"Mrs. John W——r, of White Pine, was also neatly and handsomely attired. She wore a dark drab silk, tastefully trimmed with point applyky lace, point lace collar trimmed with scarlet, and her whole appearance was tasteful in the extreme."

A SENSIBLE CIRCULAR.—We have received a circular headed, "Plerian Society, Marshall Female College, Pleria Hall," but in what Town, County, or State it is in, the circular does not inform us, but it does tell us that we have been unanimously elected a member. As the word "unanimously" is printed, we presume it is intended to elect a large number of members. We do not care to be informed where the society is situated, but we write the above to show how careless people are.

BRAVER BRAND MOHAIR, and BUFFALO BRAND ALPACA.—These are a most desirable make of goods, and are by many persons worn instead of silk. They keep their color, and look well as long as they wear.

The SABLE BRILLIANT must not be forgotten. It is manufactured by the same firm as the others, and for many purposes is even more desirable. The gloss on this goods is beautiful, the surface is even, and the color excellent; and, what is far better, remains so, which is a great consideration in black goods. We can cordially recommend these goods to our readers.

"CHURCH EDIFICES.—The extravagant adornment of church edifices with gold, silver, and other embellishments, requiring the expenditure of large sums of money, has been criticized with severity, not only as inconsistent with the principles of true religion, but as injudicious, in withdrawing the precious metals from circulation. On this subject it has, however, been remarked that in modern times the expenditures for church ornamentation are much less than they were in the remote periods of the world's history. Thus, in the erection of the tabernacle in the wilderness, it is calculated that the gold and silver alone, out of the vast offerings of other articles, were equal in value to $1,776,000. When the tabernacle was dedicated, $18,648 worth of the precious metal and cattle worth $3500 were offered. In dedicating the temple, Solomon sacrificed 22,000 oxen and 121,000 sheep, estimated to be worth $2,042,000. Hezekiah received $57,720 to carry out his religious reforms. The Passover was celebrated by Josiah at an expense of $444,000. The gold and silver contributed to the second temple after the return of the Israelites was weighed by Ezra, and amounted in value to $3,330,000. The offerings by David and the princes of Israel for the building of the first temple exceeded any single contribution made by any nation for any religious purpose, and exhibits a wealth surpassing that of any modern nation. The amount given was 113,000 talents of gold and 1,017,000 talents of silver, estimated to be worth $3,296,875,000."

The above we copy from the Philadelphia Ledger. But are not our wonderful church edifices at the present day a very great evil? Why cannot we have simply comfortable buildings, where a poor man may not fear to enter? Sometimes a church is commenced on a grand scale, and, the money running short, a system of begging is commenced, and you are haunted in your house and at your office to contribute something more, and it is quoted to you that such and such a congregation has a splendid edifice, and should be outdone. If you are weak-minded, you contribute; and, if you don't, you are ostracized and pronounced no Christian. We have a case in our mind at the present moment. A portion of a church is standing now, with elaborate stone work and polished granite pillars, but they have stopped. Money has run out, and at least $150,000 more is wanted to finish the building. The trustees think this is almost too much to beg, and they don't know what to do.

VULGAR AND COSTLY.—At a large dinner party in New York, the other evening, the tablecloth was of heavy white silk, edged with point-lace. All the other appointments were equally parvenuish. The giver of this party no doubt made his money by war contracts.

"In a Washington theatre General G— was so excited over the sleep-walking of Janaushek, as Lady Macbeth, that he vehemently grasped the back of the chair before him, and with it a portion of the curls belonging to an elaborate chignon. The consequence was that when the fair owner, at the end of the scene, threw forward her head the whole structure came tumbling down, curls, braids, hair-plins, and all."

We think her acting must have been superior to Lady Macbeth's, when she found out what had happened. By the way, an idea strikes us. Is it "holding the mirror up to nature" when a lady looks at her back hair by means of a hand-glass?"

DECIDEDLY LUXURIOUS.—One of the newly-erected brown-stone houses on the upper Fifth Avenue, New York, contains a picture gallery and theatre combined; a bowling alley in the cellar, croquet ground on the attic floor, billiard room in the basement, and no doubt a mortgage on it.

SCENE AT A PUMP.—What do the Mugginses do with so much water?" "Oh, I think they must wash themselves in it."

A GOOD IDEA.—The Cincinnati Enquirer proposes lectures as a substitute for capital punishment.

The Chicago Lake Side Monthly is also out against lectures:—

"A young man or a young woman who can write a fair magazine article can almost always, with the valuable assistance of lyceums and literary bureaux, make it serve the purposes of a lecture-tour, with the difference that, in the one case, $50 or $100 would be the remuneration, while in the other, shrewd management will yield several thousand dollars. We know of one instance in which a lecture was comfortably used for two or three years with great profit, and finally, tired of the repetition, or despairing of future gains, the essay was hurried in the pages of a popular magazine at the customary price, and its usefulness as a money-making machine was of the past. If this system is not altogether generous in its treatment of the public, it has, at least, the extenuation of personal gain; but there is more reason to wonder that the great public permits itself to be deluded so complacently. The average individual will hesitate for some time before investing thirty-five cents for a magazine which contains the amount of a dozen lectures, with much greater variety, and often of equal merit, and yet will contribute seventy-five cents to hear a public reading of one such article by the author himself or herself. No wonder, with a popular delusion of this kind, that the lecture field should be so fully occupied by all sexes, nationalities, ages, and even colors."

USEFUL INFORMATION.—A barrel of flour weighs one hundred and ninety-six pounds, a barrel of pork two hundred pounds, a barrel of rice six hundred pounds, a keg of powder twenty-five pounds, a firkin of butter fifty-six pounds. The following are sold by weight per bushel: Wheat, beans, and clover-seed, sixty pounds; corn, rye, and flaxseed, fifty-five pounds; buckwheat, fifty-two pounds; barley, forty-eight pounds; coarse salt, eighty-five pounds.

A LOWELL paper is responsible for the following fish story:—

"Andrew Sheffield, who lives in that city, cut the head off of a large mud-turtle this past summer, and two days afterwards, hearing a great noise among the domestic animals in the garden, he found that the cat had been playing with the turtle's head, when the head in retaliation attacked the cat, and attached itself to the feline's head, causing the animal much pain. It was with great difficulty that Mr. Sheffield opened the turtle's mouth and disengaged its grip on the frightened quadruped."

The above is given as if it was a fishy story. We once saw the mouth of a snapping turtle seize a small stick the day after the head had been cut from the body.

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK.—The last number of this incomparable Lady's Magazine has arrived. In addition, the usual number of extra fashions is given in the extension sheet; also numerous designs for fancy work in the "Work Department." The literary matter is of the highest order. Mr. Godey spares neither pains nor expense to make it the most attractive Lady's Book in the world.—Democrat, Washington, Ind.

A HALF-WITTED man, and well-known in the neighborhood many years ago, called in at a farm-house in Scotland where the shearers were sitting round the fire in the centre of the kitchen, the master being beside the men at the time that "Jock" looked in. Not being invited to partake, Jock edged himself near the master and said:—

"If I were Mr. Finnie of Swanston I ken what I wad say."

"Well, Jock," replied Mr. Finnie, "and if you were Mr. Finnie of Swanston, what would you say?"

Jack, scratching his head, "Well! I wad say, Jack, tak a tattle"—i. e., a potato.

When is iron the most ironical? When it's a railing. You can always find a sheet of water on the bed of the ocean.

LOVE GIFTS.—From time immemorial the most usual love gifts have been rings, bracelets of hair, flowers, birds, scented gloves, embroidered handkerchiefs, and such like articles. Autolycus has, in his "peddler's pack:"—

"Golden quoifs and stomachers
For my lads to give their dears."

In ancient Greece, pretty birds were generally love gifts; caged birds were sold in the market at Athens for that purpose. Among the Romans, rings were exchanged; and this custom seems to have prevailed in all ages and every country. Chaucer describes Cressida as giving Troilus a ring with a "posy," and receiving one from him in exchange; and Shakespeare frequently alludes to such tokens. The rings that "Portia" and "Nerissa" present to their betrothed husbands play a conspicuous part in the last act of The Merchant of Venice; and in The Two Gentlemen of Verona, "Julia" says:—

"This ring I gave him when he parted from me,
To bind him to remember my good will."

Swinburn, in his "Treatise on Spousals," gives the following reason for the ring being the chosen emblem of true love: "The form of the ring circular, that is, being round and round without end, importeth thus much, that their mutual love and hearty affection should roundly flow from the one to the other as in a circle, and that continuously and forever." In the most remote ages, the ring or circle was used as an emblem of eternity. In Egypt and Greece, a usual form of emblematical circle was the serpent with its tail in its mouth, and this form has been frequently adopted in rings and bracelets.

The custom of breaking a gold or silver coin between lovers is also very ancient, and may probably have been derived from the old Athenian symbol. A piece of metal or wood was cut into two parts, one half being retained by the native of Attica, the other given to the stranger whose acquaintance he had made. The bearer of the symbol, whether one of the original parties or only a friend, was entitled to all the rites of hospitality from the owner of the other half. Not to acknowledge this duty was considered scandalous and a crime. Coins were no doubt subsequently used because of the facility of recognizing the token by the device. A "bowed" or crooked piece of money was preferred as a love token, being considered more lucky. These broken coins, pledges of love, are frequently referred to in poem and story.

Strutt mentions small embroidered handkerchiefs among the love favors in vogue in England in the olden time. They were about three or four inches square, "wrought round about," with a button or tassel at each corner, and another in the centre. Some were edged with narrow gold lace or twist, and then folded so that the middle might be seen; they were worn by accepted lovers in their hats or at the breast. These were so fashionable in Queen Elizabeth's days that they were sold in the shops at from sixpence to sixteenpence apiece.

Camden, in his "Ancient and Modern Manners of the Irish," speaks of lovers presenting their mistresses with bracelets of woven hair; and among northern nations a knot was a symbol of love and fidelity. The origin of the expression, "true-love knot" is not from true love, as might be supposed, but from the Danish Trulofs kjæde do—I plight my troth.

We see it stated as a remarkable circumstance that a New York magazine reprinted one of its numbers. We have reprinted our January and February numbers—January five times, February six times—and are about putting another edition to press.

JUVENILE DEPARTMENT.

GAMES, FORFEITS.

THE BANDMASTER

Is an excellent game, and appears, from the universal mirth it excites, to embody all the most popular features of such games. The "Bandmaster" may be represented by a lady. All the company is seated in a semicircle, having the bandmaster in the centre. Each member of the party assumes the character of a musician, a fiddler, flutist, trumpeter, cymbal player, drummer, etc. When all the players have chosen their instruments, and informed the bandmaster of their character, the latter begins by beating his hands on his knees for a minute or two, the company attentively imitating the movement. Then, without giving any notice whatever, he suddenly pretends to blow the trumpet, beat the drum, clash the cymbals, or play the violin. The point of the game consists in the player whose instrument is being represented by the bandmaster instantly leaving off beating his knees, and pretending to play his own instrument. Neglect by any instrumentalist to take up the task the instant the bandmaster leads is punished by the payment of a forfeit. During the whole time of the performance, the rest of the company, except the one actually engaged in following the lead of the bandmaster, must continually beat their knees with their hands. The incessant movement is sufficiently fatiguing, particularly if much laughter is excited at the expense of backward performers in assuming their parts when the bandmaster changes the instrument.

UNITED STATES MAIL

Is another mirth-provoking game, demanding ceaseless attention. All the company is to be seated in a circle, with the postmaster in a convenient position to observe every one's movements. On a slip of paper, which he holds in his hand, the postmaster writes down the name of each player and the name of the post town he or she represents. Thus we will say Mr. Smith represents "Colorado," Mr. White "Albany," Miss Brown "Harrisburg," Mrs. Robinson "Chicago," etc. Out-of-the-way places are the best to choose, for the mere fun the allusion causes. The chief aim of the game consists in two or three post towns being on the move at the same time to get into each other's places—a task which is rendered difficult, owing to a blindfolded person being in the middle of the circle ready to catch any one on the way across the circle. For instance, the postmaster, referring to the list, says: "The United States mails are between Colorado, Albany, and Harrisburg." Thereupon the persons representing those localities rise from their seats, and make their way to change places as carefully as they can, to escape the blind man. Whoever is caught in the attempt has to be blindfolded, and so on, as long as the game lasts.

LE BOUQUET

Is a very pretty game, and affords a good deal of fun if the company is so disposed. A gentleman or lady is asked by the leader of the game to choose the flowers of which his or her bouquet shall be composed. We will suppose that a rose, jessamine, myrtle, and geranium are chosen. As each flower is named, the leader writes on a slip of paper the name of some member of the company against each flower. No one is to see what is being written until the list is complete. The leader then reads aloud the names of the flowers, asking the owner of the bouquet what is to be done with their representatives. Thus the leader may ask: "What will you do with the rose?" The owner may reply: "Wear it in my hair." Upon which the leader, turning to the person whose name is written on the list, says: "Miss So-and-so will wear you in her hair." "What will you do with the myrtle?" "Give it away or burn it," may be the answer, etc. etc. The answers should not always be complimentary, lest the spirit of the game should be lost. The ribbon which ties the bouquet is the most interesting feature, and the destination of the ribbon is the crowning point of the game. Some person is generally chosen to represent the ribbon for whom the owner is known to have a decided preference or dislike.

OUI OU NON

Is one of those charming jeux de société for which the French nation are so justly famous. It is quite easy to play the game in English, the object being to avoid saying "yes" or "no" in an animated dialogue. If either of the speakers commits this error, the payment of a forfeit is demanded. Two very pretty and very witty French ladies illustrated this game. The subject under discussion was the payment for a bonnet. One of the speakers represented the milliner, and the other the purchaser. Unfortunately, the bonnet had not been paid for by the time agreed on, and its unbecoming shape, trimming, and general unsuitability to the fair wearer were employed as a plea for payment of the bill being deferred. The milliner became incensed at having her taste criticized, and in the warmth of the discussion retallated upon her customer, pointed out the defects of her complexion and features, and fairly turned the tables on her. It is impossible to tell where the discussion might have ended had not the prohibited word at last been inadvertently uttered, and the forfeit paid. As one of the ladies, flushed with the excitement which the argument had occasioned, remarked: "Talking about bonnets is rather dangerous ground; it is better to suppose that the purchase of a roll of lead is in question. One cannot say anything very personal about lead." Kept within bounds, however, personal traits add zest to the game.

"LE PETIT BON HOMME VIT ENCORE"

Is a very animated game for little folks. Le petit bon homme is a paper spill, which is lighted and handed round by the company. The aim of each person who takes the spill is to keep it alight while the above words are repeated, because the person in whose hand it goes out has to pay a forfeit.

FORFEITS

Are the penalty of most round games, and are sometimes very amusing games in themselves. As they occasion a good deal of interruption to the general mirth, it is not advisable to let too many accumulate before they are "cried." If long forfeits are in prospect, not more than two or three should be collected at a time. Most of the cotillion figures are excellent as forfeits, and afford a pretty diversion from regular games. For example, a gentleman having to pay a forfeit takes his seat in the middle of the room, facing a looking-glass or holding a glass in his hand, by which he may see the face of each person who passes behind him. His task is to choose the lady he likes best, and to waltz round the room with her. One by one the ladies of the company pass behind the forfeit payer, pausing for him to survey their features in his glass. The rejected ladies pass in front until the favorite is chosen, when the waltz terminates the penalty.

OUR newspapers sometimes contain valuable pieces of information. Here is one:—

"SERENADE.—Mr. — was last evening tendered by his friends a serenade, at his residence, on Twenty-third Street above Brown, the occasion being the fifth anniversary of his wedding. The C. C. Band furnished the music. The company was invited into the house, and was handsomely entertained by Mr. —."

The above shows that we are not appreciated. We have been married over seven times five (the length of time of Mr. —), and yet nobody in all that time has tendered us a serenade. There is something remiss in this. Here is another: The workmen of Philadelphia tendered a certain citizen a silver pitcher because he had his articles made by them. Another want of appreciation. No one has tendered us a silver pitcher because our furniture was made in this city. As Artemus Ward would have said, "Why is this thus?"

MISS VERITROO said: "If she had all the money ever paid for liquor, she could buy every foot of land in the world." "Very likely," replied a crusty old bachelor; "and if you had all the money paid by women for back hair, you could buy every drop of liquor in the world."

To the ladies, GODEY'S is invaluable.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

AMERICAN BRACKETED VILLA.

Drawn expressly for Godey's Lady's Book, by ISAAC H. HOBBS & SON, Architects, 809 and 811 Chestnut Street, formerly 436 Walnut Street, Philadelphia.

We present in this number an illustration of an "American Bracketed Villa," designed for Joseph H. Page, Esq., and built by him in the vicinity of Pittsburg. The design itself is so beautiful and attractive as to require no further embellishments from our pen. The difficulty with buildings of this description, where the principal features are duplicated on either side of a common centre, has been the lack of variety to afford a pleasing exterior. In the above building would look well of either wood or brick. If of the latter, they should be rubbed down and painted. It would cost about $6000. We will furnish full plans, working drawings, specifications, and bills of materials for one hundred and fifty dollars, or two and a half per cent. upon the estimated cost.

JOSH BILLINGS says, with a great deal of truth: "There is sum pholks in this world who spend their whole lives a-hunting after righteousness, and kant find enny time to practiss it."

THE FLOWER GARDEN.

NOT knowing how and what to plant deters many from the enjoyment of a Flower Garden, and the neglected front yards and garden-beds tell the tale of rank weeds and grass, where the expenditure of a little time and money would present a scene of beauty and joy, not only to the inmates, but to every passer-by. Mr. Robinson, a distinguished English horticulturist and author, who has recently visited this country, after admiring our beautiful parks and the magnificent scenery of our country, refers to the lack of taste in our country homes. We quote his words:—

"I am disheartened to see the houses, in nearly all parts of the country I have visited, as bald, and bare, and uninviting looking, from the absence of any trace of a garden, as the flank of a grim sea-rock. I saw numbers of what appeared to be farmers' or respectable mechanics' houses with hateful, tall, green powered weeds, leaning over the pathway to the door, and no trace of any plant useful to man or beautiful. Now, I can conceive nothing more dreary than to live in the country and have no garden. To live no garden is to take the poetry and nearly all the charms away from country life; to have a garden is to have many friends continually near."

Now, we propose to offer a few hints for the formation of a Flower Garden. The first requisite is a good soil. Fresh sods from a pasture field, mixed with well-decomposed manure and leaf-mould, will be found suitable for nearly all plants, either in pots in the garden. A soil that is friable and will not bake. When the soil is of a clayey nature, an admixture of sand will be beneficial. Let the amateur bear in mind that a fresh soil is absolutely necessary to grow plants to perfection. It is impossible to grow plants, especially Roses and Verbenas, in old brown-out soil, and this is the condition of the greater portion of town and suburban gardens. No amount of manure will restore the fertility of the soil. Where it is not practicable to renew the entire bed, holes can be dug about one foot deep and square, and filled with fresh soil, in which the plants can be set. In looking over DREER'S Garden Calendar for 1871, we find on page 73 an offer of one hundred plants for ten dollars, a beautiful assortment, which is carefully packed, and can be forwarded by express to the most distant parts of the country. The following is the assortment:—

Ten Everblooming Roses, twenty Verbenas, four Teas, two Alternanthera, four Heliotrope, four China or Ladies' Eardrop, four Petunias, four Lantanas, four Pansies, two Scarlet Sage, one Rose-colored Sage, five Geraniums, including the new double; also several beautiful foliage plants: Carnations, Pinks, Double Dahlias, Gladiolus, Tuberoses, ger Flowers, etc. etc.—in short, such a collection will ensure a continuous bloom throughout the fire season."

The above, with a dollar package of Annual Flower seeds, which can be sown in the open ground during April, will afford you at all times an opportunity to have a fragrant and beautiful bouquet for the drawing-room, or to send to a friend. The following are ready and easily cultivated:—

Sweet Alyssum, White and Purple Candytuft, Roman Asters, China Pinks, Japan Pinks, Golden Pinks, Blue Ageratum, Blue Browallia, Galliard, Fuchsia, Blue Lobelia, Mignonette, Nasturtium, Phlox Drummondii, Scabiosa, Sweet Peas, Double Zinnia, and others.

Let all who have the means cultivate a taste for flowers, and who is there in our favored land who does not? The simplest flowers when well cared for are a source of pleasure. One of the charms of English rural life is the beautiful and well-kept gardens, not only of the rich, but of the poor and humble cottager.

NOTICE TO LADY SUBSCRIBERS.

Having had frequent applications for the purchase of jewelry, millinery, etc., by ladies living at a distance, the Editor of the Fashion Department will hereafter execute commissions for any who may desire it, with the charge of a small percentage for the time and research required. No order will be attended to unless the money is first received. Neither the Editor nor the Publisher will be accountable for losses that may occur in re-mitting.

When goods are ordered, the fashions that prevail here govern the purchase; therefore, no articles will be taken back. When the goods are sent, the transaction must be considered final.

CHITCHAT

ON FASHIONS FOR APRIL.

OWING to the cold season which has continued so late this spring, goods have not been opened as early as usual, and the styles have not been as yet fully decided upon.

Silks take the first place in the scale of dress goods, and this season are especially pretty, the prices being lower than for some time past. We do not wish our readers to misunderstand us, and imagine silks can be bought for a mere nothing, for such is not the case; but in comparison to the prices of the past year (which have been very high), they are reasonable. Black silks retain all their old popularity, and, although colored suits are worn, no lady considers her wardrobe complete without at least one handsome suit of black silk; in fact, many ladies wear nothing else, allowing the bonnet, or hat, gloves, and scarf, to be the only color worn. Black silks are seen in all qualities from as low as $1.50 per yard to $20. The former are partly cotton, or of a poor quality of silk, which, after a few times wearing, becomes defaced, catches the dust, and looks worse than a good quality that has been worn a year. A suit of the Buffalo brand of alpaca is far more desirable than a poor silk; it looks well as long as it wears, and the gloss on it at a short distance makes it look like silk. Ruffles, quillings, fringed-out ruches, and platings are the favorite trimmings where the material is used. Gimps, fringe, and velvet are also extensively used; the latter, although heavy looking, still meets with favor with a few. A beautiful but frail trimming is ruffles of silk fringed out very deeply, and very slightly gathered where they are put on; a fringed out ruche heads each ruffle.

In colored silks, we notice stripes and small plaids and checks, which are always worn and look ladylike and genteel without making an expensive dress. Plain colored silks in all the many shades of fawn and gray are popular for street dresses; they are mostly made of two shades of the same, or of two good contrasting colors. The striped silks are of delicate gray, fawn, or white, with stripes of blue, green, brown, black, or lilac. These stripes are broad, and narrow, the two together, and, in fact, in all styles that stripes were ever known to assume.

Poplins rank next in beauty. The silk poplin for summer wear is light in texture, and has all the appearance of a handsome silk without being as expensive; silk of the same shade is used for trimming. The Japanese poplins are a thin, wiry goods, pretty to look at in the piece, but wear stringy and look defaced with a few times wearing; they are not worth purchasing except in party colors, where they make a handsome, cheap, and for evening wear a serviceable dress, as a dress of that kind cannot be worn much before it becomes soiled. There are a large number of wool and silk, all wool, and wool and cotton goods that bear the name of poplins, the generality of which wear very poorly, and do not pay for the labor and money paid for making them.

French chintzes are not as much seen as in years gone by; percales have taken their place, and can be seen in all the delicate tints in plain goods; in white and colored stripes, white and plain colored grounds, with tiny bouquets, dots, squares, diamonds, and stars scattered over them.

Ordinary calicoes have reached their old time price of twelve and a half cents per yard; and an endless variety of white grounds, with small black figures over them, are seen. They wash well, and make a neat, serviceable morning dress for a lady, with the addition of a colored necktie at the throat.

For small children, piques will this month be made up. They are an inexpensive dress, the principal expense and trouble being the constant doing up which they require, but this is a trifling consideration, for after they are done up, they are like new again.

Braiding, embroidery, galloons, and braids, with plain muslin ruffles, are the trimmings most used; all white is the most popular, as it always washes well, which cannot be said of all the colors which we notice.

White corduroy is again used for sacques. Those persons who were obliged to lay them aside for the cold blasts of winter can again resume them. For children we consider them particularly pretty; they wash nicely, and can be done up at home with very little trouble. For ladies they are nice for cool days for riding, and are convenient where an extra wrap is desired; they are also very nice for breakfast sacques.

Skirts of dresses, both for street and house wear, are ruffled on the back breadths. A black gros grain skirt has an apron trimming of velvet bands or gimp.

The rest of the skirt widths are entirely covered with flounces with fringed out edges. Gros grain basque, with veat. There is, of course, no overskirt. For evening dresses these ruffles are of two contrasting colors. These narrow flounces on the back of the skirt make a dress gracefully bouffant behind, and the untrimmed front is as flat as fashion requires.

How to make a trained black silk, is the inquiry of many correspondents. The most elegant seen lately dispense with overskirts and flounces, having merely a plain skirt, gored front and sides, with three full back breadths without ornament, unless an elaborate tablier is formed. One lately seen has a train over two yards long, shortened to the stylish demi-length by tapes under the belt tied to others in the seams of the back breadths three-quarters of a yard below, making two irregular bouffant puffs like wings. Straight across the broad front width are nine rows of thread lace slightly full, and each row headed by a cord passementerie passed down the front, around the point, and edging the entire corsage. In this dress, thread lace was used, but guipure and the duchesse are very stylish, the latter producing a beautiful effect. Young ladies wear black duchesse lace over white blonde lace, or else white plaited tarlatane on black silk dresses.

Very fanciful aprons are in style abroad. The design is to form an elegant tablier for plainly trimmed but rich silk dresses. Many are made of black velvet, with lace garniture; others are of silk, laden with braiding, embroidery, and jet.

Extremely pretty indoor jackets are made with short cut-up basques in front, and one long rounded basque at the back, on which two revers are joined. The entire jacket is edged with floss fringe, and lined throughout with silk of the same color. The sleeves, which are of the pagoda form, are very wide and pointed, and are likewise trimmed with floss fringe. They can be made in white, blue, pink, or mauve cashmere. But the most elegant jackets for indoor wear are made of China crêpe, and the colors preferred are saffron-yellow, caroubier-red, and black; silk passementerie, with gold intermixed, is used for the trimming. When black China crêpe is used, it is embroidered with flowers, worked with thick brilliant silk, or with leaves veined with gold. Very pretty ribbed braid of a checked gold and black pattern is also used on black crêpe jackets. The plain gold braid is now considered common, as it has been so lavishly employed on dresses and mantles of all descriptions; in fact, it has been quite abused.

China crêpe sashes are now much used with dresses intended for outdoor wear. They are wide scarfs, which are knotted in an unstudied manner in the back. China crêpe is such a soft material that it lends itself readily to tunics, cravats, sashes, jackets, etc., and always with advantage.

Braiding is the fashionable trimming for children's clothing. Rich thick patterns, like heavy embroidery, are braided on plain color dresses, in soutache or star braid the color of the dress. The skirts are but little gored, and are box-plaited to a plain waist that fastens behind. A belt with square tab makes this look dressy. Both high and low-necked waists are worn; the latter being made comfortable on cool days by underwaists of tucked and puffed muslin.

The kilt suits worn by little boys still in dresses are prettily ornamented this season with diamond-shaped gilt buttons. They are made of blue, gray, or light-colored plaids or wash goods. Black braid binding is the only trimming. Two rosettes are placed on the skirt on the right side, just where the plaits are left off, and the front becomes plain.

With the new shaped bonnets and hats, the veil fashionably worn is a yard of black dotted net, or of plain large meshed Brussels, hemmed all around, with a string in one end, or else one of the new steel springs, to fasten it around the front of the hat. The veil should not be very wide, as it must pass smoothly over the face, and hang without gathers. Thread veils, with narrow wrought borders of this shape, are also worn. A thread lace an inch wide surrounds many veils.

In parasols for ordinary wear, the unbleached linen-color pongee is the favorite material, lined with pink, blue, green, or lilac silk. For full dress, lace lined with colored silk, and handsome handle, is most worn.

Bonnets have become visible, tangible things, large enough to form a covering for the head, and are likely to increase in size. The close half gypsy, half cottage shapes still remain in vogue, and are gradually superseding round hats. They are universally becoming, and ladies say have "character;" are distinatif looking, and are quite as convenient as round hats, since they fit the head closely, and may be removed without disarranging the hair. Gypsies are not worn as far forward as formerly. They show a little of the parted hair above the forehead, and fit snugly over the top of the drooping chataleine of massive plaits. Chip and English straw gypsies, trimmed with black velvet and ostrich tips, are seen for early spring wear. Some of these have a straw curtain or cape, others have a velvet curtain, and again others leave the chataleine exposed. Black straws are also used, and not smooth straws only, but the serviceable rough-and-ready. Later in the season velvet and feathers will be too heavy, and thick repped ribbons, with the fine French flowers now so little used, will be restored. Very large flowers, especially great crushed roses, with browned leaves, are stylish; also wreaths of violets, and vines of ivy. Donna Maria gauze, black, white, and colored, will also be used in the way of ruches and scarfs. Ladies who buy three or four bonnets at once should supply themselves with one of black lace for intermediate seasons. Nothing can be handsomer for early spring. These are extremely stylish when trimmed with ostrich tips of Niles green, blue, or rose color, instead of the tea roses and pink flowers so long worn. Ladies who object to any color permit richly carved jets and a black ostrich tip for garniture.

Crinoline, or rather the hoop skirt, is superseded by the tournure. This tournure or bridle is made very large, rising high above the hips, and extending the dress skirts to such a size that they hang away from the person, and look as round as if hoops were worn. Dress skirts, to fall gracefully over the tournure, must be made very full behind and at the sides. The tournure is made with hoops, either with muslin or crinoline over them. Persons who do not desire to have their dresses to stand out so much around the hips still continue to wear a moderate-sized hoop skirt, which makes the dress hang more uniform.

Ladies of fashion in Europe find fault with the chataleine braids that fall so low behind as to soil the dress, and are returning to classic styles of hair-dressing, modelling their coiffures after those of antique statues. The most successful imitation is of the beautiful head of Pysche, with the slightly waved hair low on the forehead, drawn back from the temples, and confined by a fillet of ribbons, while clustered ringlets fall back from the top of the head. It is predicted that we will return to the purely Greek style—a severely plain Grecian twist at the back, and smooth bands in front. Great, great would the change be from the present style of coiffure of our many would-be belles. Time alone will show.

"HOLD

Firmly to the great principle that in sickness Nature should be assisted not prostrated. It is because Tarrant's Effervescent Seltzer Aperient refreshes and invigorates the system, while it removes, without pain, all obstructive matter from the bowels, that it has become a standard alterative, and is superseding all the stereotyped purgatives which have heretofore racked, and scourged, and weakened the human frame. The tonic, cathartic, and anti-bilious ingredients so happily blended in the waters of the celebrated Seltzer spring, as well as the ebullience peculiar to that natural corrective and febrifuge, impart

FAST

TO

this chemical counterpart of the German Spa a purifying, renovating, and regulating influence which does not exist in any other medicinal preparation in use. It quiets the disturbed stomach, promotes perspiration, quickens the action of the kidneys, and superinduces delightful tranquility of the nervous system which is hailed by every invalid as a certain indication of convalescence. The saline elements of the Seltzer Aperient, being taken up by the absorbents, have also a salubrious effect upon the secretions and the blood. This is the preparation now being prescribed by physicians everywhere as a superior cathartic, nervine tonic, and blood depurent. Violent drugs have had their day. The faculty and the sick alike discard them, and having proved the excellence of the APERIENT, are determined to "hold fast to that which is GOOD."

THAT

WHICH IS

The preparation will keep for any length of time, and all that is necessary to convert the powder into a sparkling, foaming, thirst-quenching, and delicious draught is the addition of a little cold water. Thus may every invalid have a duplicate of the Seltzer Spa at his elbow, although the natural fountain bubbles from the earth in Prussia, four thousand miles away.

shel-ter and bread, Oft-en I feel as mo-ther a-way, And left me lone-ly here.

ach-ing heart, And wish that I were dead.

CHARITY CHILD.

She was good and kind cares to me, And all the Life is full of

sor rows, too, For I'm on ly char-i-ty's child, As life I wan-der through.

3. Mother dear, why did you die
And go away from me?
Leaving me here a motherless one,
A child of charity?
Would this weary life was done
And I was in my grave,
I am tired of wandering here
I'm worse than any slave.

GETTING ON IN THE WORLD.

BY MARION HARLAND.

PART IV.

"My objection should commend itself to your common sense, Estelle. I have not hitherto opposed your frequent visits to your parents, ill-advised as I have thought the intimacy was. When they have returned these at such times as I was at home, I have received them politely. In their absence, I have refrained scrupulously from critical remarks with regard to their social standing, their manners, or aught else that might wound you. I leave it to your conscience to say whether you have been as forbearing in your strictures upon my friends."

"You have had no cause of complaint." The wife's eyes flashed and her lips trembled. "My relatives have behaved towards you with respect I have often thought was exaggerated and unwarranted, even by what you are pleased to call the 'bottomless gulf lying between you and them.' While, from the day I was married until now, I have been reminded, in every imaginable way and at all times, that I was an alien in your family and circle of acquaintances. Your father scarcely notices me at all, your mother patronizes and advises me as she might a half-witted savage, your sisters are censorious, your brothers carelessly familiar as to a promoted chambermaid; but the same feeling moves them all."

"You are choice in your use of terms," interrupted the husband.

"The thing I describe is more offensive than my language," was the retort. "It is spite—low, ignoble, malicious! Your relatives resented your marriage with a woman of inferior caste as a blot upon your family record, and they will never forgive me for having attracted you on to your degradation and theirs. They have not tried to hide this from me. They have published the existence of it to their associates, who have taken the key-note from them readily enough. These accept invitations to the house bought and furnished by Peter Wells, drink wines and eat dainties paid for with the marriage-portion Peter Wells gave his daughter, because she is Guy Stuyvesant's wife. They compromise the question of the deviation from aristocratic usage by insolent neglect of, or disgraceful condescension to their hostess. Talk of gentle breeding! My father is a truer gentleman at heart than any I have met in the exalted sphere where I am barely tolerated, and he is unrepresentable."

Guy laughed contemptuously, seemingly unmoved by the torrent of invective.

"Having, as usual, talked yourself into a breathless heat, you have only come around to the point from which I started. Honest Peter, although a worthy man in his way, is not presentable in court circles. He puts the king's English to a violent death in every sentence, and is utterly ignorant of the alphabet of polite etiquette. At this party he would be ill at ease, and my friends would have a right to feel affronted at having his acquaintanceship forced upon them. Your mother would get along better, for she dresses in tolerable taste, and speaks correctly. But she lacks the unmistakable stamp of thorough breeding, and is, moreover, as well known as the whilome factory-girl, as your father is for the fat machinist, who may be seen, any day, riding about town on the spring seat of one of his ponderous wagons, chatting familiarly with his driver. You may wish to ignore these things, but others have not your reasons of desiring forgetfulness. These stormy scenes are in bad taste. I have borne with them the more patiently on account of your antecedents. I had hoped that, despite these, you would gradually tone down to the style of your present associates. Altercation is vulgar and useless. I will have none of it in the house of which I am master. That I am master here, you will do well to remember."

"You threaten me, then!"

No man of sense and acuteness would have pressed her further without apprehension of open revolt, after looking in her face, and hearing the indignant disdain breaking up through her voice.

"Threats are undignified and dangerous. I merely assert my rights, and define your position."

"My position! No slave was ever more oppressed! no beggar more helpless!" cried Estelle, bursting into tears. "I wish I were either! I wish I had died before I sold myself to you! I have lost everything that was dear and lovely—and gained what?"

Guy walked out of the apartment without a word; and she heard him, in the lulls of her passionate weeping, knocking about the balls in the billiard-room, humming, meanwhile, an opera air in a high falsetto, always unpleasant to her musical ear, which now rasped her nerves to rawness.

Without a tithe of his father's talents or moral probity, he had a will as stubborn, a sense of his self-importance as strong, as was possessed by the pompous Congressman. For the senior Stuyvesant had gained his election, although unsupported by the wealthy "vulgarian." In this one thing Peter had stood firm, was proof against the insinuating arts of his daughter's suitor and his wife's more direct appeals.

"I'll vote the way my conscience leads me," he asserted, sturdily. "I don't like Stuyvesant's politics no better than I do his blood."

The Stuyvesant interest and Stuyvesant money were more potent in other quarters, and he was returned an "Honorable" by a small majority. Family bickerings might be tabooed in the patrician code, but a cherished spite was not. The distinguished tribe never forgot or forgave the obduracy of the low-born man to whom they had stooped in vain. They were likewise bitterly chagrined at Guy's engagement to Estelle Wells, which he announced by letter to his parents during their first winter in Washington.

"Finding I had wasted my efforts to serve my father," he wrote to his mother, "it occurred to me to undertake a little speculation on my own private account. You have seen the young lady, and that she will not disgrace Lady Stuyvesant's salon, even in the metropolis. Au resto, there are not ten richer men in the city than her father, whose habit is, moreover, apoplectic. I do not expect to be overwhelmed with parental and sisterly benedictions upon the occasion of my nuptials. I have too much confidence in your worldly wisdom not to feel confident that you will appreciate the solid advantages of this alliance to your too-often impecunious son."

"A cool, young rascal!" growled the august father, yet already half-appeased by the arguments adduced by his eldest hope in support of his choice.

And coolly Guy went through his part of the performances from betrothment to ceremony; receiving his mother's and sisters' tearful exhortations, his brothers' sneers, his acquaintances' wondering comments as philosophically as he viewed his prospective mamma-in-law's ill-suppressed exultation, Peter's real despondency at the prospect of his daughter's marriage, and Estelle's moods, varying from the wildest gaiety to uncontrollable gloom.

No one but Mrs. Wells ever guessed at the trials, the conflicts, the labors, and discouragements that beset the manoeuvring parent throughout that betrothal season. Perhaps she did not then apprehend clearly the fact that she drove her child into this union as surely as the priests of old dragged the garlanded heifer to the altar steps. She never said: "You shall marry this man, and cast from you the memory of him your heart would have selected." She merely made it seem so far expedient that she should adopt this course, that it was next to impossible for her to break the net of circumstances and sophistical reasoning. And in all this she honestly believed she was serving her child. I have seen the like process carried on to a similar result by other loving mothers—Christian women, exemplars to the rest of their sex in their day and generation. In proportion to the docility and filial piety of the daughter, is the danger that the promptings of her heart and judgment will be thus overruled. "Mother knows best" is a safe dictum for the nursery. There may come a time in the woman's life when, in this, she should put away childish things. The attachment between this mother and child had been peculiarly sweet and strong. Mrs. Wells had found in it her chief solace and encouragement in her weary travel fashionward. It was the main lever in the accomplishment of her masterpiece. Never had she been more fond, never more watchful, never more ingenious in the invention of diversions from serious thought than during the three months separating the betrothal from the nuptials; never before so lavish of caresses and of money. Estelle's trousseau; the elegant establishment, furnished from basement to attic in accordance with the young couple's taste; the handsome carriage and horses, which were among the father's wedding gifts; the princely dowry settled upon her beyond recall were the town-talk.

Peter's compeers shook doubtful heads over the relinquishment into the hands of a notorious rake and spendthrift of so generous a share of his well-earned wealth. Guy's associates congratulated him upon his successful cast into the uncertain waters of Fortune, and nearly every one in both sets understood perfectly that the match was entirely one of convenience—a regular barter of social advantages for those money alone could buy. A whisper crept through the community, originating with the clerks in Mr. Wells' employ, that he had never looked so grave over any other cheques as over the many and heavy ones he drew in those days, payable to his wife's order. He was not an avaricious man, commented the newsmongers, but the most generous architect of his own fortune must feel a twinge at seeing his gains melting away like spring snow in the blaze of the prosperity suddenly shed from the aristocratic firmament upon his humble house. He was shrewd enough to foresee, went on the ale, that young Stuyvesant's easily-gotten riches would be many-winged, and fly in all directions. If these were the misgivings that beset thrifty Peter's soul, he kept them to himself, with other thoughts that shadowed his rubicund face with anxiety, made him more shy than ever of trying to "put things into words." He was taciturn, even with his lately-admitted junior partner, who had a desk in his principal's private office. Charley Burt never complained of this reserve; never mentioned to his mother—the only confidante of his illated love—how often, when the two were together with no observers near, he felt the grave eyes of his old friend fixed upon him with exceeding tenderness of sympathy, with longing and regret. He understood, and so did she, why Mr. Wells made an errand abroad for his confidential agent a month before Estelle's wedding day. Charley kept all his life the letter that followed him to Birmingham.

"I have it in my mind to give you a long holiday," wrote Peter, with his own hand. "Arthur's yere at the Germain colldge is up, and he wrights me he feels to want to travel further yet. He woud like to go to Egypt and he holey land, he says. He's pretty stiddy, but I should be better satisfide if he had someoddy to keep him companny. Won't you bleege me by going along? I ain't got but he one boy"—(he had written "child," and erased it, Charley noticed, with a swelling heart, noting that the letter was dated the day after Estelle's marriage.) "I ain't got but the one boy left, you see, and I had ought to talk good care on him. I can trust him to you. You two was alwayse frends, and the trip will do you good, my dear feller. I have wrote to Arthur to draw on me for traveling expences or as much as he needs. Pleas except the inlosed as a trifling presint from a frend who vill alwayse wish you hapiness. God bless you!"

You may be sure that Mrs. Wells had no suspicions of this letter or the accompanying cheque. She was too deeply absorbed in the contemplation of her own consequence as the mother of Mrs. Guy Stuyvesant, Jr., to waste any thoughts about the absent "ineligible;" too busy laying plans for the winter campaign to be seeking out medicine for the wounded spirit of the grocer's son.

"It is quite a part of a young gentleman's education in this day to make the grand tour of Europe and the East," she was fond of remarking to the "best people" on her visiting-list. "My son has made a speciality of modern languages during his residence in Heidelberg with a view to this end. And we have sent out a young man—a protégé of his, who is a most trustworthy and intelligent person—to act as his business agent and compagnon de voyage. I long to have you see my son, my dear Mrs. De la Crème. I have been most happy in both my children; have known the sweetest of a mother's joys, with few of a mother's sorrows."

All this, while she was nearly sure the person she addressed would laugh her, her pretensions to intimacy with herself, and her sentimentality to scorn the moment her back was turned.

"I cannot afford to be thin-skinned," she reasoned, within herself. "If I tell these people often enough how worthy I and my children are to consort with them, they may believe me in time."

Her courage had revived since she confessed to Estelle, with shame of heart and face, her conviction that she could never move in line with the elect of fortune. Elate with her success at achieving an alliance with the "proudest Howard" among them, she became what Mrs. Stuyvesant privately characterized to her daughters as "audacious." She would enter the Paradise of her riper years—Society—in her daughter's train. The first blow to these anticipations was unlooked for and, for the time, stunning. Mrs. Guy Stuyvesant, Sr., made a feast to her lords and ladies, yecept a "reception" for the bridal pair on their return from their honeymoon trip, and pointedly omitted each and all of the bride's relatives from the number of her chosen ones.

"I fear your wife will be wounded," she said to her son. "Mais ce n'est que le premier pas qui coûte. We must begin as we mean to go on. If we lift the flood-gates now, we may find it difficult to close them when we would. And you cannot"—imploringly—"you certainly do not expect us to adopt all these people!"

"By no means." Guy twirled his moustache. "It is the last thing I should desire, nor do I suppose Estelle will care a straw about it. If she is wounded, she must get over it as best she can. I am as anxious to shake off the connection as you can be. The sooner Mamma Wells and Auntie Clark learn their proper place, the better."

Estelle did not care how early or how severe was the lesson to her aunt, but the open slight to her mother stung her acutely; was the cause of the first "scene" between herself and her husband. She had been flattered by Guy Stuyvesant's offer; dazzled by the brilliant prospect it opened to her; pleasantly bewildered by her elevation above the heads of her family asso-clates. She had not dared to question her heart as to her feelings for Charley Burt. Since she could not marry him, she resolutely put away his image from her thoughts, and as resolutely endeavored to prefer the man she wedded, to all others. Her eyes were open to the incongruity in many of their tastes and views, but she honestly believed that he loved her, and was hopeful of moulding him according to her wishes by means of that affection. In other circumstances, she would have been too proud to sue for such a boon, even at his hands. But she knew how confidently her mother expected to attend this reception; that the dress she was to wear—a magnificent black velvet with diamonds—was already determined upon; knew how much her appearance in Mrs. Stuyvesant's drawing-room as an invited guest signified to the cousin of Guy's ex-avant nurse; and the daughter's heart recoiled with pain and pity at thought of her disappointment when the invitations had been issued for some days, and Mrs. Wells had received none. In her distress, Estelle begged her six-weeks old lord to ask his mother for a card for hers; when he evaded her importunities, and then demurred openly, was so unwise as to insist warmly.

"I really think it is due to me," she said. "I shall regard the neglect as a personal insult, and show Mrs. Stuyvesant that I do."

"This is sheer folly and bluster, Estelle," returned the bridegroom, but with no show of temper. "In all matters of social etiquette, my mother is, of course, a better judge than yourself. There must be no appeal from her decision; no disregard of her advice. You will learn this in time."

Apparently it was a hard lesson, or Estelle was an unwilling scholar. A year after her marriage, there was born to her a son, and it was with reference to what guests should be asked to the christening party that her opposition to the Stuyvesant ostracism arose to a hotter height than she had before betrayed. Guy's complaisance with regard to the baby's name had encouraged her to hope for other things than his absolute command that neither of her parents should be invited to witness the ceremony, or to participate in the subsequent festivities.

When the aristocratic scion was but three weeks old, Mr. Wells dropped in late one Sunday afternoon to see his daughter. She lay on the sofa in her dressing-room, playing with the babe on her arm, the fashionable nurse having so far relaxed her rules as to leave him in her charge for half an hour. Big Peter kissed mother and child without speaking, and sitting down beside the couch, watched them for a few minutes, still in silence, hearkening to the baby patois, falling from the happy parent's tongue, reminding him more of his merry old-time pet—always his darling—than anything else he had heard or seen in her since he mutely answered the query, "Who giveth this woman to be married to this man?"

By and by, he said, abruptly: "Have you had any thought of calling him 'Clarence'?"

"I have not. The name is not yet decided upon," was the reply.

"I wish it could be so," continued Peter, hurriedly, looking away from her as he spoke, a trick he had when strongly moved. "I've jest been out there. Maybe you've never mistrusted that I went there always on Sundays. It kinder helps things along when the world drags heavy on me. You'll understand what I mean better now you've got one of your own. He"—nodding at the baby—"looks some like the other. But, of course, you must do jest what your husband says about it, as about everything else. That's the safest rule for a wife in these 'ere matters. He's got a better right nor me to say what shall be. It was only a notion I had, seeing you and the baby here together so comfortable, and thinking to myself how I used to enjoy the little chap that's gone. I dare say I hadn't ought to a'spoke of it."

Estelle, thinking in her turn over by-gone days, and reviewing this little incident in the Sabbath evening, after her father had gone, and the boy been retaken by the nurse, was touched to tears in the remembrance, and took heart, when her husband came in to say "good-night," to express her desire that the child should bear her dead brother's name, enforcing her petition by an account of her father's agitation, and the words that had so wrought upon her sensibilities.

Guy mused, his wife fancied, tenderly as gravely.

"It's a nice enough name," was his conclusion. "And it might be a neat investment for the monkey. On the whole, you may as well tell your father that he has named his first grandson. We ought to be thankful he did not suggest 'Peter Wells,' instead."

The first returns from the "investment" were a gold cup, salver and ladle; knife, fork, spoon, and napkin-ring, marked with the child's name in full, from Mrs. Wells, and an envelope directed to him by his grandfather, containing certificates of bank stock to the amount of ten thousand dollars.

"Very handsomely done," said Guy, in looking them over.

"My father and mother are niggardly in nothing," replied Estelle, "with pride reflecting, as she said it, upon certain parsimonious propensities she had detected in Stuyvesant père and mère."

It seemed after this munificence, an exhibition of monstrous ingratitude to exclude her generous relatives from her house. She considered, and did not hesitate to say, that they, above all others, had earned the right to appear as her honored guests. She battled to gain the point as she had never fought before, only to suffer a signal defeat. She had been assisted by her mother in the arrangement for the fête. Mrs. Wells had presented the christening-robe, and gone with her daughter to the confectioner's and florist's to order the supper and flowers.

"You were indiscreet," observed Guy, when she stated this. "I have often expressed the desire that you would choose some more suitable companion and adviser in these expeditions. My mother or Maude are fitter to direct your taste. But since the thing is done, you, not I, must bear the consequences of your imprudence."

He was angered by her entreaties, and her intemperate charges against his nearest of kin, but he would not imitate her want of taste by flying into a passion, especially as he was the victor in the conflict of wills. She had had her quietus and her final orders. He hoped the impervious Wellses would be taught by this sharp hint the difference between rank and money. He had no fear of disinheritance before his eyes. He had seen far enough into Peter's character to be assured that no amount of neglect and ill-usage could rob his daughter of her place in his heart. He knew, moreover, through Estelle, from whom her mother had no secrets, that Mr. Wells had already made his will, dividing his immense property into three equal parts, one of which was bequeathed to his first-born, while his wife's third was hers in fee-simple, and would probably at her decease be added to her favorite's portion. Guy, Jr., had lined his nest with softest and thickest down in espousing the pretty plebeian, but that was no reason why eagles should, as a rule, consort with elder-ducks. He was not imaginative, and he put it in different language.

"Hang it!" he muttered, poisoning his cue in scientific style for a "fancy shot" in his solitary billiard practice. "They are not our sort, and I won't have them forever hanging around. A man's wife should take his rank, and this cannot be while she is hampered with a horde of objectionable kinspeople. That Wells woman makes herself altogether too much at home in my house. It sets Madame Mère's teeth on edge to meet her. She was badgering me about it yesterday, and the girls vow they will cut her dead the next time they are brought together here, or anywhere else. If Estelle were not so deucedly sensitive, she would see that I mean to spare her pain, and her friends open insult."

Not being imaginative, as I have said, it never occurred to him in this benevolent soliloquy, or afterward, that his wife would resist the imperial ukase. He did not care how ungently the news of her banishment was broken to Mrs. Wells, provided he were annoyed with no more "scenes;" nor how awkwardly painful the task was to Estelle. His part of the business was accomplished. The details were for her to manage. Yet, in his careless, ease-loving soul, he was relieved that Estelle did not again refer to the subject, and that she had managed to get the revelation over with her mother without offending her; for Mrs. Wells spent the forenoon of the important day with her daughter, discussing with her the preliminaries of the evening's exhibition. Study the proprieties, and school herself in them as she might, poor Ellie had not yet learned to submit the duty of "entertaining" philosophically to fate and trained servants. Guy inwardly swore at her as "fussy," hearing her talk and queries during luncheon, yet treated her more graciously than he generally did.

"She's a sensible woman, after all. She accepts the situation," he thought, noting her cheerful face as she kissed her daughter at leaving. "Estelle overrated her expectations, or her sensibility. These people are used to hard knocks, and being kept under."

Master Clarence's gifts—numerous and costly—were set in array in the rear room of the suite, and when Estelle came down stairs, dressed to receive her guests, she found her husband inspecting them. He smiled disagreeably in looking up at her.

"You are officious in advertising the fact that honest Peter is père aux cœurs. There will be but one opinion as to the taste of this display among the people you have invited for this evening. I call this a sort of 'Brumma-gem' arrangement."

Under a glass shade in the centre of the table were the certificates of bank stock set to the credit of Clarence Stuyvesant, with Peter Wells' card laid conspicuously upon them, and next this was Mrs. Wells' present of plate.

"It is customary to place the handsomest presents in a conspicuous position," rejoined Estelle, dryly, and—whether intentionally or not, her husband could not determine—her eye wandered to the corner on which stood a plain silver pap-cup, bearing the Stuyvesant crest, and accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. Stuyvesant's card.

Guy liked neither the glance nor her manner, which was coldly, defiant.

"If there were time, I should insist upon a different arrangement of these things," he said, severely. "Your polite design cannot be misunderstood by my friends."

"As you like. It is immaterial to me what place is occupied by my friends' gifts. The spectators will classify them for themselves."

The dispute was arrested by the first ring announcing an arrival; and, three minutes later, the well-mated pair were welcoming their guests with sunny smiles and suave speech, apparently upon as amiable terms with one another as with Fortune.

The Stringhams, haughty and shabby; General Monekton, wife, and daughter, distinguished English tourists; the Stuyvesants in great force in honor of the christening of a member of the royal family, and their guest, the daughter of an ex-Secretary; the bishop of the diocese and his stately spouse, who was a blood-relation of Mrs. Stuyvesant; honorables not a few and judges many—all notabilia in society and State—poured into the elegant rooms, and were received by the debonair host and his beautiful wife, who looked like a princess in her white silk dress and tiara of diamonds. The parlors were three-quarters full, when the crowd about the door parted somewhat widely to allow the entrance of Mr. and Mrs. Peter Wells!

Guy plumed himself upon his imperturbability in situations that would unhinge most men's nerves and tempers; but his wife heard him draw in his breath hissing, with an execration uttered too low for any other ears, before the new-comers were near enough to be saluted. Then he bowed over his mother-in-law's hand with his wonted grace of ceremony before joining his slender fingers to honest Peter's big, stubby ones, that looked like tightly-stuffed sausages in white kid cases. He understood it all in a flash of thought and memory. His wife was in open revolt, and in the blindness of rebellion she had made her parents the unconscious instruments of her revenge and his discomfiture. The scheme was artful in conception and execution. While he and she lived, he would never forget or forgive the deception and the humiliation. This was the hour of her triumph, for which she should pay dearly. The devil within him was slow, but a deep and vindictive one, as some of his own blood and certain of his early associates had cause to know. Estelle had aroused it in all its might, and it would not be laid easily or soon. It was rampant under the decorous crust of serious attention, as he stood, side by side, with his boy's mother, and listened to the solemn vows dictated by the right reverend to the sponsors, relative to the renunciation on the child's behalf of "the devil and all his works; the vain glory and pomp of the world, with all covetous desires of the same, and the sinful desires of the flesh."

For did not the name given in baptism recall his acquiescence in a vulgarian's whim and the ruse by which his wife had won this? His rule had been too mild. He had been willing to behave to her as a gentlewoman should be treated, but the coarser blood could only be controlled by stringent measures. From this night he would forbid absolutely, and upon penalty of his severest displeasure, all intercourse between herself and her parents. She must be brought into subjection, and be kept there.

Mrs. Wells was in high feather this evening; less inclined than usual to discern slights she yet dared not notice, more certain of her foothold upon the slippery steps of social promotion. Several amiable or money-worshipping guests complimented her upon the taste and munificence of her offerings and her husband's to the infant heir; and Estelle kept her near her most of the time, introducing her right and left with a freedom that startled the mother, until she set it down to the fullness of her child's love for her. The child, who had, at last, unlocked the golden door leading to the really "best circles," brought to her in this hour of glad exaltation fruition and content. She could have fallen down and worshipped her where she stood, the fairest in that assembly of fair patricians—the diamonds, her father's bridal present, set like a crown of glory upon her forehead. In the delirium of her joy Mrs. Wells forgot her husband, until she felt his tug upon her sleeve.

"I ain't feeling just right to-night, Ellie," he said, in a loud whisper. "These rooms is powerful hot, and so perfumery like I can't get my breath. My head has ached all day, and I am downright sleepy. I guess I'll take myself off quiet-like, and get home and to bed."

"The best thing you could do," answered the excellent wife, promptly. "You need not press through the crowd in the hall. Go into the conservatory, and so out to the back gate. You know the way?"

"Yes," said Peter, looking stupid, nevertheless. "You'll say 'good-night' to Stelly and the rest on 'em for me, won't you?"

Mrs. Wells reddened at seeing a young lady in front of her put up her bouquet to hide a smile, also that Mrs. Stuyvesant was near enough to overhear what was said.

"I will make it all right with Estelle. She is too much engaged to miss you. If you take the carriage, don't forget to send it back for me. But the night is so pleasant, perhaps the walk may do your head good."

By dint of patient steering, Peter escaped into the small but pretty conservatory lying back of the state apartments. The air was deliciously fresh in comparison with the reek of Parisian extracts in the steam-heated parlors, and he felt strangely giddy and tired.

"My brain's fairly wore out with looking over accounts these two days," he said to himself. "There's where I miss Charley again. I may's well rest a bit here and listen to the music before I start for home; it's kinder peaceful and pleasant."

He stooped over the tinkling fountain in the middle of the room, and bathed his face; dried it in his pocket-handkerchief, mopping and rubbing his temples hard; and, espying a lounge at the far end of the vista of flowering shrubs, put aside their branches and the vine-streamers depending from the glass roof very tenderly, as he handled all delicate and helpless things, and sidled down the narrow aisle to this resting-place. Several pairs of volatile young people, straying in thither, saw him sleeping soundly on the rustic sofa, in the course of the evening, and, hearing his heavy snore, made very merry over his supposed semi-intoxication; while the story of the message he had left for "Stelly and all on 'em" went the rounds of the room, gaining as it circled swiftly from group to group.

"Guy," said his mother, as he was passing her after supper, "can I have a word with you?" She lifted her fan between herself and the crowd to unruffle her hasty speech. "Your sisters and I are going home. The mortifications of this evening have been too much for my nerves. How could you suffer your wife to invite those odious parents of hers, and actually force them upon your friends? I never witnessed a more unseemly exhibition. Not even your position can withstand the injurious effects of such behavior. She actually asked General Monckton to take her mother in to supper! I thought I should faint when I saw him with that factory creature on his arm. I cannot answer for the consequences unless you have the firmness to lop off these very objectionable parasites."

"You cannot be more chagrined than I am," rejoined Guy. "Imperatively forbade Estelle to invite these people. She has deceived as well as disobeyed me. But it will not happen again. I flatter myself you will have no cause after to-night to complain of the continued intimacy between the Stuyvesant and the Wells families."

He moved forward to the side of a dashing belle, bending to her ear with a smiling compliment; and Mrs. Stuyvesant left her stand by the mantle, giving a chance of escape to Mrs. Wells, who had been cornered by the expansive person of the grande dame. Staying not upon the order of her going, she glided up to the dressing-room, hastily assumed her wrappings, and taking a last advantage of her familiarity with the ways of the house, bought and furnished with her husband's money, passed softly through the adjoining chamber to the nursery, where the babe lay asleep. It was a bitter moment, that in which Ellen Wells bowed over her daughter's child, feeling that she said "Farewell" to him and his mother together; a bitter tear she dashed away in time to hinder it from falling upon his cheek. To her justice, love was stronger just then than pride. The mother's soul was up in arms to protect her daughter from her husband's anger and the disdain of his supercilious kindred; yearning to take her and her nursing back to the home in which she had never received an unkind word; the home of which she was the life and pride; the home to which she was never to come again unless by stealth.

"My darling! my darling! If I had but kept her with me! I have made her wretched or life! Heaven forgive me!"

The stairs were full as she went down, but she looked at no one; went right on with a pale, proud face, very unlike the smiling visage she had worn all the evening; on past the white-cravatted, white-gloved youths lounging in the hall watching the departures; down the marble steps, remembering as she trod them that her husband had paid for them and the mansion to which they were the noble entrance; to her carriage; and so to her own house. The house in which she was the beloved and honored mistress; still the indulged idol of a loving husband—not an incumbance taken to his arms for the sake of her wealth; not a chattel of which he was half-ashamed, one to be schooled, and bullied, and deprived of all she best loved or most desired.

"My husband would not have allowed any one, not even his mother, to speak of me as that man spoke of my poor child. He would defend me to the last beat of his brave, loyal heart. God bless him!"

With the thankfulness, came a rush of salt, sweet tears; grief for the helpless, misused wife she had left in the tyrant's hands; gratitude for her own estate, so blessed in comparison.

When the last guest had gone, Guy stalked up and down the parlors in gloomy silence, while his wife directed the packing of the christening-gifts in a huge hamper. As this was borne up stairs by two servants, her husband pushed a chair toward her with his foot with such needless violence that it struck a mosaic-topped table, and both went over with a crash. The stand had been sent to Estelle from Italy by Arthur, and she sprang forward to pick it up. Guy kicked it across the room, and grasped her arm.

"You and I have an account to settle before you look after gimcracks. Sit down."

She looked him straight in the eyes, surprised, but undaunted.

"You have taken too much wine, Guy. We will postpone our talk until to-morrow, if you please."

He swore at her; an oath as loud and coarse as if it had fallen from a coal-heaver's lips.

"We'll have it out now, once and for all! How dared you ask your low-born, low-lived father and mother to my house, to insult my family and friends when I had ordered you not to do it?"

"Because I chose to offend you rather than wound them," Estelle said, distinctly. "You cannot force me to give up my parents. I will cling to them and love them while I live; love them in proportion to the contempt I feel for those whose pride of name and station would set husband against wife; make me as miserable as my girl-life was happy. This is your answer. Now, will you let me go?"

He had held her tightly all this time, glaring at her in dumb fury, and now maddened by wine and passion, shook her as he might an insolent street boy.

"None of that, young man!" came in strange, gurgling accents from the conservatory-door, and Peter Wells staggered forward.

His face was purple, his eyes livid, his whole appearance so unnatural that Estelle cried out at the sight.

"Papa, don't come in here! You can do no good!"

"I ain't sure of that," still chokingly in the voice she did not know. "I allers said I'd kill the man that ill-treated you, and I'll do it if he lays finger on you again."

"I'll kick you out of the house if you come a step nearer!" retorted Guy.

Estelle threw herself between them. "Papa, dearest, if you love me, go away! You cannot help me! I am married to him remember."

"That's the worst of it!" Peter sank upon a chair, and put his head between his hands. "My little Stelly! my pretty, cunning baby! Yes, she's married to him."

The crouching figure lurched forward, and came heavily to the floor. Estelle's screams brought the terrified servants in a body to the room. They turned him over, his face to the light. The dark-red flush still flooded his temples; his eyes were closed; his lips fluttered once, twice, thrice, to let out the life—then all was still.

"Everybody has expected this great while that he'd go off in a fit of apoplexy," said Mrs. Clark, paying a visit of condolence, a few days after the funeral. "But, of course, though 'twas to be and couldn't be helped, it must have been a shock to you, Ellie. But he's left you well off, and you did your duty by him while he was alive, and afflictions come to all. You'll go to live with Estelle now, I suppose?"

The mourner shook her head.

"You don't say! I supposed that would be just what you wanted, and Estelle, too!" turning to her niece, who, dressed in deep black, sat by her mother's bed.

"Arthur will be home next week, Aunt Fanny. Mamma has something to live for yet."

A year later, Aunt Fanny was impelled by another bit of family news to pay a visit of ceremony to her sister.

"It's true, is it, that Arthur's going to marry young Burt's sister?" I said how 'twould be when I heard they'd gone into business together, Burt and Arthur. How does Estelle take it? And what do the Stuyvesants say? Why, somebody told me one of those girls was setting her cap at him."

"My boy has chosen well," returned Mrs. Wells. "Annie Burt is a noble, lovely woman, well educated, and refined."

"But how about the old grocer?"

"True nobility does not consist in what men call blood and rank, Fanny."

Fanny hitched her chair nearer, and broke in eagerly:—

"If you say that, I needn't mind telling you how people talk about Estelle and her husband. They say he's making ducks and drakes of her money, and is unkind to her besides. Some have reported that he wouldn't let her come to see you, and the town cried out shame because not one of the Stuyvesants, except him, attended poor Peter's funeral, rich and respected as he was. So I contradicted that about Estelle's not visiting you, for I said I'd met her here often, but never him, and how dreadfully she looks, to be sure. I never saw anybody break equal to her since she was married. I should think it would worry you."

"We will not discuss public gossip, if you please, Fanny," said Mrs. Wells, with mild dignity, "especially when the subject is my daughter. She is a dear and dutiful child."

But when the busy-tongued meddler had gone, the mother cast herself down to weep with a low, long cry, as from a heart over-loaded to breaking. And this was what she said:—

"They that sow the wind shall reap the whirlwind."

VIOLET AND PANSY. A MODERN BALLAD.

BY ESPT.

I.

BESIDE a blue-eyed Violet sprung
A little purple flower,
That o'er her bent to shade from sun,
To shield her from the shower.
It looked down on its charge in pride,
She raised her eyes above;
Asked Violet to be his bride,
Was answered with her love.
And storm and sunshine came and went,
Fair Violet his bride,
While o'er her faithful still he bent,
And shielded her in pride.
And when at length a whirlwind came
To sunder their sweet lot,
She whispered: "I am still the same!"
And he: "Forget me not!"

II.

BESIDE a blue-eyed Maiden grew
A noble youth, and strong,
That o'er her watched in earnest true
To shield her from all wrong.
He looked down on his charge in pride,
She looked to him above;
He asked her then to be his bride,
She answered with her love.
Life's storm and sunshine came and went,
They met both side by side,
While o'er each heart the other bent,
Each shielding its own pride.
And when at last Death's whirlwind came
To sunder their sweet lot,
She murmured: "I am still the same!"
And he: "Forget me not!"

PEGGING AWAY.

ONE of the most useful bits of knowledge to which men and women can attain is the knowledge of their own powers, with the corollary of "pegging away" when they do know them. It is of no use to try and till the rocks, nor to dig for minerals in sea sand, nor to aim at clouds and expect to bring them down fluttering like wild birds; it is of no use persisting in trying things for which we have no real capacity, for the sole result of loss of time and disappointed hopes. Yet how many men we see who will go on trying again and again at that which every one else knows is certain failure. Their persistence may have a touch of the sublime in it, assuredly it has more than a touch of the tragic; but it is sublime only in accordance with the degree of nearness to which they reach success. When they are always far off, never in any way nearer success than they are to the clouds, then it is quite the reverse of sublime; unless that familiar image of cutting one's own throat by swimming against the stream is to be taken as an emblem of the moral grandeur lying in the persistency of seeking failure. But when the powers are equal to the task, and the failure hitherto has come from removable circumstances, then if you like, persist and "peg away," till you have dug down the obstructive heap, and have come to the glistening core of gold within. Nothing is so sure as a wise, strong-hearted, clear-headed constancy, whether in work or plan of life, whether in love for another or in reliance on oneself; and Bruce's spider—that much-enduring beast who bears, like a second Atlas, the weight of the world of "Try" on his back—may once again be pressed into the service of illustration, and be made the peg on which to hang this shred of our subject. Failure again and again, if one can see the cause, and the cause is remediable, ought never to dishearten. Say, you have it in you to do a certain thing, you may not hit the right method at first, neither at the first nor at the twentieth time of trying; but the twenty-first? If all these failures have been lessons wherein you have studied causes, and if you have got to know the great reason why, and understand it from end to end, then try again till you have succeeded, for you must ultimately succeed. The divine impulse must have its error; the spirit of the thing within you must eat its way out of the obstructive envelope that now keeps it back; and the chrysalis will one day emerge the winged and perfected butterfly—the deed fairly and finally accomplished. Was not the Kingdom of Heaven itself once obtained by much importunity? and, persisting in spiritual endeavor, however cold and dark the soul may be at times; however much the endeavor may seem a failure, is yet the surest way of coming into spiritual light at last.

Take again the question of slander. Well! if on the one hand you "peg away" at saying evil things of your neighbor, no matter whether they are true or false, you will get some of them believed by virtue of constant iteration, on the principle of throwing plenty of mud when some will stick; but people unfortunately do not want to be taught how to injure their fellow creatures. Some things come by nature, and slander is one of them. If, on the other hand—and this would be the right hand—you are slandered, what you have to do is to live it down, and make your "pegging away" a passive quality in place of an active one, which would alter only its syntax, not its sense. If you let yourself be beaten from your position; if you are timid, oppressed, and have no hold on your own self-respect; if you feel more pain than power, you are done for, and your enemies have got their feet on you, and you know nothing of the value of "pegging away;" nothing of the dignity of self-respect, and the vitality of that same process of living it down; and as we all are hardly handled by our friends at times, by our enemies always, so soon as we are out of hearing, as we all have vulnerable spots where we can be struck, and weak places in our armor where poisoned shafts can penetrate, the art of quietly standing one's ground, and picking out the shafts as they fall; the faculty of living down ill-natured attacks, and going right through the burning fire of evil reports, is a great one, with the blessed result of peace and a good name in the end, if, indeed, one's little flame of life does not get snuffed out before that end comes.

If constancy in endeavor is good in anything, it is good in work. Of all circumstances in which that unwearied uniformity of energy which our heading expresses is of value, work—the thing we have to do, the active object of our existence, and its end maybe—is that in which we should "keep pegging away" without fainting or flagging. All snatch work is sure to be bad; and things done only at intervals and laid aside for idleness, pleasure, or novelty, are never worth even the small amount of pains bestowed on them. This is more than half the reason why women's work is not as a rule equal to man's. It is fitful work, rarely done with the constancy of a man's work; work taken up on occasion, when the fit is on them, and they are not otherwise amused or employed; but it is not taken up and carried on against all incitements to change, all obstacles, all hindrances, as men are obliged to do with their work. Yet, until women learn this, men will carry the flag, and they will have only the cold comfort of marching behind. Here and there, of course, we find a woman who works with this visible persistency, but only here and there; and when we find her, we find her—granting the qualities necessary—successful, at least up to her degree. Her sister, with more original mental power and less heroism of work, is a failure; and nothing that she undertakes goes well, simply because she does nothing with continuity of energy, but all by fits and fragments, and so lets her ideas cool and her work become disjointed. For everything runs more smoothly the less its flow is broken; and everything is learnt more easily the warmer the brain is kept, and the closer the interest for the time being.

And yet, if women do not know the value of "pegging away" in work, they do in other things. Half their power as wives consists in the unweariedness with which they come back again and again to the same point, the persistency with which they traverse the same line, and will not be beaten off. Argument, anger, silence, disdain, nothing has any permanent effect on them; they have set their hearts on doing this or having that, and they "keep pegging away" till they get what they want. It is very well for them that they have this power. Not being able to take things with a high hand, or to carry the fortress of marital opposition by storm, where would they be if they could not compass by consistency what nature has denied to them by strength? This is not saying that they are to establish a sore place, and show their power of constancy by continual rubbing at it when made; but if they had not this tenacity of hold, this persistency of endeavor and unwearied recurrence to a charge, it would be a bad day for them when they fell into the hands of a man who would give nothing for affection and less for justice, but who could be brought to reasonable yielding for the sake of getting rid of importunity. Punch's famous Mrs. Naggleton was a good example of the art of "pegging away;" so was Mrs. Caudle. We cannot commend either lady to the imitation of our readers, but they illustrate in a very remarkable degree, if unamiably, the active force of persistent attacks. Many a man has been brought to ruin and the bankruptcy court by the constancy with which his wife has baited and worried him to do this, to go there, to give her that. She went on "pegging away," and at last got to the point at which she aimed—without counting the cost of her transit. But it was her will, and he had nothing for it but to yield, after a certain time of resistance. The constant dropping wore away even the flint of his opposition; and he came to submission and the financial end as the result. And just as many women have saved their husbands from ruin and despair by "pegging away" on the other side. They have got hold of a moluscous man say, a man without much No in him, or a man with disastrous proclivities of indulgence. So they made themselves strong in the way of buttresses against the weak parts, and went on "pegging away" against his follies and for the better thing, till they had got the upper hand, and forced him, however much against his will, to accept their wisdom as the counter-agent of his own folly. A less persistent woman would have gone into the depths with him, and nothing short of the importunate tenacity by which he has been pinned and bored would have influenced him. So of the three results—getting her own dues which else she would never have had, making her husband do what he should not to escape her importunity, and making him do what he should for the same reason—the art of "pegging away" is one not to be lightly held by wives, and, on the whole, does more good than ill. As, on the whole, the art does all through life; the instances in which one is tenacious in wrong doing being, let us hope, far more rare than those in which one holds on to the right and "pegs away" in a good cause.

DECORATION DAY GARLAND.

FOR THE GRAVE OF AN "UNKNOWN" SOLDIER.

BY CLARENCE F. BUHLER.

DEAD soldier! though upon thy stone
I read the single word "Unknown," Westminster Abbey's gorgeous gloom
Has never held a prouder tomb.

For, like a green triumphal arch,
This emerald hillock crowned thy march,
And thou hast disappeared beneath
To win an amaranthine wreath.

Thine humble sepulchre is where
No gaudy banners paint the air;
But Evening, with a dewy tear,
Will trail her shadowy pennons here.

And over this sequestered nook
The sky will wear a bluer look,
Long as Humanity will thrill
With Calvary and Bunker's Hill.

"Unknown?" Alas, what eager feet
Have hastened thy return to greet,
Whenever in the porch were heard
The lilies that the wind had stirred.

Half-mast, for him whose march is o'er,
The flag he never lowered before!
Such men are forming, as they die,
Legions of Honor in the sky.

And as I tune the solemn chord,
Triumphant undertones are poured,
As 'neath a murmuring pine we hear
The roaring of a cataract near.

In every land by battle cursed
The laws of Nature are reversed,
And palsied Age unto the tomb
Bears Manhood in its ruddy bloom.
But, still, however black the skies
'Neath which a murdered patriot dies,
A sunshine on his funeral sod
Falls like the golden smile of God.

It is worthy of observation, that the most imperious masters over their own servants are, at the same time, the most abject slaves to the servants of other masters.—Seneca.

AT REST AT LAST.

BY KAY ESS.

HE said we were third cousins, for Peter Roome, my great-uncle, was his grandfather, and kept the keys of the old jail in New York city, years and years ago.

"We must be third cousins, for there could not have been two Peter Roome's, who carried the keys of that same old jail, so that is settled, and now you must call me Cousin Will."

His name was William Lawrance Warrener. But, like most girls at sixteen, I was possessed with a spirit of perversity, and saucily assured him that "I would do no such thing, but should call him 'Lawrance,' as did my Uncle Charles' family; or, if he liked it better, 'Mr. Warrener.'"

I was a country girl, and was really more verdant, perhaps, than I would like now to acknowledge. Be that as it may, I was pretty, I know. I can say it now that my youth is all gone, and there are so few to remember whether it was so or not.

My complexion was as fresh as the rose upon whose delicate cheek the ardent rays of the morning sun has just kissed the first blush; and my teeth were even and white, and the envy of more than one rich city girl, who had spent the greater part of her days crunching taffy. My eyes, I don't know what they were then; he called them "wicked;" now they are gray and sad, and tears have washed away the wicked light that dazzled more once than you would now believe. My hair was darker some than flaxen, but it was pretty; and I did not lack in animation, or that ever-varying expression that lends to some faces a charm more potent, I believe, than that of intellect. But I was poor as poor could be. Lawrance knew that, too, though how he found it out, I do not know; for I was told to keep silent as to my father's circumstances, and my aunt talked grandly of her brother-in-law's—she was my mother's sister—broad acres, and the spacious mansion that commanded such a prospect as painters might enjoy, though what it consisted of was a query in my mind then, for there was only the stone wall in front, and the little shed of slabs at the back that protected our two cows from the cold and wet. But I have learned to think differently of things now, and suppose it might have been a tolerable good prospect for a painter if some immortalized hero had been born there, but as it was only poor I, it will never be reproduced in oil to hang in some rich man's parlor, nor be pressed between the lids of richly-bound albums. No matter; it is indelibly stamped upon the tablets of my memory, and is, therefore, worth more to me than that single picture of Humboldt is to its owner, for let me go where I will, that picture is still mine to gaze upon as long and often as I choose.

Charles Haven had married my mother's sister Hetty, when my grandparents were thought to be well off in this world's goods, but that was no object with him, I think, for Hetty was sparkling, I have heard mother say, and determined to shine as chief ornament of some handsomely decorated parlor on Avenue Fifth; or, perhaps, glitter in the halls of the Old World.

She did both, for fortune seemed to take delight in lavishing her gifts upon Uncle Charles, and gold increased tenfold by the merest touch of his business fingers. He was a broker on Wall Street the summer I was there. He has since retired from business, and William Lawrance Warrener was head clerk, and had been in my uncle's employ since he was a boy thirteen, and did errands for barely enough to keep his clothes whole at the knees and elbows.

How Aunt Hetty came to send for me, I hardly know, for she had not seen me since I was a little girl, with freckled face and brown, bare feet. A heated wave rushes over me now, though I sit here alone, at the remembrance of the deep mortification I felt when, with her jewelled fingers, she put back my tangled hair to scrutinize my features. I heard her say something about "teeth" and "eyes" as I shrank awkwardly out of the room, and dashed wildly around the house, down the little path to the brook, where I spent the remainder of the day watching frogs and harmless water-snakes dive in and out the sparkling wave.

When I came back, Aunt Hetty was gone, and my mother was crying, though why I could not tell, for the table was piled with bright things, dresses, aprons, and pretty new shoes for me, and father a whole new suit. Putting my arms around mother's neck, I cried too, for I could not help it; then I kissed her softly, and stroked her black hair until I saw her smile and feeling happy again. I dressed myself in my new clothes as carefully as some village belle would have done, perhaps, and danced and admired myself until I was sent to bed; yet I remember that father considerably let me sit up that night two hours later than he had ever done before. I was the only child, and mother was ~~not~~ very well; but I found time to go to school, and father taught me some; and so at the age of sixteen, I had a fair education, though none of the accomplishments that appear so indispensable to ladies of society.

Well, Aunt Hetty sent for me, and mother let me go, yet reluctantly enough, I think; but father thought it best, and I was almost wild at the very idea of New York life. Still, I had not quite forgotten the old impression that Aunt Hetty's grand appearance had made upon me so many years before.

I went, and a queer time I had of it, too. In the presence of company I was treated as one of the family; when we were alone, only as a sort of upper servant. It was a muddle in my own mind how I stood, and afterward led me to do a thing that I would not otherwise have been guilty of.

It was early day when I reached there, cleaning house time; and every woman, rich or poor, young or old, knows something of the meaning of that phrase. The great heavy, golden-colored satin curtains were taken down, and replaced by web-like lace that swept over the windows like fleecy clouds on a misty morning. The carpets, chairs, and sofas covered with shining linen, and all the beautiful gilt frames, and elegant chandeliers, with their bronze carvings, were hidden away under a green covering; marble mantles brushed and scrubbed; silver fenders, door knobs, and hinges to be polished; and a thousand other things to be done, that sent the servants running hither and thither, up stairs and down, and everywhere.

I had climbed hills and scrambled over rocks from dawn till set of sun, but I was not accustomed to climbing so many stairs; and my evenings were spent at theatres, concerts, and saloons, until I was tired to death, and longed to get back under the cool shades of the apple-trees and blossoming honeysuckles.

When the heated term commenced, Aunt Hetty thought I would not care to go into the country with them; it would be more of a novelty for me to stay and stand as sort of a guard over the servants; and then it was so expensive boarding at those fashionable hotels. I was quite willing to remain in the city, and so it was arranged.

And away went the family, trunks, baskets, and shawls, one morning, for Long Branch, and I breathed a sigh of relief, and vowed inwardly that the beggars who plead at that door should fare better than they ever had done before.

Uncle Charles' head clerk was sent up to stay in the house nights in case of robbers, or fire, or anything of that sort. He was twenty-five then, tall, with dark curling hair, and deep blue eyes. I did not fancy him much, he was so grave.

I remember how it was that we came to talk at all. For some reason, the hall lamp had not been lighted one evening, and I paused, midway on the stairs, to notice the queer shadows upon the wall. The moon shone brilliantly through the hall windows, throwing the shadow of all that open carving, or whatever name architects have for it, upon the frescoed wall. I was thinking of Belshazzar, and trying to imagine the horror he must have felt when he saw the fingers of a man's hand writing upon his palace wall, when lo! the shadow of a man's hand and arm appeared perfectly plain, coming slowly towards me. I screamed, and almost saw the words, "Mene, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin," and shrank cowering upon the stairs, expecting the supernatural hand to seize me in its icy fingers. The hall door opened, and in walked Lawrance Warrenner, the first that I knew he carried a night key, and it was his hand applying the night key that caused the frightful shadow.

For the first time I was glad to see him, and said: "O Mr. Warrenner, is it you? You frightened me almost out of my senses."

Then we passed into the parlor, and had a good laugh over my foolish fright. After I had answered all the commonplaces he could think of asking, I suppose, he proposed a game of dominoes, hoping by that, I believe, to keep me there an hour or so as a sort of plaything; for the evenings must have been lonely enough, as I always passed mine in my room after auntie went away.

Well, I played the dominoes; and, although the game had always been a tedious one to me, it passed pleasantly enough that night, for it was interspersed with conversation clothed in language more like that I had read in books than I had ever listened to before. I had not been in the city long, you must remember, and had been only to public places of amusement, the time for parties and such things being over, and had heard none of the fine nothings that, to a novice, appear so genuine. But I believe that he was really a sprinkle of the salt of the earth; and in all these years that have passed I could never once look back at a word that was not in every light a truthful one.

The next morning being Sunday, he was not obliged to go down town to business, and so remained to chat with me an hour or so before going to his mother's to accompany her to church.

We were walking in my uncle's gallery of pictures, and I had paused before one of an old stone ruin, with iron-barred windows, and said, half-musingly: "I wonder if that is not the old jail that Uncle Peter Roome used to lock and unlock so many times."

"Peter Roome was my grandfather," said Lawrance, and so it was that we came to trace our relationship, and he said I must call him "Cousin Will."

He was more than kind to me after that. Still, he treated me as one would treat a child; and once advised me to go to school, offering to pay my tuition.

I had a thirst for knowledge in those days; and, perhaps, he divined my thoughts when I compared my unaccomplished self with the elegant ladies whom I met sometimes; but I would not accept anything of the kind at his hands, and I could not help feeling piqued that he should treat me so. I did not love him then; but I do, now, with a love that has its basis in respect, and had a firmer hold upon my heart than any other feeling ever did, except the love I have for my darling boy.

Well, the evenings came and went, and I looked forward to each one with a degree of pleasure; for Lawrance lost much of the gravity that at first awed me, and once even ran after me through the long parlors down the steps into the garden, as I went flying before him, with the challenge to "catch me if he could."

O Cousin Will!—I can call you so, now, though I wouldn't then—the remembrance of you is all that keeps me from losing my faith in all mankind.

Those six weeks of seven evenings each that I passed in my Aunt Hetty's Fifth Avenue parlor time has proved was the one oasis of my life, the only time that I find pleasure in remembering. All that has happened since is so fearfully real, that I shudder to recall it; and, but for the cradle by whose side I nightly kneel, and plead for God's watchful care, I might, in some one of the moments of despair that are so frequent now, rush prayerless and unsummoned into the vast domain of eternity, where no cry for forgiveness would ever avail me aught.

You did not love me, Cousin Will, and I thank heaven that you did not. You were too good for me, a thousand times, and there was that in my heart, even then, that needed the chastening hand of the Almighty to purify and quiet it into calmness and submission.

Uncle Charles' family had been home but a week, when I was summoned to the bedside of my mother. Her disease had been aggravated, I think now, by the letters I had written home, and her increased illness required the most tender care.

She was overjoyed to see me, and expressed her pleasure at my improved appearance and manner I had unconsciously acquired. But she grew rapidly worse, and died in my arms,

"When the October leaves turned golden,
And blood spots dyed them red."

She was gone, and I could not call her back; but it was a sweet comfort to linger in the room where she died, and recall each look and word that she had ever given me. But her death made father an altered man. He grew old and bent, and almost shunned the house. He spent all the time that he could in the open air, until the fierce chill of the early winter drove him in. A settled melancholy had fallen upon him, and I grew almost afraid that his mind would become deranged, when we received a letter from his brother Martin, in New Jersey, inviting him to spend the winter there.

I insisted upon his accepting the invitation, for I felt that it was the only thing that would save him. If he stayed on the old place, he would soon follow my mother. I feared he would, any way, but I must do something to save him. I went with him to Uncle Martin's, and from there to Aunt Hetty's, leaving father in good hands, and the old house locked and desolate.

My aunt insisted upon my laying aside my deep mourning, and mixing in the gay scenes of her parlor, which, I am ashamed to say, that I did; and, before spring, I had fascinated more than one poor goose who believed, I suppose, that I had thousands at my command. I was taken to Newport the next summer, for I was very handy about the children, millinery goods, and many other things; and there I flirted, danced, and smiled, until I was about as heartless as one could be.

I had not seen Lawrance Warrener this time, for he was not of the invited number at my aunt's house, and lately he had commenced business for himself in one of the Western towns. Time did not stop for me here—I wish it had—but it went on, and so did I, until I became so wearied with the life that I was leading, always trying to please, and always striving in vain, that, at last, I would have married any one, I believe, as a means of escape. There was one came to me in the winter, whom I had met occasionally the summer before, and he offered me his hand in marriage.

Philip Tirace was, in every sense, a man of the world—handsome, dark, bewildering eyes and a stylish address. I admired the man very much; but I knew that I did not love him with the fervent trust one should have in a husband, yet my heart gave a throb of gratitude when he whispered in honeyed words of his love, and I believed I would be happier, so I married him, for I longed so much for rest. My aunt approved of the match. Uncle Charles was away at the time; he said afterward that he would have told me better.

Aunt Hetty gave me a wedding, and then, I suppose, considered her duty well discharged towards her sister's child. We went to Washington to travel, afterwards to St. Louis, and so on from city to city, and it was not until I had been married three years that I knew my husband was a professional gambler.

But I did not upbraid him; for he had been kind to me, and I knew that my grief was a just punishment for the sin I had committed in going before God's altar with a lie upon my soul. Two more years of hopes and fears had floated down the dim aisles of the past, and intoxication began to tell upon him.

His manner towards me changed to harshness, and from that to cruelty. And twice he had accused me of practising a deep deception upon him, though I had told him before that it was no fault of mine that rumor reported me rich. Still, I clung to him as only a wife can cling, and the more tenderly now that a startling truth was forcing itself upon me. His luck at the gaming table seemed to have deserted him, and taken with it all his love for me.

We were boarding, then, at a third-rate house, and he had left me for three weeks with only my doubts and fears for companions, for he knew I would not mingle with the boarders. When he did come, he greeted me with an oath, and there was such an evil look in his dark, bewildering eyes that I feared he would kill me.

That night I fled. It was the only thing left me. My father's house in the Northland should be my home, where he could never find me. I sold a diamond brooch that I had left, and came back to this house. I found it little changed, for the old house had careful neighbors. After I had been here long enough to get things managed, so I could once more feel at home, I sent for father.

The dear old man was overjoyed to get back to the house that we might better have never left. I never told him Philip Tirace was yet living, though we often spent whole evenings talking of the scenes I had left. After a time my little baby was born, and with him, I think, I had my share of comfort.

We three lived happily together for a few months; father growing young in the light of my baby's smile. But again death came—silently and unexpectedly this time—and in the darkness of night took father home. I found him one morning with a serene light upon his countenance; but his spirit had fled, crossed the stream from whence there is no boat of return, and again I was left to mourn.

But, oh! there came a time of deeper mourning still. My baby began to droop; and day after day, as I sat by his little crib, or held him to my heart, the conviction forced itself upon me that he, too, was going from me. Oh, surely that was more than I deserved! How could I bear it? And with it all a nameless terror came and fastened itself like a vampire upon me. What if Philip Tirace should think of the past enough to know that he must be father of a child, and seek me out, where should I hide? What would become of me? I could trace his likeness in every form I saw coming. And every step upon the stones, and every rattle of the casement I imagined were occasioned by him. Would he take my baby from me?

Oh, those nights of agony that I sat and watched my darling boy! I tell it all in as few words as possible. I cannot bear to dwell upon this latter clause of my life's history. I cannot bear to write it, but I must go on thinking of it year after year without one ray to illumine this inky blackness of despair. Oh, mother, come back to me! My baby is dead, and I am all alone in the world—fatherless, motherless, and childless!

The eleventh day of last month my baby had been buried a year. All day I sat looking out of my window towards those three graves—my mother, my father, and my child. It rained dreadfully all day, and the wind blew the dead branches against the house, and I was so lonely that I grew almost frightened at the chill that crept over me. As night fell, the rain ceased, and the moon shed her beams lovingly on my leaf-covered mounds; so I walked over there, led by a spirit I cannot describe; and, kneeling between the graves of father and mother, with my head bowed until my face rested upon my baby's grave, I prayed—oh, how fervently!—for grace and strength to endure to the end, and again and again for forgiveness of my past sins.

How long I prayed thus, I cannot tell. I took no note of time; but surely and truly I heard my father's blessing, and saw my mother's wondrous smile, and felt my baby's little arms about my neck, and his dear form against my heart. My own heart ceased its beating then, and my soul almost went home, for I knew that I had a glimpse of heaven; and the light that I saw there shed itself over and around me, and something surged through my soul as only a breeze from its Edenized shores could have done. Through all I heard, or thought I heard, the soft rustling of wings; and with its departure faded the forms that were bending near me, and I heard a voice calling, "Lorinda, Lorinda!" and, for the first time in my life, I fainted.

When I awoke to consciousness, the scene in the graveyard swept dimly before me, and, for a moment, I thought I must be in heaven. But again that voice, "Lorinda!" and this time it was followed by the pressure of a bearded lip upon my own, and I was folded fondly to a great, broad, heaving chest.

I closed my eyes again, and for a moment was at rest; for I knew it was Cousin Will who held me, and I was in my own little room. Then came the thought of Philip Tirace, and I moaned, rather than spoke, my husband's name.

"He went to his reckoning, Lorinda, more than a year ago. I had been a little way West, and coming back there was a railroad accident. The cars ran off the track, owing to the carelessness of one of the brakemen, and three men were injured, but only one dangerously. I carried him to the nearest house; and, when the physician who had been sent for told him he must die, he made a confession of his cruelty to his wife, and fairly shrieked, as he died: 'I loved you through it all, Lorinda, but my sin led me on, and I could not help it.' The only thing I found upon him of any value was this likeness, which proved to be of my little cousin, and I have carried it with me ever since."

"But why did you not come sooner, Cousin Will, to tell me that he was gone?"

"I did not know where you were. Mr. Haven and family were in Europe; but, at last, one day, I thought of your old home, and I might have written at once, but I would not trust to the uncertainty of a letter, preferring rather to wait a few more weeks until my busi-less allowed me a little leisure. I wanted to see you myself, Lorinda, to know if you had a thought for the past."

"But, Cousin Will, have you never married in all these years?"

"Yes, darling. I married a good woman four years ago; but eighteen months after she litted away to heaven, and left me a wee baby girl as my only comfort. Lorinda, will you be o her a mother? I loved you in the past, and I love you now, with a love that is honest and true; and, if you will be my wife, I will strive to be to you all that you would desire in a husband."

I had no words for a reply, but tears of happiness gathered in my eyes; and, as he held me in his arms, pillowing my head against his heart, as if I had been a weary child, I felt that heaven had, indeed, been opened to me that night, for had I not been clean through the troubled waters, and, at last, reached home?

And, oh, the blissful rest that I found! All night, or what remained of the night, for it must have been near morning then, he held me in his arms, and would not let me go; but it was my refuge now, and I was happy too.

He gave me but one month for preparations for my marriage. A dressmaker was sent on from the city, and with the assistance of my own hands—for I would be allowed that pleasure—I am all ready. This morning she went back o New York, and I have been gathering all my little valuables, mementoes, etc., that I wish to preserve, and amongst the rubbish that I had heaped for the flames, I found this old crawl, written as an escape-valve to my despair, and I plucked it as a brand from the burning to add what I have. If at any time in my happiness and prosperity I seem to forget, I hope some one will point to this page, for I know that memory will stand faithful forever.

Against the wall opposite, set two large trunks, locked, strapped, and marked "Mrs. Warren." Upon one of them my eyes rest lovingly, for it contains, besides a part of my wedding paraphernalia, some letters that I prize, and the pictures of my three lost ones. Oh, would that they could know how happy I am to-night!

Who would have believed in those dark, fearful days that there was happiness in store for me? But God is good; and O, Will, once my cousin, and to-morrow my husband, how my heart goes out in hopeful trust towards you! There is no trembling foreboding that all will not be well; I know it will. I feel God's blessing upon me now, and with His help I will be a good wife to you, and a mother to your child.

As the mind must govern the hands, so in every society the man of intelligence must direct the man of labor.—Johnson.

ALLAN HOLME'S HOUSE-KEEPER.

BY PETIT LICHEN.

CHAPTER I.

It was a charming place. And so thought its owner, Allan Holme, as, slowly pacing the tessellated floor of the portico at the rear of the fine old mansion, he surveyed, with well-satisfied eyes, his immediate surroundings, and allowed these same eyes to roam, in the same satisfied way, over the autumn-tinted woods and sombre fields that stretched far, far away, and lay bathed in the sweet, peaceful sunshine of a glorious October morning.

The pleasant musing, which might have been indefinitely prolonged, was brought to a rude close by a peal from the hall bell. While the serving boy, Dick, in the absence of reproving voice, somersaulted himself to the door, Allan Holme dropped into a new and less agreeable train of thought. Pausing before the steps leading down to what Nature and art had combined to make a wilderness of beauty, he removed from between his lips the fragment left of a Havana which he had been slowly converting into graceful, fragrant wreaths of smoke. Lightly knocking off the adhering ashes, he stood abstractedly contemplating the smoldering spark, till roused by the voice of Dick at his elbow. The next instant the little spark lay winking out its life on the graveled walk.

"A lady, sah," said that gum-elastic ebony, presenting a mourning card, on which was inscribed, "Mrs. C. L. Berne." "I showed her to the lib'ry, sah."

And with a duck of his woolly pate, that threatened to terminate in a somersault, Dick vanished, only to resume his favorite mode of locomotion, and to indemnify himself, as far as possible, for the momentary restraint imposed on his gymnastic propensities by the vigilant eye of his master.

"Another dowdy widow, with dollars and cents stamped on every lineament, and determined on taking the control of affairs here at Woodlawn whether I will or not," discontentedly thought Allan Holme, seeking the indicated apartment, with a vivid, and by no means agreeable recollection of numerous discussions which had recently taken place there. "I am almost tempted to allow cook and chambermaid to lord it over me at their pleasure, and to give up this search for a model woman in the shape of a housekeeper."

These reflections might have proved destructive of the hopes of any woman less high-bred and noble looking than the one with whom he was speedily exchanging salutations. As it was, "Mrs. C. L. Berne" secured the position of housekeeper at Woodlawn ere she had responded to the courtly greeting of its elegant and handsome master.

Standing there, her stately form clad in deepest mourning, her face was a lovely type of that loveliest of all the lovely things to be seen on earth—a regenerate old age. Intuitively conscious of the purity of her inner life, Allan Holme bent with an emotion of reverence before his strange visitor, coveting her presence at his fireside with something of the longing with which he ever recalled the soft touch of his mother's hand, and the tender cadence of that earth-still voice.

The sacred wrinkles of fifty odd years seamed, without marring, the cheek and brow which, in years long gone, had been beautiful with youth's flush and smooth fairness; and to Allan Holme's poetic mind, the lustrous white of the hair, plainly banded on either side of the placid forehead, was only the gleam of the pure light radiating through Heaven's wide open door. So near he deemed her to that blessed abode. He was not a man to disregard credentials of this character. So that, when in the course of conversation Mrs. Berne mentioned General Cliff, of ———, as being their mutual friend, the name was only received as pleasantly confirmatory of his own preconceived opinions.

With gentle, courteous eagerness he urged her speedy installment in her new office. But there was a hesitancy of manner about the lady betokening some difficulty as yet undisposed of. After a minute's deliberation she said:—

"I have a proposal to make, Mr. Holme, which may prove sufficiently disagreeable to change all your wishes. I have a grandchild from whom I cannot consent to be separated. Quite orphaned, Jessie is not only my sacred charge, but the bright blessing of my lonely life; besides, being much too young to be intrusted to the care of others. Although happily domesticated in General Cliff's family at present, and urgently desired by them to remain there permanently, we yet feel that the idea of separation is not to be entertained for a moment. With this statement before you, I beg that you will reconsider the subject perhaps too hastily decided."

In some annoyance Allan Holme silently revolved the question in its new, and truly unwelcome phase, Mrs. Berne's heart keeping anxious time to his busy thoughts. A bachelor, on the shady side of thirty, unaccustomed to the presence of children, and constantly occupied with pen and books, the prospect of a noisy, mischievous child forever disturbing the quiet of the house was, indeed, a rather alarming consideration. Eminently frank in his nature, he presently looked up, saying:—

"I will not disguise from you, my dear madam, that, could I have disposed this matter to suit my own tastes, we would have no pattering feet about the house—my education being sadly defective in the direction of children—but, assured that you will kindly preserve me from the little Jessie's pranks during my study hours, I beg that you will make me a better and happier man by taking charge of me and my house as soon as you can conveniently do so."

Tears sprang to Mrs. Berne's eyes at the respectful, almost filial earnestness marking his concluding words.

"You are very kind," she replied, "and I can safely promise that you will never be disturbed by Jessie. She is"—

"My dear madam, pardon the interruption, but I cannot permit you to say another word on this point. I am more than satisfied."

The little amused smile curving Mrs. Berne's lips was lost in her bow of acquiescence.

A few more trifling arrangements, and they parted, with the understanding that she would assume her new duties the early part of the ensuing week. An arrangement duly carried into effect at the appointed time, and, to the secret satisfaction of Allan Holme, without the presence of the much-dreaded Jessie; the Cliffs, Mrs. Berne explained, insisting on retaining her for another fortnight.

Notwithstanding Allan Holme's secret jubilee over the prospect of a fortnight's respite, he had a kind and generous heart; and, eagerly desirous to testify that his aversion was children in general, and not Jessie in particular, he made it convenient, a day or two before her arrival, to visit an adjacent city for the purpose of procuring some pretty toy with which to surprise the little maid intruding so frequently on his thoughts.

Shops were ransacked—shop girls, first eager, then anxious, then despairing, were finally left to replace their rejected wares in a huff, tartly and truly remarking that "the gentleman didn't know what he wanted!" Almost in despair himself, the would-be purchaser stood in the last one gazing helplessly about him, and fruitlessly regretting not having gained from Mrs. Berne a judicious hint by which to pilot his bachelor judgment through the unexpected shoals and quicksands of a toy shop. At length his eye rested thoughtfully on a beautifully-finished rocking-horse with side-saddle and other equipments.

"The very thing! I might have thought of it long ago!" he exclaimed, and forthwith it was ordered to be delivered at Woodlawn at the earliest moment possible.

The next morning Mrs. Berne, busily occupied in the dining-room with some housewifely duty, was somewhat startled by an invasive movement on the part of Allan Holme.

"Mrs. Berne, will you kindly spare me a minute of your time?"

"Certainly," she rejoined, with gentle cordiality, advancing towards the hall door, which he held open for her.

"I have a gift here, dear madam, for your little girl," pointing to the rocking-horse deposited in the hall a few minutes before by the carrier from —, "and I desire your advice about placing it in readiness for her. Shall it remain here, or to be taken to the front portico to serve as a pleasant greeting? I believe you expect her to-morrow?"

Laughter bubbled up to Mrs. Berne's eyes, and rippled softly from her lips as she responded affirmatively to the latter inquiry, adding immediately, with sudden and earnest gravity:—

"I appreciate from my heart your generous kindness, Mr. Holme, and so will my Jessie, for she is a most appreciative little thing." And a tear softened the still beautiful eyes of Mrs. Berne, as she uttered this naive commendation of her darling. Directly she said, by way of advice: "I would suggest placing the horse within this closet under the stairs, and Jessie can have the fun of discovering it for herself," completing the sentence with another irrepressible laugh.

Allan Holme was happy. Entering his sanctum shortly after, he said to himself, with a radiantly self-satisfied smile:—

"How pleased the dear old lady is! I am heartily glad I thought of it."

Jessie was coming! Gloriously rose the next day's sun at Woodlawn, happily beat the heart of Mrs. Berne, and smoothly moved the domestic machinery. Indeed, since Mrs. Berne's advent, serenity and comfort were the household blessings, reigning supreme where, late, disorder and its crew had ruled triumphant. And Allan Holme, without a questioning thought as to the means by which this agreeable result had been obtained, gratefully luxuriated in the new and welcome atmosphere. Dinners were not only cooked, but well cooked, and neatly as well as handsomely served, while slamming doors, rude, harsh voices, and heavy, blundering feet were but among the things stored in the memory of the once servant-persecuted master of Woodlawn. Even somersaulting Dick acknowledged the firm, yet gentle sway of the new mistress, and was more frequently to be seen with head and heels in the respective positions wisely ordained by the laws of Nature.

All the afternoon of this day, breaking so gloriously, Allan Holme had been superintending the removal of plants from hot-house to conservatory. When he, at length, left the former, it was nearing sunset. In his wake followed the ever-active Dick, who, under shield of his master's back, was indulging in various pantomimic antics. Suddenly Dick was motionless—eyes and mouth agape. Then, with another forward movement, he jerked out:—

"Thar's a ge'man, sah!"

His master's glance was directed in every quarter but the right one.

"Where?" facing Dick, as he spoke.

"Thar, sah, a-dodgin' about the shrub'ry."

As his eye followed the indicating finger, a pleasant voice called out:—

"Halloo, Holme!"

"Cliff! My dear fellow, I am a thousand times glad to see you. But where in the world do you hail from? Or, rather, how is it that you spring up so mysteriously from the midst of my shrubbery?" responded Allan Holme, advancing, and cordially shaking hands with his handsome young guest.

"I hail from my own home, of course. I happen to be among your shrubbery because Mrs. Berne informed me that you could be found somewhere about here. But more interesting than all this is the fact that I am happy to announce myself the happy escort of two—two fairies, who desired to bless Woodlawn with their presence."

"I am doubly, nay, trebly, your debtor, Cliff."

At this instant, a sudden and most disastrous crushing of some late and choice chrysanthemums surprised their ideas into a new channel. Dick, as usual on the alert to see and hear, and scrupulously regardful of opportunities of practicing his great accomplishment, availed himself of the propitious moment of his master's engaged attention, to testify his delight at so unlooked for an advent. Unhappily for him, his lithe body for once escaped his control, and a most inglorious tumble ended the assay, and immediately riveted his master's eye upon him.

"You young scoundrel, what are you about there?" was the vexed interrogatory.

Dick was startled up-right. A musical peal of laughter broke the silence that followed the stern demand, and while Allan Holme's eyes wandered from window to window, in the vain endeavor to obtain a glimpse of the supposed pretty laughter, the crestfallen Dick beat a hasty retreat.

"That strain of sweet music fell from the lips of one of your fairies, I imagine, Cliff. Who are they, pray?"

"One is our little Lady Berne, the other—I will leave you to guess."

"I'll do better than that, Cliff; put myself in presentable trim, and settle the question satisfactorily. But would you not like the use of a dressing-room yourself, my dear fellow?" he added, as they entered the hall.

"Thank you, I believe I will accept the offer, and part with a little of the superfluous dust," brushing his coat sleeve as he spoke.

Having seen his friend provided with all the toilet requisites, Allan Holme retired to his own chamber, from which he shortly issued in linen immaculate, and broadcloth unexceptionable. As he passed into the hall, his steps were arrested by the sight of a tiny form, the very embodiment of a beautiful dream, seated in the great western window, through which the setting sun was pouring a flood of gorgeous light, turning to amber-like beauty the soft flaxen curls knotted away with a band of blue ribbon from a face of exquisite delicacy and fairness. Seventeen summers must have smiled on this maiden, yet the lovely innocence of early childhood still glorified the face on which nature had so generously lavished her charms. The little white hands lay quietly folded in her lap, while a pair of blue eyes, large and liquid, were fixed dreamily on the fine prospect before her. Repose approaching beatific peace, marked every lineament and every curve of the graceful figure, and Allan Holme stood in almost breathless silence, lest this unexpected vision of loveliness should fade at the first rude sound.

Both were startled by the silvery ring of the tea bell. Fully recalled to himself, he turned hastily away, his footfall wooing the blue eyes from the engrossing landscape, to rest for a moment on his retreating form.

"John Cliff's fairy, I suppose, of whom he was so very chary of giving information," he said to himself, tapping at that young gentleman's door, with a new and uncommonly curious thrill at his heart.

While he waited before the vacant chamber, the "fairy" went gliding down the great staircase, the very loveliest, purest thing that had blessed the old mansion for many and many a year; went gliding into the drawing-room to meet, with her sweet, unconscious gaze, John Cliff's ardent, welcoming eyes, Allan Holme reaching the same spot just in time to note the eager devotion with which she was seated, and to read unerringly what the innocent blue eyes had never once seen, nor the innocent mind once conceived.

There was no time, however, to philosophize on the enslaved condition of the gallant old general's son, for one of the general's prettiest daughters stood smilingly awaiting a greeting from her host.

"Miss Cairra, I am, indeed, happy to welcome you to Woodlawn; happy to find in you 'the other' of whom John so churlishly refused more definite information."

Graciously acknowledging his courteous salutation, she laughed:—

"John was just telling me he had left you in a lamentably unenlightened state."

The next instant he was bowing low before the western window fairy.

"Jessie Berne!" he silently ejaculated, as he recollected the purchase safely stowed in the hall closet. "Jessie Berne!" he repeated, mechanically, offering his arm to the pretty Cairra, at a peremptory second summons from the tea-bell. "Jessie Berne!" he again and again repeated, as, chatting gayly, they led the way to the tea-room, and seated themselves around Mrs. Berne's faultlessly prepared board. And "Jessie Berne!" was the amazed refrain filling his ears as he dispensed the hospitalities of his table, his heart throbbing a full, glad measure at the recollection that Woodlawn would henceforth be her abiding place.

One quick glance of mirthful intelligence had been exchanged between himself and Mrs. Berne as the little party entered the tea-room, and thus they disposed of his laughable error.

The fair object of all this undercurrent of thought, split her roll, buttered, and ate it, equally unconscious of her host's profound astonishment, and profounder admiration. Wholly self-forgetful, ease and grace marked every word and movement; the ease, grace, simplicity, and sweetness of a little child, devoid, withal, of the slightest childishness. But this exceeding sweetness was finely balanced by a latent force of character only requiring developing circumstances to quicken into active life. When they should come, the child-like Jessie would be prompt to conceive, prompt to execute, and unflinchingly brave and enduring.

As Allan Holme and his guests passed from the tea-room, Jessie lingered a moment beside Mrs. Berne.

"Dear old grandma, I'm so, so, so glad to be with you again!" she cooed, in an eager, loving way, as if the exuberance of her delight must find an outlet before she could descend to the matter-of-fact offer of her services. And she looked greatly disposed to dance forth a portion, as she continued: "Now tell me what I can do to help you, grandma."

"Nothing at all, dearie," smiled Mrs. Berne, her placid face aglow with pure happiness. "I have but a few trifling directions to give, and then I will join you. So away with you at once."

With a mock obeisance, and a musical laugh that reached Allan Holme's ear across the hall, confusing his mind a little to some gay speech of the pretty Cairra's, she obeyed, and entered the drawing-room just as John Cliff was saying:—

"I did not order the hack to call for us to-morrow morning, Holme, thinking that you would kindly drive us over to the station."

"That was right, but you must allow me to choose my own time. I cannot consent to your leaving Woodlawn to-morrow."

"I only wish we could stay," sighed Cairra, "but it is quite impossible."

And Cairra's sigh spoke from John's eyes as he drew forward a chair for Jessie.

"Miss Berne," promptly entreated their host, "will you not add your persuasions to induce these good friends of ours to prolong their visit?"

"Indeed, Mr. Holme, I wish we might reasonably indulge the slightest hope of prevailing on them to do so, but I know that they will go."

"Must go, Jessie," softly corrected John.

"We will say 'must,' then, just in polite consideration of your stringent regard for terms," laughed Jessie, mischievously.

"Well, Miss Berne, I see that we are to be contented with a promise for the future."

And so it eventuated. By ten o'clock the next morning, the train that bore them away was sluggishly moving from the depot, while Allan Holme and Jessie, returning to the carriage, extended their homeward drive by making a détour of some miles.

If Allan Holme had before been charmed with Jessie, he was doubly charmed during this drive, though he might have felt rather piqued than complimented by the guileless frankness with which he was treated, had he known that it was in a great measure the result of his riper years. Jessie, it is true, liked and admired him immensely, as she had naively confessed to Mrs. Berne the previous night, adding, in her pretty way: "And, grandma, it is so nice that he is old. You know it places me so entirely at my ease." A confidence received by that lady with an amused smile, though wisely permitting her darling to cherish the pleasing fancy. As they were about to enter the Woodlawn grounds, Jessie paused in an animated recital of some diverting event, exclaiming, in a hushed voice:—

"O Mr. Holme, what a fearfully evil countenance!"

Ere he had time to reply, a man whose approach he had scarcely observed, reached the side of the carriage, demanding, rather than entreating, a gift of money. Checking the horses, his eye wandered gravely, almost sadly, from the massive frame to the face on which forty years of unrestrained evil passions had left their diabolical impress.

"I cannot give you money, my poor fellow," he mildly replied. "You are strong and healthy, and should work, and these are not times when work is difficult to be found. I will, however, see that you are provided with food if you will go up to that house," pointing to Woodlawn mansion.

The slumbering passion of the man's nature glared from his whole face as, with a fierce oath, he cried:—

"It was not your advice, but your money I asked, you fool!"

And, with a muttered threat, he turned away, impotently shaking his fist at the receding carriage.

"I perceive that you are not a particularly brave lassie," said Allan Holme, smiling down upon his pale and trembling companion.

Jessie's responsive smile was rather shadowy. Directly she thoughtfully remarked:—

"It is quite impossible for me to say how I would deport myself if placed in circumstances of actual danger, requiring prompt and efficient measures, but I have a fanciful idea that my action might be more creditable to me than when only obliged to face a countenance like that. There seems to be something so life-destroying—I speak not of mere material life—in the presence of such evil, that I am hopelessly and inexpressibly terrified, even while my heart is filled with pity, and a longing desire to aid."

"I think it probable that your 'fanciful idea' may be a correct one. But do not lose sight of the beautiful truth so beautifully expressed in the Holy Word: 'The Lord shall preserve thee from all evil; He shall preserve thy soul!'"

"It is only a momentary forgetfulness," softly returned Jessie, fixing her reverent eyes on the fair blue sky above them.

And the blood flowed slowly away from her heart, and once more tinted lips and cheek with its rich hue, while the remembrance of the wicked face was soon buried in the happy days that came and fled so swiftly.

CHAPTER II.

MRS. BERNE had brought order, comfort, and serene happiness to Woodlawn, but the child-like Jessie crept into the old house, and flitted through the old halls and rooms the very brightest sunbeam that had ever been there; and the once almost—hermetically—sealed library door was now daily kept wide open, that the soft rustle of an unpretending gown, and the welcome music of a light footfall might oftener gladden the heart, and point the pen of the busy writer within. And in this same writer's calendar, that day was inscribed sunniest that had brought most of these gifts, however the leaden clouds might have been telling their beads to the precious seeds and bulbs hidden under the ground.

It was a bleak morning about a month after Jessie's arrival. Allan Holme, suffering from the effects of a severe cold, sat before his table, rather listlessly turning the leaves of a book, when his quick ear caught the sound of Jessie's footstep in the hall. Then came the repeated turning of a key in a lock, and the light shaking of a door. Evidently the household fairy was in trouble.

"What is the difficulty, Miss Jessie?" inquired he, leaving the room, and hastening to where she stood in front of the memorable closet under the stairs.

"I am sorry to have disturbed you," she said, regretfully, "but I am either very awkward, or have a most rebellious door to deal with." And she gave it an energetic shake as she spoke.

"Let me try my more vigorous arms," putting her gently aside.

After many fruitless efforts, he smilingly asked:—

"Is it absolutely necessary that an entrance should be effected?"

"Oh, no! Grandma only sent me for a lap board which she fancies she once saw here."

"She wants it, of course, or she would not have sent for it, so we will make another praiseworthy attempt."

Eventually the door yielded before the alternate poundings and shakings liberally bestowed. The first thing attracting the eyes of both was the rocking-horse; but Jessie, intent on the object of her search, at first made no comment, an example studiously imitated by her assistant, for certain weighty and secret reasons of his own. But the desired article once triumphantly drawn forth, the embargo was removed from Jessie's tongue.

"You occasionally have children here?" innocently asserted the little maiden, with a pleased smile, stroking the horse's mane as tenderly as if the soft curls of some cherub rested beneath her hand. "I am glad; I love children; they seem so fresh from Heaven, and so very near there, too. Don't you think so?" she added, in a naive and winning way, that sent the blood in quickened passage through his veins.

"I am afraid I have never once had a thought about them nearly so sweet as that. But you are mistaken; the horse is yours."

"Sir?" And profoundest amazement dilated Jessie's blue eyes, as she scanned Allan Holme's face of undisturbed gravity.

"The horse belongs to you," he repeated, folding his arms, and leaning nonchalantly against the door-post, his fine eyes brimming with repressed merriment.

"To me!" incredulously exclaimed Jessie.

"It is even so. I know positively that it was bought expressly for you."

"You do? Who bought it?"

"I, please your ladyship?"

And Allan Holme bowed profoundly, while mirth began to dance in Jessie's eyes, and curve and dimple lips and cheeks, as a glimmer of the truth dawned upon her mind.

"And wherefore?"

"To give pleasure to the little child I expected to welcome to Woodlawn."

Jessie's tiny white hands were suddenly clasped together, and a peal of gleeful laughter echoed through the old hall, Allan Holme's deeper tones chiming harmoniously with the voice he loved so well to hear in speech, song, or laughter.

"Did grandma know?" inquired Jessie, when she had recovered sufficient breath.

"Certainly. But for all practical purposes my confidence was yielded too late, and I was consequently left to learn the truth at the moment of our introduction. Imagine my consternation when your name was announced, for I do assure you my very first thought was of this harmless little animal here."

And another merry peal awakened the echoes once more.

"No wonder," cried Jessie, presently, "that she favored me with so many remarkable changes about my deportment, counseling me, among other things, 'not to go frisking over the house like a young kitten,' in consequence of which, you see, I had to leave all my friskiness at General Cliff's," completing the sentence with a mischievous glance.

Allan Holme still stood gazing down upon his laughing companion, but the mirth had died out of his eyes, leaving in its stead a softer light beaming there.

"Is that indeed so, Miss Jessie? Have you felt at all restrained by my presence?" he questioned, in a pained tone.

"Indeed, no, Mr. Holme; I did but jest, I assure you." And approaching a step nearer to him, she gravely laid the two little white hands in his, as if thus to confirm her protestation, and lifting her innocent, earnest eyes to his face, emphatically repeated: "No, indeed, no!"

The soft light deepened in Allan Holme's eyes, and the hands were closely imprisoned as he entreated:—

"And you will promise never to be guilty of any such crime against my—my sleepless care of your comfort and happiness? Promise me, little Jessie."

And Jessie promised with a sweet flutter at her heart, of which she had yet to learn the name.

If heretofore there had been a slight barrier of reserve marring their intercourse, this little incident very effectually put it to flight, and from that hour Jessie's manner settled into a more trustful, running dependence, his assuming a protective gentleness that imparted a new and unanalyzed happiness to her daily life. And that evening, when he entered the parlor, he felt that the compact of the morning bore with it a secret charm, which had united them very closely.

Since the first day of Mrs. Berne's coming, he had drawn freely on the rich stores of library and mind for their mutual entertainment, and these regular evening reunions had become a very delightful portion of the twenty-four hours to each. But on this particular evening, hoarseness and lassitude indisposing to exertion, the book was closed earlier than usual, and at length, excusing himself, he retired to his chamber. Shortly after, Mrs. Berne proposed to Jessie:—

"Suppose we follow Mr. Holme's example, dear? I am unusually weary, and the servants, too, will be glad to be off duty, I suspect."

"Go, by all means, grandma, and I will soon come. I am neither tired nor sleepy, and would like to write to Cairra if you do not mind going up alone."

"Then the servants had better remain till you are ready, dear."

"Oh, no grandma. I am not subject to nervous fears, you know, and shall feel just as safe as if you were all around me. I will go into the library though, for my writing-desk is there."

The house was soon quiet, and Jessie in the library comfortably ensconced in the depths of the great carved chair, descended to Allan Holme through a score of grand old ancestors. It was a deep and rather narrow room, with two large bay windows at the side, now heavily draped with green damask. Directly opposite to one of these windows, and between the fire and table, sat Jessie. Always a pleasant room, it was this night particularly attractive to her in the cheerful glow of the Argand lamp and the flaming bitumen, and for a little she remained quite absorbed in luxurious enjoyment of the brightness, pen, ink, and paper lying untouched on the table beside her.

She made a pretty picture leaning indolently back in the quaint chair—the graceful little brown-draped figure, with fair, sweet face, and flaxen curls—two little feet resting on the cushion before her, two little dimpled hands loosely clasped in her lap, and a pair of soft eyes wandering in smiling content around the shadowless room. Presently aroused to the recollection of the neglected letter, this pleasant inertness was shaken off, the paper drawn toward her, and pen industriously employed. One, two, three pages were written with scarcely a pause. Then, leaning smilingly back in her chair, she fixed her eyes on the carpet before her, while debating the expedience of narrating the laughable disclosure of the morning.

Suddenly horror thrilled every nerve, and for a brief instant a gray mist darkened her vision. But she sat unmoved. Not a muscle told of the unutterable terror within; not an eyelash stirred unduly. Calm as marble was the face from which the pretty smile was slowly fading, but from which only a tint of color had fled. She knew there could be no mistake. It lay before her frightfully distinct; distinct as anything else in the brilliantly lighted room, a portion of a bare foot, protruding beneath the damask curtain. And even while paralyzed by horror and dread, and actively deliberating on her course of action, she counted in a vague, objectless way, the five disgusting toes, critically noting their exact proportions, and unwittingly drawing therefrom certain conclusions in regard to the size of the concealed figure. She felt that behind that curtain vigilant eyes were watching every motion, and realized that, under God, safety depended wholly on her own self-possession. But vainly she struggled to resist the spell that bound her in the terrifying consciousness of those mysterious, unseen eyes, and the oppressive silence reigning over the house. She seemed utterly, hopelessly powerless. Just then the little time-piece on the mantel slowly and musically told the hour. The effect was electrical. At the first sound, more vigorous life flowed through her veins. Starting up in her chair, she glanced at the clock, exclaiming, as she hastily resumed her pen:—

"Eleven o'clock! What will grandma say?" and, committing herself to the keeping of the Everpresent, she again bent over the unfinished sheet, resolutely repelling every thought of the watchful eyes beyond. The task was soon completed. Carefully and methodically the letter was folded and placed within the envelope, which was duly addressed with a firm hand. Then, striking a match, she lit the taper, and, with the same steady hand, dropped the wax, and fixed the seal. Rising, she slowly restored her desk to order, lit her night-lamp, extinguished the other, and left the room.

The closing door was the signal for falling strength; but she went bravely on, though with panting breath and trembling limbs. At the door of Allan Holme's dressing-room she paused, a momentary flush tinging her cheeks as she softly turned the lock and entered. The room was aglow with a blazing fire, and the first glance discovered the gentleman she sought asleep on the sofa drawn partially before it. Fearful of his springing to his feet if suddenly aroused, and thus startling and awakening the suspicions of the miscreant below, she approached close to his side and whispered:—

"Mr. Holme! Mr. Holme!"

"Little Jessie!" he murmured, a tender smile touching his lips for a moment, and the pleasant dream went on.

"Mr. Holme! Mr. Holme!" she repeated, in increasingly unsteady accents, laying her trembling hand on his arm. "Mr. Holme, do awake!"

He was now wide enough awake, and only Jessie's restraining hand kept him quietly on the sofa, as he gazed, with anxious, wondering eyes, at her pallid, terror-stricken face.

"Be quiet! speak low!" she hurriedly whispered. "There is a man concealed in the library, behind the curtains of the window opposite the door leading to the hall."

He smiled incredulously, but indulged her by observing the caution.

"Poor child!" he murmured, compassionately, "your face is as white as a dove's wing. Sit here," placing her on the sofa from which he had just arisen, "and tell me what has terrified you so sadly."

He listened to her story in profound admiration, convinced that she was possessed by no deluding freak of the imagination, and unutterably thankful that the fair head was safe under his immediate eye. For a little he stood in thoughtful silence.

"What will you do?" at length inquired Jessie.

"Secure him, if possible, in order that he may no longer be a scourge to himself and his neighbors. I shall call old Davy, who, though happiest when peaceably employed in hot-house and garden, is yet bold as a lion when occasion demands, besides having a deal of bull-dog tenacity about him," he concluded, hastily arming himself with cane and revolver, Jessie's great blue eyes following him wistfully as he did so. He caught the gaze, and paused before her, conscious power and resolute will yielding to the brooding tenderness that beamed from his countenance as he smiled.

"Well, what is it? You do not like this?" touching the little weapon concealed in his breast pocket.

"I would not like you to kill the man," she murmured, shudderingly.

"Nor would I like to kill him, Jessie; but I may be forced to cripple him."

"Yes," and the blue eyes still gazed wistfully in his face.

"That is not all?" he again smiled.

Tears dimmed the eyes now.

"He may be a very desperado, Mr. Holme."

"Well?" quite conscious of her meaning, but intensely covetous of its full expression.

"I am oppressed with dread; your life may be sacrificed," and a tear flashed its diamond light, dropping among the folds of the modest brown dress.

"Sweetest eyes were ever seen," passionately thought Allan Holme, watching it tremble and fall; his reply being only a smile of exceeding tenderness. Taking her hand, he placed it on his arm, saying gently:—

"I must first see you safe in your room."

They noiselessly approached and opened the door. A momentary pause on the threshold, but only the occasional sigh of the wind through the old firs broke the silence. A few hasty steps, and they had reached Mrs. Berne's room.

"Secure your door," he was whispering, turning the lock as he spoke, when a low, shivering exclamation of mortal fear escaped Jessie's lips. One lightning glance at her face, and his eye followed hers up the hall running through the right wing of the building. There, within a few feet of them, stood the insolent beggar of the month previous, his evil countenance blazing out the passion of thwarted plans and murderous purpose.

"In, quick!" cried Allan Holme, thrusting Jessie into the room, and closing the door. It was done in a second, but it was a valuable second to lose.

The next instant lamp and cane were dashed from his hand, and a powerful blow sent him reeling against the wall. In total darkness, and half-stunned by the blow, he could not tell whether he had been hurled against the wall of the main hall or the wing, and of the position of his assailant he knew nothing. Stilling himself into breathless silence, he listened. Not a sound; then the faint creaking of a board, a stealthy movement. It came from the right toward him, was near. Fully prepared, now, he waited the decisive movement, with something better than mere brute force as a dependence. This trust was rewarded in a wholly unexpected manner. On a sudden the hall was ablaze with light, discovering his antagonist little more than an arm's length distant, crouching along the wall, a bit of steel glittering murderously in his right hand. The blinding light was a startling change to the villain. Springing erect, with a muttered oath, he glanced over his shoulder toward the quarter whence it issued, his evil eye resting on Mrs. Berne and Jessie standing in pale horror at their door. Taking advantage of the favorable moment, Allan Holme possessed himself of the cane, lying providentially near, and in a twinkling the brawny figure was stretched senseless on the floor.

"Safe enough for the present," he remarked, lightly touching the broad chest with his moccasined foot. "But the future is to be considered. If you will allow me to rob you of that lamp for a moment, Mrs. Berne, I will speedily insure our safety."

Hastening to his room, he quickly reappeared with a coil of rope, which soon reduced his late formidable adversary to a very harmless state.

"What will you do with him?" inquired Mrs. Berne, as signs of returning consciousness manifested themselves.

"I shall mount guard for the night, and in the morning see him properly sheltered. And, now, Mrs. Berne, be kind enough to take this brave little ghost of ours, and calm her to a rose-restoring slumber," he added, smiling down upon the pale and silent Jessie.

"Ay, she is brave, curse her!" hissed the prisoner, in impotent wrath. "For, if she had but winked an eyelash, I would have killed her, and curses on me that I didn't do it, as it was!"

Mrs. Berne and Jessie shudderingly withdrew. And that night three psalms of thanksgiving ascended as incense before the mercy seat. The morning dawned brightly, and long ere noon the unscrupulous disturber of the peace of Woodlawn lay, securely fettered, in a little cell, whence he was soon borne to receive the due reward of many heinous crimes.

CHAPTER III.

It was late in February. Over all things brooded the stillness of intense cold. The wind, hushed to slumber, breathed not a sigh, stirred not a twig. Only a belated snowbird, hopping hither and thither, showed that life was not wholly stagnant without.

Woodlawn parlor formed a very different picture. Glowing grate; rich, crimson curtains, heavily corded away from the windows; luxurious sofas and chairs, draped in the same color, and crimson carpet, on which the sprays of half-blown white roses seemed verily to be exhaling a faint perfume, gave an aspect of warmth, comfort, and brightness, in delightful contrast to the bleak, cheerless scene beyond. And this balmy atmosphere was deliciously odorous of the fragrances floating through the open doors of the conservatory in which budded and bloomed the rarest and sweetest flowers. Tea-roses, heliotrope, and mignonnette here breathed out their perfumed sighs, whispering, each passing moment, of love, and truth, and heaven; of the blessedness of living with high and holy purpose—for Christ above, and the brother below. Beautiful, precious, happy hours, that live the lesson they teach!

Before the grate lay a Maltese cat, purring its content on a crimson, tasseled cushion, while not far distant stood Mrs. Berne's sewing-chair beside a quaint, little table, on which rested basket and work, cast hastily down on some recent household demand; a dainty crochet needle and a bit of delicate fabric speaking of another and fairer hand. From the western horizon purple and gold had quite faded, and twilight was fast dropping her mantle of deepest gray. Yet, unmindful of all this, Jessie, curled up in one of the low, broad window seats, still poured over the enchanting page that had hurried her thither to catch the last rays of waning light.

It was a pleasant home picture; and Allan Holme, entering from the hall, paused a moment to enjoy its sweetness, ere proceeding onward the dainty figure, partially shrouded by the heavy curtain. Directly he stood beside her. Not a movement indicated her consciousness of his presence, save the shadow of a pretty dimple curving itself among the roses on her cheek. So he laid a white, muscular hand across the seductive page.

"I'll call thee Jessie, Snowdrop, Fairy, and bid thee spare thine eyes."

She still sat motionless, her gaze fixed on the well-shaped hand, smilingly awaiting its removal. Her expectations proved slightly erroneous.

"Nay, you are cruel! Let me read just those last two lines!" she pleaded, still looking at the hand.

"Not a line, not a word!" and the book was gently withdrawn from her detaining fingers. "Do you want me to send you to a blind asylum, Fairy?"

"I believe I am quite destitute of any such ambition," she laughed, resting her fair head against the curtain's bright folds, and lifting her sparkling eyes to his.

He was smiling down upon her in the tender, earnest way so frequent with him; she luxuriating with child-like simplicity in the protective fondness of his manner, which she constantly received with an exquisitely child-like grace and freedom, that made him sometimes wonder whether her woman's heart would ever awake, and tremble for the stability of a certain airy castle on which he had lavished many a rainbow-tinted dream and brilliant hope.

"Well, then, be good, or I shall have it to do," and he opened the volume at the title-page. "Goethe. You may read him in the original if you like."

"I may go to the moon, too," nodding her head in saucy mirth, as she looked at him from the pillowing curtain.

"No, I should object, prevent it," he replied, grave as a judge.

"You have become a very despot!"

"What do you think, Mrs. Berne," turning to that lady as she entered the room, "of my placing a German grammar in the hands of this young lassie? Just to keep her out of mischief, you know."

"Any grammar you please, Mr. Holme, only accomplish that desirable end." And she smiled love and blessings on her beautiful idol.

"O Mr. Holme, will you teach me? Do you indeed mean it?" exclaimed Jessie, palpitating delight at every pulse.

"I do, indeed, Snowdrop. Come to the library to-morrow morning, and you shall receive your first lesson."

And thus it befell that morning after morning found Jessie studiously bending over her German books at Allan Holme's side, and all unconsciously learning the sweeter lesson requiring neither teacher nor books; Mrs. Berne looking on the while, profoundly happy in her darling's happiness, and utterly oblivious of the aforementioned lesson.

It was a charming task to Allan Holme to watch, beneath his developing hand, the unfolding of the fine mental powers stored under Jessie's soft curls. And to both teacher and pupil the days went by in winged flight, their pleasant monotony only varied by occasional visits from the neighboring gentry, and flying ones from John and Caird Cliff; these latter visits serving but to rivet more strongly the gentleman's welcome fetters, and to awaken in Allan Holme's mind the thought of a future possibility, without disturbing in the slightest, the serenity of the little lady herself. So the blossoming, fragrant-breathed month of May stole softly among them, and hung forth her delicate garlands ere they had quite awakened to the fact that their happy winter had really gone.

One of these balmy mornings, Jessie, mounted on the ladder in the library, was availing herself of an especial act of grace on Allan Holme's part, in the privilege of removing from the shelves some of the accumulated dust of years, when Dick burst into the room and panted at her side:—

"O Miss Jessie, please come out and see!"

For an instant his shining face was eclipsed by the shirt-sleeve applied to it with energetic industry, but only to emerge in even a higher state of polish, delight, and impatience.

"Say, Miss Jessie," he promptly urged on the completion of the operation.

"Dick, will you ever learn manners?" laughed Jessie, surveying from her perch the whimsical speck of humanity.

"I guesses not, Miss Jessie. But please come. Oh, if you only know'd what I knows!"

And, notwithstanding the presence of the young mistress he adored, his exultation was vented in a chuckle, and an elaborate somersault on the spot. Once more erect, he rolled the whites of his eyes guiltily up at Jessie, on whose face mirth and gravity were contending for the victory, saying, in subdued, apologetic tone:—

"If you only did, Miss Jessie, you'd turn over, too," an assertion quite too much for Jessie's gravity.

At this moment, Allan Holme's step sounded in the hall. Dick, shrewdly surmising that his interference might not be exactly relished by that gentleman, forthwith acted on the principle that "discretion is the better part of valor," and made an unceremonious exit through one of the open windows, much to Jessie's amusement, if not to her enlightenment.

(Conclusion next month.)

AN APPEAL TO THE WIND.

BY MRS. H. R. MORSE.

Oh, wind of summer, wind of night!
Linger and tell me of the hills,
Linger and tell me of the rills
Which you have swept in all your flight.

Tell me of all the greenwood dells
Through which your airy presence flew,
Where song-birds trilled, and wildflowers grew,
Where cornfields decked the upland swells.

Tell me of all the glorious things
Which summer scatters in her train,
Filling the earth with joy again;
Tell something of the songs she sings.

Tell me if near the homestead wall
The bluebells blossom, sweet and rare,
As when I twined them for my hair,
When youth's gay dreams were over all.

And tell me if the roses bloom
On the lone hillside far away,
If e'er is heard the robins lay
Above the stillness of the tomb.

For, oh, sweet wind! oh, whispering wind!
Those summery Junes are not for me;
Beyond the blue waves of the sea,
I left their splendors far behind.

And now I only hear the roar
Of Huron's waters, night and day;
I dream of summer far away,
I linger on a wave-washed shore.

LOOKING THEM OVER.

"CAN'T you look over some manuscript for me, my dear?" said my affectionate spouse, a few days ago. "I have been so busy for the last two months that I have not had time to read up, and we are in want of matter for the next issue."

It was a way of assisting my partner, in that much-enduring position, an editor of a weekly paper, that was not entirely new to me, so I assented at once.

"I'll send them up by John as soon as I get to the office," he said, with an air of relief, "with a note of the number of columns we require."

In accordance with that promise, a smutty little printer's boy, in a paper cap, presented himself before me, an hour later, with a huge bundle of manuscript. Manuscript in envelopes, manuscript in packages for express, manuscript in newspaper with the direction on letter paper pasted over the strings, manuscript "done up" in every variety of style, directed in every kind of handwriting. I smiled faintly as John deposited his bundle upon the table, and handed me the promised memorandum. The quantity required looked absurdly small compared with the pile from which to make selection; so I told John to return in about two hours, drew my rocking-chair close to the table, settled myself in a comfortable attitude, and, after arranging the nondescript bundle into neat piles, commenced the formidable task of looking them over. This was the first effusion that met my eye:—

"SNUGGLESVILLE, Dec. 13, 18—.

"EDITOR of the Blazing Meteor: DEAR SIR: I send you the following hints for your Agricultural Department, founded upon actual observation and experience. The price is $50 (fifty dollars). Address WM. B—, etc."

And these were the hints:—

"Creatures of the bovine species require much devoted attention on the part of those desirous of extracting a voluminous amount of the lacteal fluid. During the season when Nature smiles and summer reigns, the nourishment of this domestic animal becomes a sinecure; but when stern winter reigns, the dried mantle of the meadows must be preserved for the use of this most useful species. When the foaming, snowy waves of creamy lusciousness fill the dairy."

Did the man have his cows milked on the floor? I decided that he was entirely too extravagant in his demands for the funds of the Blazing Meteor, and took up the next. Poetry! I groaned in spirit, but read:—

"THE BREAKING HEART.

"Will it never, never, never break,
This bleeding heart of mine?
Must it live and dwell forever
On the faithlessness of thine?
Can I bear the daily torture
Of seeing thee afar?
Can I think of thee forever,
And never know where you are?"

Comment is needless! There was no letter nor address, so I put the choice production aside to commence the list of "respectfully declined" articles. The next production, written upon the coarsest of paper, and sealed with a thimble, was as follows:—

"CARTUR'S HOLLER, January 2.

"DERE SUR: This cums hoppin you'll talk pitty on a lone widder wummum, who wants to maik an onist liven with her pen, and rite fur the paypers. Send me the prise you give regglur, and except my blesin.

"Ures, to kummand, etc."

"SEENS ON THE OSHUN.

"It was on the Mary Ann that I seen these Seens with my own ize. We was kumin from the Injees, my late lammented beln a ship kapten, and it was in the wintur we left, tho it was warm out thare as gewlie is uther plases, and I wore a musling dress when we startid, a blew musling, with white figgers under it, maid with a fishew cape, and fit me kumplete, for I fell in with a frensh wummum out thare that maid me four dresses, and munney thrown away, for he died afore ever we got to Bostin, and I had to put on mornin as soon as we arriv at land, and the cargo was as good as throne away with dewtys and sellin anyhow, and no head man about, and me but a weke wummum to see to evrything, and am always that see sic I ain't fit for nothin for a munt after a voyalge, and them as swinduled a widder under such sirkumstances won't never proffect by the gane they git, and so say I, mi loss ante yure gane, if yer did poket the widder's mite promiscuous"—

I was sorry for the "widder," but limited as to time, so I had to send her to keep company with "The Breaking Heart." I was not getting along very well with my selections, and tossed over my neat ples a little to see if I could not find an encouraging looking envelope. There it lay under my hand, white and glossy, directed in a compact, business-like hand, not too thick nor too thin, about two columns in bulk, I thought, measuring the writing and package mentally. I opened it hopefully. The letter was charming, pleasant, and graceful, and desiring nothing for the article beyond the pleasure of seeing it in print. As for the article, you will find it in the Blazing Meteor for the coming week. Much encouraged, I proceeded in my work. The next envelope contained the following extraordinary epistle, without date, address, or signature:—

"In the cause of suffering humanity I ask you to publish the following tale, the record of a heart crushed and forsaken, but, alas! still beating. Only the names are false. Let some who read feel their guilty hearts tremble! Let my suffering and wrong warn the young against the flatteries of the other sex. Print! I bid you print:—

"A TALE OF TRUTH.

"In a village not a thousand miles from here lived a maiden, whom I will call Katie Jones, though there are those who know her name was no more Jones than it was Smith. She was fair, and had blue eyes and glossy curls, whereas the other girl had a snub nose and her hair was as straight as a shingle. But what is beauty, when an artful piece like that comes along and talks honied sweetness to him that has been courting one girl steady two years, and driving them as might a-been constant, and some of them richer, too, into the bargain."

Thinking the Blazing Meteor far too feeble an organ to carry this explosion of feminine spite, I put it also aside. My next envelope contained a neat little note, modest and wistful, from a novice, who would "like so much" to become an authoress. And this was her maiden venture, poor child! :—

"TO A VIOLET.

"Peeping from broad leaves of green,
Little blue-eyed treasure,
Nothing fairer can be seen,
Nor give purer pleasure;
Soft as velvet to my touch,
Fragrant as no other,
Let me press thee to my lips,
And in sweetness smother."

Tweedle dum and tweedle dee! There were seventeen verses, and the words "blue and fragrant" came in twenty-eight times. Of course, I was very sorry for the poor little writer; but, you see, the interests of the Blazing Meteor were at stake, and scorched up the unfortunate violet, who was consigned to the rejected pile. The next package was without a letter, and contained the following:—

"THE PLEASURES OF HOPE.

"Hope! Fleeting goddess of the sanguine soul!

Hope! Who can deny to thee the foremost rank in those transient emotions that fling their rosy light upon the human bosom? Without hope we are utterly hopeless!"

This sentence being utterly undeniable, I put the effusion among the hopeless efforts on my table. Really the pile was swelling ominously, and only one poor little article accepted to balance it. The next letter was to the following effect:—

"WALKERSVILLE, Dec. 18th, 18—.

"DEAR SIR: I rede a grate dele, and git most of the nu novils as they come out, and I thote if you woud like some kritisisms on modern orthurs, I could furnish you sum at ten dollars a kollum. I could use up them you wanted used up, and prase the rest. I ain't never predjewisied by redin the books, but would kritisise just as you wanted.

"I've got two writ on two novvuls, and can send them if you desire. Yours, etc."

"Kritisism" is useless. I was getting desperate. Judge how much the following helped me:—

"THE DRUNKARD'S HOME.

"Mary Jeslyn was a drunkard's wife, and lived in a drunkard's home, where three drunkard's children nightly dreaded the drunkard's return, after a drunkard's wages had been spent in a drunkard's carousal at the drunkard's favorite resort—the tavern. Mary was the child of poor, but respectable parents, who would have been heart-broken if the grave had not kindly opened for them before their child became the object of a drunkard's abuse. She little dreamed when she stood beside her handsome husband at the altar that already her rival, the wine cup, was more powerful than her love, and that a drunkard's home awaited her, where year by year her husband would tread the drunkard's path to a drunkard's grave unless he reformed, as you will see if you read on."

Which last sentence failed to stimulate my interest in the twenty-five closely written pages that followed. The next envelope contained what purported to be

"A GOST STORY.

"People now-a-days don't believe in gosts except them as raps, but in the good old times they would have doubted their own existence as soon as doubted the existence of gosts. It was in those days that there lived an old miser whose name was Graball, and who was said to live on fried candle-ends and heel-tops sooner than buy one solid meals vittuls! Anyhow he was thin as a match, and mean as they make 'em. One night a traveller stopped at Graball's for a night's lodging, but was only taken in upon promise of paying handsome. He was that simple that he told old Graball he had a bag of gold in his pocket; and the old miser first put him to bed, and then murdered him, and carried the body to a river near by and drowned it. But if the body sank, the gost riz. From that hour the murderer was a doomed man. Day and night he was haunted by the gost of the murdered man. He pined away till he was a perfect shadder, and finally died confessing his crime, and wildly calling upon the gost to let him die in peace."

For this choice literary effort the modest sum of twenty-five dollars was demanded, but the writer kindly offered to take it in weekly installments of five dollars each, if the Blazing Meteor was unable to command so heavy a sum at once.

Poetry again! Oh! if the would-be poets could imagine the competition that drives editors to the verge of insanity!

"TO SOPHIA.

"O Sophia! my own Sophia!
My aspirations soar no higher
Than to seat me at thy feet
And look upon thy beauty, sweet!
Could you turn your radiant eyes
On him who before thee lies,
You would grant his heart's desire,
O Sophia! dear Sophia!

"O Sophia! my own Sophia!
Should a rival wake my ire,
I would choke him where he stands,
With these desperate jealous hands.
I could never see thee smile
On another being vile;
Should another thus aspire,
I'd throttle him! I would, Sophia!

"O Sophia! my own Sophia!
Every charm that I admire
Wakes my love to thee alone,
Sweetest girl I've ever known!
Smile upon me then, my dear;
From my heart take every fear;
Let the parson knot the tler
That binds thee to me, my Sophia!"

The author only wanted thirty dollars for that! Ten dollars a verse, he wrote, seemed to him "about fair." About fair!

The next envelope was not very bulky, but I found upon opening it, that the contents were written on both sides of ocean paper, in a small cramped hand, It contained

"INSTRUCTIONS FOR RIDING A VELOCIPEDE.

"You can never ride a velocipede if you are addicted to the use of beverages that make your head heavy and your feet unsteady. It can't be done, because you must sit on the thing right straight, or over you go, wheels and all. Of course, you know what a velocipede is. It is one of those new fangled go-carts that you see now on Broadway any hour of the day; a sort of a cross between a go-cart and a stick-horse. If you are expert in riding a velocipede, you can run down a locomotive as easy as winking; but if you are not expert, you are apt to find out just how much harder the floor is than your own nose. Velocipedes were started in Paris, and they do say that legs are of no further use to a Frenchman, as the velocipedes over there waltz, polka, and dance the German. I don't know as we shall ever reach such perfection in their use in this country. I tried to run mine up stairs the last time I came home from the club, but either the stairs or the velocipede, I forget which, objected so strongly that I have never dared to repeat the experiment."

I was interrupted. "If you please, ma'am, Mr. Hopkins says if you can send him about two columns, he can get along this week."

So I gladly dispatched my one accepted article, and postponed the further task of looking over my still unopened manuscript.

MINE AND THINE.

BY UNDIS.

Soft and fair, as a rose-bloom white,
Was the dainty hand I pressed that night,
In the silver flow of the May moonlight.

Bright and chaste was the golden band
I left that eve on the plighted hand
Of the purest maid in a Christian land.

Sweet the lay of the minstrel bird
In its chamber green, by zephyrs stirred;
But, aye, sweeter far was each trembling word
Dropt by the fragrant, rare-ripe lips,
Like scarlet buds, where the trochil dips,
And the bee of the honeyed nectar sips.

Dim the light of the morrow's rise,
Though a rosy flush o'erswept the skies,
For the dead lids sealed down the sea-blue eyes.

Mine! when the misty moonbeams fair
Swept o'er the gloss of her golden hair,
And the night-buds breathed on the dewy air.

Thine, O God! ere the sunbeams kissed
The skies into gold and amethyst—
And my life throbs on through a tearful mist.

HUMILITY is the first lesson we learn from reflection, and self-distrust the first proof we give of having obtained a knowledge of ourselves.—Zimmerman.

WHICH CORNER?

BY DELL STANLEY.

ZADEE ROBBINS stood by one of the great windows of her pleasant city home, tapping uneasily on the window pane. She was in a sadly discontented mood. The weather was certainly dismal enough to make even the most cheerful person depressed in spirit. Besides, there was nothing to anticipate for the coming week; no parties or wedding receptions on the tapis; no more pleasant evenings at the Academy, for Ristori had left for New Orleans; and then the carriage horses were lame, so she could not drive in the Park. Most decidedly, there was nothing at all attractive in the programme for the next week's performances.

She had drummed on the glass until her fingers ached, and was about to turn from the window, with a long drawn sigh, when suddenly some object in the street below brought a happy smile to her face, and she ran lightly down the broad stairs to welcome her grandfather, whose visits being very infrequent, were always doubly welcome.

The dull weather was all forgotten in grandfather's pleasant society, and, best of all, he had come with the determination of taking Zadee back with him to the old homestead, situated in the charming county town of Sardine, about an hour's travel from the city. He said: "Cousin Kate was very lonely, and he knew a few days of Zadee's society would be a great treat to her."

Zadee was delighted at the prospect of a change; and, although she found it rather difficult to obtain her mother's consent to a trip into the country at that inclement season, after permission was once gained, it did not take her long to don her pretty new walking dress, and pack a travelling bag with the few necessaries required for a short visit to Sardine.

Zadee and Kate were never happier than when together. Being nearly of the same age, and of similar tastes and habits, they were almost inseparable; and, although their nominal homes were separated by several miles, yet they managed to see each other frequently, and, when absent from each other, were always faithful correspondents.

Kate was an orphan; and, since the death of her parents, had been cared for by her grandparents, to whom she was fondly attached. They were both in the sere and yellow leaf—three score years and ten had passed over their heads—and grandma especially was very feeble, and required much nursing and care. Kate delighted to make their home sunny, and she often prayed that with them "at the evening time of life it might be light."

One hour from the time Zadee left the city with her grandfather, she stepped upon the platform of the depot at Sardine; and, among those waiting there, soon discovered Kate's bright black eyes, rosy cheeks, and smile of welcome. A stranger would imagine, to see their greeting, that they had been separated from each other for years instead of a few short weeks. For a day or two they were entirely satisfied with each other's society; and then Kate began to fear the country must be dull to her city cousin, and proposed, by way of variety, a walk in the village. So having pulled on their thick rubber boots—the only sure protectors from the mud—they started on their tramp, "in search of an adventure," Kate said.

By and by they passed a snug little cottage, on the door of which Zadee noticed the sign, "Edward Cooke, M. D."

"What doctor is that, Kate? I never noticed his shingle before. Is he a new arrival? Is he old or young? Have you ever seen him? Do tell me, quick! That cannot be he, sitting in the office window, so young and handsome!"

"Why, Zadee, you seem to have found a very sudden interest in this young physician, for young he is, and handsome, too. I have seen him several times, but have not yet been presented to him; he has practised in Sardine but a short time."

"Let me see, what is that other notice on the door? I left my glasses at home; perhaps you can decipher those hieroglyphics, Kate."

"They are certainly plain enough—"Communication Box."

"Oh! I have a plan, Kate. Come, let's go right home, and I will tell you what we shall do. We will send a communication to this handsome young doctor."

"Zadee, you must be crazy! What do you mean?"

"I mean to have a little fun, and you shall help me; 'twill be such an oasis in the desert of country life in winter."

"What do you intend to write in this wonderful epistle?"

"Come home, Kate, and you shall see. But, remember, if I write it, you must drop it into the box; that will be your share of the plot."

"Very well, Zadee. I am ready to do anything that will contribute to your amusement; but will it not be rude and unladylike thus to address a stranger?"

"Bah! No, indeed, he never will know where it comes from. We shall mystify him."

The girls soon reached home, and seated themselves at the little writing-desk in Kate's room. Zadee selected a delicate sheet of note paper, and, after a moment's thought, took up the pen, and scribbled off a short note, and then handed it to her cousin for perusal. Kate took it, and read aloud:—

Doctor Edward Cooke will please call on the corner of Cherry Street to-morrow morning, at ten o'clock, and greatly oblige A. C. S.

"But, Zadee, suppose he should come. But, then, he never will, for your note is so very indefinite. Of course, there are several corners to Cherry Street."

"Well, my dear cousin, you know a young physician is always anxious to secure practice, and I will venture to assert that he will make his appearance to-morrow punctually at ten o'clock."

After dinner, the girls again started for the village, Kate carrying the missive, which, with trembling fingers, she dropped into the box. That night, before retiring, they spent more time than usual crimping their hair, and deciding which was the most becoming of their morning dresses, for they were determined to make an impression on the doctor should he make his appearance the next day.

But disappointment and blighted hopes come even to merry young girls. The next morning they watched in vain. Ten o'clock came without the expected arrival, and Zadee's face began to assume a rather long look; but Kate looked up from her work, and said, quietly:—

"The doctor certainly has common-sense. He evidently knows better than to come on such a ridiculous errand; his time is too precious to waste."

Zadee smiled, but only said: "We shall see."

The next morning Zadee went to take a sleigh ride with her grandpa. It had snowed heavily during the night, and in the early morning the sleighing was excellent; but a thaw soon set in, and the sleighing was spoiled in a few hours.

While the others went to ride, Kate stayed at home to read to grandma. Quiet reigned in the old homestead, broken only by Kate's sweet, girlish voice, as she read aloud a long, dry article, written by some starchy, antiquated person, on a subject not at all interesting to the young; but it pleased grandma, so Kate was content. She was just approaching the end of the second column, when she was startled by a knock at the front door; the knocker was evidently handled by one not accustomed to those old-fashioned institutions. Kate, glad of some excuse to rest her weary throat, laid down the paper, and determined to wait on the door. She opened it, and—there stood the doctor. She was startled, but she willed down the blood which she felt flying to her cheeks, and answered pleasantly his "Good-morning!"

He said: "I regret that I could not call yesterday, as you desired, but I was obliged to go to New York on business." As Kate remained mute, he continued: "I came in answer to a note left at my office."

"What office, sir?"

"Doctor Cooke's office on Main Street. Here is the note," and he took from his pocket the note, which Kate knew too well, handing it to her. He watched her closely as she read it.

She felt his eyes, and, after glancing at it, said:—

"You must be mistaken, sir. 'A. C. S.!' There is no one with those initials residing here."

"The note is very indefinite," said the doctor. "Of course, there are four corners to every street, and it does not mention which corner."

"'Tis too bad," said Kate, in a sympathizing tone. "On the corner opposite there is a sick babe; you might try there."

He decided to do so; and, raising his hat in the most approved fashion, bade her "Good-morning!" and took his departure. Kate determined to watch his proceedings; so she ran to the parlor window, and through the half-open blind saw him cross the street to the opposite corner. His patent-leathers suffered slightly by coming in contact with the mud, and he had scarcely finished rubbing them on the mat when the door opened. He made quite a long call, and, when he came down the stoop, Kate saw that he was laughing; but he certainly could have made no discovery there, for the neighbor opposite knew nothing of her flirtations, so she could not conjecture the cause of his merriment. He crossed over, unhitched his horse, which was attached to a post, and she saw that he had taken his departure.

Kate intended to know what his next step would be, for she imagined that he was about to try at the other two corners of Cherry Street; so she ran out to the gate, and watched the sleigh. Surely enough, he drove up to one of the other corners, and, having hitched his horse, went into the house, which Kate knew was unoccupied; and she laughed merrily, as she thought how he would bruise his knuckles in vain, trying to gain admittance to that domicile. After a time, he again made his appearance, and rushed over in rather a frantic manner to the cottage opposite, in which lived a lone widow. Here, too, his errand was evidently fruitless, as he remained but a moment, and then returned to his sleigh, and drove off in the opposite direction.

"What a capital joke!" thought Kate. "More appropriate, though, for the first of April. How cheap the doctor must feel! But, oh, what elegant eyes, and those side whiskers are superb! If Zadee had only been at home! How disappointed she will be!" She could scarcely wait for her cousin's return.

Zadee was dreadfully provoked when she heard that the doctor had called during her absence. "She would not have missed seeing him for fifty sleigh rides, and the sleighing was so miserable that morning she did not enjoy it at all."

Kate gave a vivid description of his gentlemanly manner, etc., and Zadee said: "She was determined the romance should not end with that morning call. Next week will be the middle of February, so 'Valentine's Day' is not so very far distant. Kate, let's send a Valentine to this paragon of a doctor. You know it must be original, and to the point; poetry, of course, or rather rhyme. Our two craniums, I am sure, will be able to manufacture one which will be presentable. Let's run up stairs, and commence right away."

The writing-desk was again brought into requisition. One would suggest one line, the other the next; some were rejected, others turned and twisted to make the rhyme complete. Finally, after several hours spent in writing and re-writing, Zadee completed the final copy, which Kate read aloud. Zadee listened attentively, applauding each line, and, at the conclusion, there was a most terrific clapping of all four little hands.

"Pshaw!" Kate said, after a momentary pause. "I believe it is full of horrible mistakes. You and I appreciate it much better than the doctor ever will."

"Well," Zadee replied, "in my opinion, all the rhetoric and such stuff that doctor's attempt to learn goes in at one ear and out at the other; they devote all of their time to cramming their brains with the laws of chemistry, and the Latin names of herbs and drugs. He will not take it as a grammar lesson, to be analyzed, and parsed, and to discover all of its awkward imperfections; but, if there is one particle of fun in him, he will appreciate our Valentine, and we shall receive a reply before another week has passed. You must go to the post-office every day, and see if there is not a letter directed to 'the corner of Cherry Street.' You know I shall be obliged to return to the city before the fourteenth, and I shall depend upon you to drop the Valentine into the 'communication box;' and, if we receive an answer, as I am sure we shall, send it down to me, for I am anxious to discover whether or no he will excel us in writing Valentines."

After a few days Zadee returned to the city, her last words to Kate—from the car window as the train moved off—were "Now, mind, don't forget the fourteenth."

Kate did not forget, but deposited the Valentine on the proper day. The answer, however, did not arrive as soon as Zadee had confidently affirmed it would. Kate visited the post-office every day for the remainder of the week, without any result, and she wrote to Zadee, saying, "She thought all the time that the doctor would never deign to notice anonymous epistles."

But Zadee had decided that Kate should receive an answer at all hazards; so, after reading Kate's letter, she took her pen, and commenced scribbling at a furious rate; and, finally, with a triumphant smile, she said: "That will do," and gently patted a huge yellow envelope, directed in a very masculine hand to "Miss Kate

Robbins." The next day Kate's visit to the office was rewarded. But she was prevented by household duties from forwarding at once the doctor's Valentine; so Zadee watched for the postman's arrival very impatiently for several days, and finally received the following note:—

DEAR COUSIN ZADEE: We have at last received an answer from the doctor, or rather I have. Strange to say, it came directed to me, but how he discovered my name, "I dinna ken." I inclose the Valentine for your perusal. Perhaps you will consider it a splendid effusion, far surpassing ours. But what will you say when you read that he has a little wife? O Zadee! is it not shameful, to think that we have attempted a flirtation with a married man? I think he is a most miserable writer, and I notice several grammatical mistakes; besides, the lines do not rhyme at all well. I imagine I see your pretty lips curl, as you say, "Sour grapes. Married men are so dull and uninteresting."

You do not know how I long to see you. You helped get me into the scrape, and now you ought to help me out; for, Zadee, you have not yet heard all. Grandma has been more feeble lately; and yesterday, when our old family physician came to pay his customary visit, he said, that "He was obliged to leave Sardine to go West, and would probably be gone several weeks. He was sorry to leave grandma when she was so ill; but he would leave all the directions necessary, unless her symptoms should change for the worse, in which case we must immediately call in another physician; and he would recommend Doctor E. Cooke—one young in the profession, but talented, and worthy to be trusted with the most precarious cases." He wrote his address, and handed the card to me, saying, "Now, remember, my dear, to send for this doctor if your grandma should get worse;" and then he gave me a searching look, and said: "I hope you are not subject to rush of blood to the head, Kate; you look very much like it. Keep cool, my dear," for you know, of course, at the mention of Doctor Cooke I had blushed scarlet. But the dear old doctor attributed my unusual color to disease, and, if he was to remain at home, would probably put me through a series of doses not at all palatable.

Don't you pity me, Zadee? I am confident that Doctor Cooke's services will be required; and how shall I dare to meet him, when I have been guilty of such very unladylike deportment? I assure you I repent in sackcloth and ashes. Write very soon, and comfort, if you can,
Your own loving KATE.

"That muddy walk up Main Street has brought about quite a romantic snarl," thought Zadee; "but I can see no reason why I should attempt to pick it out, or why I should let Kate know that the Valentine was not really from Doctor Cooke. She will probably discover that, sooner or later, and I may as well let things take their own course." However, she wrote back a sympathizing letter, saying, "Would it not be odd if the doctor was not married at all? You know he might have inserted that line about his better half to make the rhyme complete."

After this, for several weeks, Kate's letters were very short and unsatisfactory. She apologized for their briefness on account of grandma's feebleness, but she never once mentioned the doctor's name. This was very tantalizing to Zadee, for she knew that Doctor Cooke must be attending grandma during this severe illness, and Kate was generally so communicative. She could not account for her silence on this subject.

One afternoon, as Zadee was sitting in her own room, playing with her pet canary, the servant came up, bringing a card, and saying, "A gentleman in the reception-room desires to see Miss Zadee."

She glanced at the bit of pasteboard, and read: "Edward Cooke, M. D." Dropping the card, she ran in girlish fashion to the mirror to see whether she was presentable. She had just arranged her chignon very high on the head, after the prevailing mode; so, pulling a sprig of trailing arbutus from a bouquet holder on the toilet table, she pinned it in her hair, and giving each cheek a vigorous pinch to bring back the roses, which the arrival of this unexpected visitor had banished, she gave a little approving nod at the reflection in the mirror, and started for her first interview with the handsome "M. D." of Sardine.

The call was a long one, and some rather important truths were communicated, if we may judge from Zadee's last sentence as she bade him adieu: "Tell Kate that I intend to give the 'announcement party,' and she must come down as soon as possible to make preparations for it."

Kate came the next day, and gave Zadee a long account of that which she had omitted in her letters.

"You do not know, Zadee, how surprised I was, when I discovered that Ned was not married," she said. "After grandma grew worse, and I was obliged to send for him, I kept in the darkest corner of the room during his visits, and behaved as demurely, as any spinster would have done, who had turned more than one corner. I was so in hopes that he would not recognize me as the damsel who played 'hall waiter,' on that fatal morning; but it seems he knew me all the time. His treatment proved so beneficial to grandma, that she improved very rapidly; so, after a time, I thought it not essential to his patients' comfort, that he should call so frequently. Because, you know, after he had attended to grandma, he would always linger to have a little chat with me, or to hear me play an air or two from his favorite opera. And one day he asked me to drive out with him, and I thought it would not be right to go if he was married, as I supposed; and when I declined his invitation, he seemed to feel so hurt about it that I thought he had best know the reason; so I managed to bring into the conversation some allusion to his wife, when he stared at me in blank amazement, and said, 'Miss Kate, I am minus such an appendage.' And then, Zadee, as soon as I knew that he was not married, there came a very queer feeling into my heart, and I knew I was very much in love with this talented doctor. By and by he said, with an odd little smile, 'The horse and buggy are at the door, won't you go to ride with me now?' And I went. It was a lovely moonlight evening; and before we returned he told me a story, which was very sweet to hear, and—I made a promise. And afterwards grandpa and grandma did not say 'no,' because they admired him so much, and they wanted that their little granddaughter should be happy. Very soon I wore another ring on this finger. Here it is, Zadee; is it not a beauty?"

"You see," said Kate, "he had never even mentioned our first note, or the Valentine, until he gave me the ring; and that evening he took from his pocket both those epistles with which you and I are so familiar, and said, that 'I was quite a little rhymster, but he thought I would never make a Mrs. Browning; indeed he knew, I would not.' Then I ran up stairs, and brought down the Valentine, which I supposed he had sent, and pointed to the line where he spoke of 'his little wife.' He looked puzzled, and after a while he said, 'I never wrote this, Kate. Examine the letters separately, and see if they correspond with the chirography of any of your friends;' and then, Zadee—you wicked girl—I saw some of those curious flourishes, which our old writing professor could never teach you to forget, so I knew you had been at the bottom of it all. And the doctor took the Valentine, the next time he came to the city, and said he was coming to see that naughty cousin of mine, and scold you for representing him as 'twice one,' and so nearly losing for him a 'darling little wife.'

"He says, Zadee, that you explained it all satisfactorily, and I believe you are good friends, are you not? I know you are, or you would not give for us the 'announcement party,' which, you say, is to be the grandest affair of the season. And after the party, I must commence immediately to arrange my trousseau, for the engagement is to be a short one, as Ned is intending to sail for Europe on the first of June, and he says he cannot go without me.

The old homestead wore a more bright and cheerful appearance than usual, on Kate's wedding day. Many friends came out from the city, laden with elegant bridal presents. Zadee was first bridesmaid, and after congratulating the groom she said to him, slyly, "Are you quite sure, doctor, that you have found the right corner of Cherry Street?" He looked down at his beautiful, blushing bride, and then said, in a deep, fervent tone, "Yes, Cousin Zadee, I am sure."

MARRIED FOR FUN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MALBROOK" AND "HONOR BRIGHT."

MAY WHARTON was a sort of solecism among women. She was both handsome and puzzling, winning and reserved, a romp and yet proud. Pious old ladies always shook their heads when she was mentioned, and said she was a hoidenish, daring, reckless coquette, and added, with a sigh, that "She was in the Lord's hands," as if it was infinite relief to clear theirs of her. To gentlemen she was fascinating, bewildering, and offish as a bird.

The girl was an orphan, without "kith or kin," and boarded in the family of her guardian. Judge Harmon resided in one of our towns, which, like the beautiful, spontaneous fruit of the tropics, had sprung up, as it were, in a night, on our "Western wilds," with all the elegance and refinement of cultured energy.

Judge Harmon's home was palatial in aspect. The lawns were like spread velvet—England never boasted of softer or richer—and in all his wide estate generous Nature had been lavish, with her long kept gifts, as if rejoicing in a recipient, imitating her Maker, who urges His own creatures to accept His love.

Underneath a spreading oak stood this girl of whom we are telling. She was the centre of a merry group, whose fortunes she was reading; her dark eyes flashing, her dark cheeks brightening with excitement. Palm after palm was bared to the young priestess, whilst she held them spell-bound with her chaumaturgic powers, tracing through the delicate network of each the striking incidents which had marked each life from its birth; causing some to grow pale with fear, and others to blush scarlet with anger and shame; or, with characteristic daring, she shielded none in laying bare the past, and, with mystical fascination, she predicted the leading events to come, seasoning each with a terse, pertinent, funny bit of advice.

Outside the circle stood a young man—a large fellow, with broad shoulders and splendid figure—his Panama was in his hand, his light curly hair cut close to his well-shaped head. He had given rapt attention whilst the prophetess had fearlessly penetrated the forbidden Arcana of the future. As he listened, his clear blue eyes flashed and sparkled, as if planning mischief. He waited until each of the group had his or her peep into the beyond, when he entered the circle, and with innate grace knelt at the girl's feet, baring his large, hapely hand, with an expression of mock faith upon his face. The girl flushed as she touched his hand, for between these two existed a strange sort of magnetic influence, now attracting, now repulsing. Oftenest they were at variance, disagreeing on all subjects, and occasionally trenching on open quarrel. But sometimes a single glance from those teasing blue eyes would send the blood surging up the girl's dark cheeks, and the accidental touch of her small hand would thrill the man's strong frame like a powerful electric shock. This mysterious influence, whilst it puzzled, had its fascination to each. To cover the sudden blush, the girl looked fearlessly into his eyes, exclaiming:—

"Am I the subject of a mental hallucination, or do I really behold Park Lloyd, the acknowledged skeptic of all hidden, unexplainable things, coming to question occult lore?"

His only reply was to raise his hand a trifle toward her bending face. After that she never glanced at his, upturned and teasing, but served his hand as she had done the others.

"You are both better and worse than people think you. Your nature is positive, not negative. You are genial, generous, sometimes gentle. To counterbalance these virtues, you are tyrannical and exacting, and require as much and more than you give. If you ever have a wife, she will have a stormy time of it. Your will is inflexible and unrelenting. In your past life you have had no great trouble, and have committed no glaring sin; not that you have resisted from principle or conscience, but because you are not open to influence. Temptations will not mix with your nature, any more than water will mingle with oil. You owe your freeness from taint, not to any self-fought battles, but to the fact that you were born morally, as you are physically, strong; so may thank your God, and not yourself. You have imagined yourself in love ever since you were in pinafores, but the great passion has never yet swayed you"—Suddenly she stopped, with a little, low, ringing laugh. They all drew nearer, with breathless curiosity, exclaiming:—

"Why, May, what do you see?"

The girl only laughed the longer, dropping his hand to bring her own together, a habit she had. Merriment is contagious. The whole group became convulsed, laughing until they could not stop, simply because she did. Park Lloyd caught the clasped hands in his; and, looking up into the irresistible face, said, with that determination and will that she had told him was a part of his being:—

"May, what do you see in my hand to evoke such laughter? Tell me, instantly!"

At once she obeyed, controlling her lips, and answering comically in the sudden silence:—

"Why, Park, your hand says that you will marry for fun."

A sudden determination, sealed as soon as conceived, flashed across his teasing face. He sprang suddenly to his feet, keeping her hand in his, and, opening her small, white hand, spread it quite before her face, demanding:—

"And what will you marry for?"

It is when the castle is stormed through quick strategy that it falls. The unexpected attack found her unarmed. She was surprised into reading the riddle of her own life:—

"I—I shall marry in terrible earnest."

He retained the hand firmly, his blue eyes full of inexplicable lights.

"Let us cheat fate into refuting her own decrees, May. Dominie Bowen has just gone into the house with Uncle Harmon. Marry me now, for fun, will you?" and his blue eyes, with their strong, unbending will, looked down into hers.

The blood rushed to her very brow, then ebbed, leaving her pale as death; while those around, not seeing the swift current beneath the surface, and thinking it all a farce, laughed long and loud. The blue eyes never moved from hers, with their subtle, fascinating will power.

"May, this is an age of progress—you are a type of the age, brave, and courageous—let us show ourselves two moral empirics, and declare all such conventionalities as engagements effete."

His tone was low, though so clear that all heard, and the merry laughter continued to ring round the circle at what they deemed his perfect acting. We have said this girl was a solecism—daring, reckless, and self-sustained, having been used to making her own decisions from her birth. Never had the magnetic forces existing between these two been stronger. It drew them together with a force utterly irresistible. Neither loved the other, yet each demanded the other as his own. The power was that of mind and will, not of heart, a sort of mental and nervous magnetism. The smothered fire in her dark eyes blazed and sparkled. Instantly he caught the flash. He bowed his head so low none other ears than hers caught the words:—

"May, shall I seal it?"

Her head was neither raised nor drooped. With bright, triumphant eyes he stooped; his lips touched hers. It was but for an instant, but lips never touch without hearts pulsing. A kiss upon brow or cheek is simply a kiss, but the meeting of lips is the touching of souls. At that sudden, unexpected kiss the merry circle looked at each other in startled surprise, then greeted with a round of applause what they considered the very consummation of fine acting; while Park Lloyd took the girl's hand, and led her into the house, the others following with laughing curiosity.

Judge Harmon and Dominie Bowen were in the bay-window in the drawing-room, the judge displaying some rare exotics that filled the apartment with their exquisite perfume. They went quite in front of the minister, the others grouped about with all the graceful effect of an impromptu tableau. The dominie and judge looked on in mute surprise. Park explained in his clear, coherent way:—

"Dominie, will you please speak the words that shall make May and I husband and wife?"

In an instant there was great excitement, all, at length, catching the deep meaning of the seeming farce. The dominie exclaimed, the judge laughed heartily. Park was his nephew, and he had long desired the match. The confusion increased. Park Lloyd raised his hand with an impatient gesture, his face demanding silence, with that expression seldom disobeyed. He said, quietly:—

"Dominie, there is nothing to keep us apart; marry us at once."

The dominie, though a good, was a weak man, and Park Lloyd's will was iron. He yielded instantly, drew his prayer-book from his pocket, and proceeded with the impressive service of the Episcopal church. The hand that the bridegroom held had grown cold as ice. At its increasing chill, his lips had for one moment set themselves, then relaxed with a smile of triumph at the words "I pronounce thee man and wife." When they arose from this blessing, they were met with laughing congratulations.

In the dining-room a feast had been spread for the benefit of the little company. Judge Harmon invited them to partake, and make it a symposium indeed. At the dining-room door Park left the wedding guests to enter alone; he, by a sudden turn, leading his bride away from them, out upon an adjacent veranda. When there, he raised the little cold hand to his lips; the blood tingled to its very finger ends. He looked into her face teasingly. She flushed painfully, and snatched her hand away; then, lest he should possibly think she had mistaken the caress as given in earnest, she returned it gayly, touching his hand with her lips, and saying with a laugh, from which all merriment had fled:—

"For fun."

The set look stole about his lips again; instantly he led her back to the dining-room. After that the bride and groom led the feast with their gayety.

A little later, in the drawing-room, there was music and dancing. The bride's hand rested on the bridegroom's arm. They were conversing merrily with those about them. The dreamy strains of a waltz floated through the room. He bent his head to her's.

"Will you waltz?"

They had waltzed together many a time, and did it to perfection. Now, the girl drew back. He bent his head still lower, and said: "For fun." She yielded instantly. Always before, he had laid his hand lightly upon her waist; to-night he quite encircled her in his arms, yet never had they seemed so far apart, even in their quarrelling days. The girl shivered; the man set his lips. They were married before ever they were lovers. Of old they were the last to tire; now they made but one round of the room. After that dance he left her for a moment. When he returned, she was standing by the judge's wife; he came quite beside her, and said, in a low tone :—

"There is a train starts for the East in an hour. Can you be ready, Mrs. Lloyd?"

She bowed assent, and instantly left the room with Mrs. Harmon to make preparations, whilst Park called his younger brother Roy to one side, sending him home to pack his trunk, and ask his friends to meet them at the depot. An hour later the good-byes were spoken; the engine shrieked its shrill whistle, and the train whizzed out into the night.

Park Lloyd and his bride sat side by side. She, with pale still face resting in her hand; he, with set lips and folded arms. Yet these two had married 'for fun.'

Fate is not to be hood-winked. She is like a weasel, you cannot catch her asleep. Her flats are unchangeable. They had 'married in fun,' and found it in "terrible earnest." The relation in which they were, henceforth, to stand to each other was settled in few words. They were spoken in a tone so still, so bitter, so poignant, you would never have recognized it for Park Lloyd's genial, heartsome voice.

"May, we understand each other. The farce has proved a tragedy. It has made but one change in your life. To the world only, you are May Lloyd, instead of May Wharton."

And yet in the heart of each at that moment the love, which was born in a kiss 'neath the oak tree, grew strong, wild, wrestling. But neither understanding the other, each sought to crush this thing, with its Titanic proportions, and bury it deep, carving upon its sealing stone—"For fun."

This man said bitterly to himself, what the patriarch, Abraham of old, said of his wife—"She is my sister." His blue eyes grew cynical and unbelieving, his fine mouth set and cold: whilst in this journeying, though this modern Sarai grew pale and apathetic, "the Egyptians beheld the woman, that she was very fair." Everywhere this man heard and saw the suppressed admiration his beautiful wife elicited—heard and saw, writhing with jealousy even of the eyes resting upon her, and with a bitter, exultant triumph that she was his.

There was no more of the old quarrelling; every thing, antagonistic and polemic, seemed to have forsaken their characters; they treated each other with studied politeness. The world could have found nothing at which to cavil; would have pronounced them elegant in their etiquette and dignity. They had travelled thus for weeks, visiting the several watering-places, and every point of interest in our Eastern States.

One day Park Lloyd entered their private parlor in the hotel at Newport. A book lay open on the table. His wife had evidently left it suddenly, perhaps hearing his approach. He picked it up, and kissed the leaves, where but a few minutes before her fingers had rested, then glanced at the page. It was one of Emerson's works, open on travelling. He read these words—"Travelling is a fool's paradise. We owe to our first journeys the discovery that place is nothing. At home I dream that at Naples, at Rome, I can be intoxicated with beauty and lose my sadness. I pack my trunk, embrace my friends, embark on the sea, and at last wake up at Naples, and there beside me is the stern fact, the sad, self, unrelenting, identical, that I fled from. I seek the Vatican and the palaces. I affect to be intoxicated with sights and suggestions; but I am not intoxicated. My giant goes with me wherever I go."

He smiled bitterly. He was her stern, sad, unrelenting fact; her hated, ever-present giant.

That evening when they were promenading the piazza among the gay throng, he asked her if she would like to go home. She bowed assent.

Through the agency of his brother Roy Park had prepared a beautiful home for his bride. All that culture and elegance could suggest, had been garnered with lavish hand, for Park Lloyd was wealthy. A splendid fête in the new home, celebrated their arrival. For the first week or two after their return they were in a constant whirl of excitement. The little world in which they moved, curious to see the result of this daring experiment, this infringement of an established rule of society, were on the alert. Woman is more apt at a part than man. Thus May succeeded in misleading them more readily. Never had she been more brilliant; whilst Park's even disposition seemed to have undergone an entire change. Sometimes he was unnaturally gay; but oftenest morose and taciturn. In company he watched his wife with jealous stealth, and, when she was the centre of an admiring circle, his blue eyes grew gray and sharp as steel, his fine mouth set to fierceness.

All this escaped not the Argus-eyed world. Gossip "rolled this dainty morsel under her tongue" with infinite relish. Nice old ladies, of the "I told you so" school, said: "They always knew if Park Lloyd and May Wharton married, there would be lawyers' fees to pay," though the most far-seeing croaker of them all would have found it utterly impossible to predict results from a thing whose immediate existence was its consummation. They found great delight in it, however, like

"The juggling fiend, who never spoke before,

But cried: 'I married thee!' when the deed was o'er."

The younger people shrugged their shoulders; some pitying May Wharton in the stormy life she had herself predicted for Park Lloyd's wife; others spending their sympathy on him, reasoning that, since he was the more changed, he must necessarily be the greater sufferer of the two.

But all the excitement and dissipation incident to their return had to come to an end. The result was inevitable. The quiet routine of daily life was before them, and they were forced to meet it. Park plunged deep into business, May into books, renewing her long forsaken lessons, her French and German. Each sought as much as possible to avoid the other; but their contact was constant, and the very suffering it inflicted was filled with an intense fascination. If they but met in the halls, and exchanged a common-place remark, or came upon each other suddenly in the garden walks, the presence would cling to each for hours. Their very desire to avoid each other constantly had a diametrically opposite effect. May, walking in the garden, would catch a glimpse of her husband under the trees, and turn suddenly to go into the house; and he, having simultaneously seen the flutter of her dress, and not wishing to obtrude his presence, would seek to accomplish the same object by another route, thus bringing them face to face at the door step, when, with his courtly grace, he would touch his hat, and say:—

"Do not let me prevent your walking, madam," and she would return to the garden without speaking. Thus each, in his strong effort to conceal his heart secret, confirmed the other in his cruel conviction.

One evening May was in the drawing-room, playing the piano by moonlight. Quite unknown to her, Park sat on the closely-shaded piazza, a little to one side of the French window, listening. His blue eyes were full of such longing despair as we would imagine an artist would paint in the eyes of Tantalus. After awhile she ceased, and, driven by her restless spirit, stepped out on the piazza, intending to go into the garden. It was so dark she put out her hand to grope her way, and laid it directly on his cheek. She started, with a little cry of joyful alarm, which he mistook for horror and repulsion. He arose instantly, saying, in a low tone:—

"Your pardon, madam!"

Then, as she, mortified and flushing lest he had discovered in her tone what for weeks she had been seeking to hide, turned quickly toward the house, he added:—

"Do not let me disturb you. I am going to the library." His tone was cold.

She replied, with well-feigned indifference: "I was only on my way to the garden, sir," and left him, walking as far as the first rustic seat, there crying as if her heart would break. "The very touch of my hand is hateful to him," she thought.

A few evenings later his mother was with them. They were in the library. Park had wheeled a stool to the old lady's feet, and laid his head upon her lap, and she was stroking his hair with her gentle, mother hands. May was seated at some little distance, bending over her worsted work. They had been silent for a space, when the dear, unsuspecting old lady said:—

"Park, you are just as fond of petting as ever. May, darling, does my boy tease you most to death with his loving ways?"

The blood surged to the wife's very brow. She bent low over her work. The old lady laughed merrily, saying:—

"Why, you little bashful puss! I thought, by this time, you were so used to Park you would not mind his mother."

Park changed the subject.

Everything must have an end. When things come to the worst, they naturally better themselves. Thus their fate reached its crisis. In the weeks that had passed Park had grown careworn and haggard; whilst May, through constant excitement, stood on the very verge of a nervous fever.

One morning she was wandering about in her restless way—her cheeks burning, her eyes unnaturally bright, her pulse bounding at fever rate—she happened to pass Park's room. The door stood open. Impelled by an irresistible impulse, she crossed the threshold, and stood for the first time in her husband's apartment. The quick, guilty blush of an interloper dyed her cheeks. She closed the door softly, and turned the key. She stood for a moment motionless, looking about with a sort of frightened curiosity, in which pain and pleasure were strangely mingled, then moved about, touching the articles he was wont to handle with a sort of tender reverence; looking into the mirror that was used to reflecting the face she had not looked at, save by stealth, for weeks; handling the brush that had pressed the curly locks her fingers had longed but to touch with a sort of bitter jealousy; toying with each article of the toilet, even once peeping into a bureau drawer, and starting back with sudden fright as if she had been a detected thief. At length the overwrought nerves relaxed. She threw herself into his easy-chair, and cried as if her heart would break. Love, with wild, rushing tide, dashed aside every obstacle, even pride. She felt as if she could fling herself at his feet and implore him to love her. In the excess of her grief she arose and hurriedly paced the room. In her walking she noticed what had before passed unobserved—his writing-desk stood open upon a table. She approached it, with quick jealousy, as if he, her husband, had no right to aught apart from her. Upon the desk lay an open letter. May Lloyd was an honorable girl, but the temptation was strong. She paled in the struggle, and was turning quickly away, when her own name caught her eye. It was an unfinished letter to herself. She seized it greedily, her hands trembling so she scarce could hold it whilst she read. The contents were in this wise :-

"MAY: Neither of us can longer endure this agony; the tortures of the inquisition were mild in comparison. It is only exceeded by the sufferings of the damned. Since the first time I ever met you, you had a strange, unearthly attraction for me. It was not love; sometimes I said to myself that the passion you elicited was the perfection of refined hatred. To me you were scarce human. I had a strange notion that, if I could catch you in my hands, I could crush you to an essence, and then gather your being into mine. But you were so offish, I dare not even so much as take your hand in mine. The power you wielded over me was inexplicable. I think you were yourself ruled by it. There seemed a cord reaching from your being to mine, which now contracted, drawing us to close contact; now relaxed, parting us wide, yet never broke. I did not wish to make you my wife; yet felt assured if you ever married another man, the moment that made him your husband made him a corpse. That day under the oak-tree I was seized with a strong, irresistible longing to own you. The idea took possession of me and ruled me. I was its slave. Judgment and reason crouched before my wild demand. I determined you should be mine, past all reach save God's. My will trampled yours; I conquered. My God! we were 'married for fun.' The words are sharper than Damascus steel; they cut, and hack, and tear my very soul. The vow that made us one rent us asunder. The world calls us husband and wife; the words are the perfection of poignant sarcasm. Husband and wife! And but one cares, that given in the presence of the world 'for fun!' That kiss changed my entire being. From the time your beautiful lips touched mine, my heart has pulsed in wild, craving, agonizing love. Sometimes I think it will drive me mad. You grew to hating me. If you but chance to meet me, you pale and shiver; whilst if your skirts but touch me when you pass, every nerve in my being thrills and quivers, with an excess of joy that trenches on exquisite pain. You have not looked into my eyes for weeks. I never!"

There it stopped suddenly, as if he had been called away. The wife bowed her face, white with this sudden joy; then, through very excess, calm and still, knelt and thanked her Maker. A little after she replaced the letter, carefully erased every trace of her presence, and left the room.

The first sudden burst of joy rendered her quiet. In its continuance she grew restless and excited. He thought she hated him! She longed to tell him of the love that had filled and absorbed her entire being. It seemed as if the hours grew to eternities, as if the evening would never come. How should she correct this mistake? His strong will had won her ere he had wooed her. Her pride forbade the revelation. Then, with the versatility of happiness, she burst into the old merry laugh, that had been silent for weeks, at the remembrance of those awkward encounters in the garden, where each was hiding the self-same secret from the other. She made her evening toilet early in the afternoon, thinking to attract her attention, and thus chase time. She arrayed herself with exquisite care, hoping to look beautiful in his eyes. Scarcely was it completed, when she heard the clatter of a horse's hoofs in the broad carriage road, and reached the window just in time to see him dismount and enter the house.

"What had brought him home so early? Was he ill?" She trembled and grew pale, longing to assert her wifely right, and hasten to his side; but, bashful and frightened, she lingered in her room until she heard him go to his apartment, and after a little leave it again, then with cheeks now brilliant, now pale, descended the broad staircase. As she passed the drawing-room she glanced in. He sat in an easy-chair, wheeled in one of the windows, his eyes closed wearily, and an expression of pain about brow and lip, as if his head ached as well as his heart.

She hesitated a moment, then, for the first time since their marriage, entered the room where he sat alone. He moved slightly, as if to warn her of his presence. She blushed painfully, but did not draw back, as was her wont; but, instead, seated herself at the piano, and began playing. He looked surprised, but remained seated.

She made countless mistakes, timid and trembling, in the presence of this man, who had been her husband for weeks—aye a long summer, for now it was early fall—yet to-day, for the first time her acknowledged lover. The position was novel, and full of fascination. A wife yet to be wooed. A spice of her old coquetry returned, a sudden determination seized her. She turned on her stool and looked at him. He was leaning back in his chair, his eyes closed.

He had acknowledged in that letter that the very touch of her dress thrilled him. She would take him unarmed, and draw a declaration of his love from his own lips.

She went timidly to his side, with brilliant cheeks and half veiled eyes, standing so closely beside his chair that her sleeve touched his shoulder. The blood mounted to her very brow; she did not glance at him, but said, in a broken, bashful way:—

"You are home early."

He answered: "Yes," shortly, looking at her in utter astonishment.

"Is there anything the matter, Park?" She had not spoken his name before in all that summer. The man paled with the inward struggle. Her close presence—her very sleeve resting on his, and yet so far apart.

"Nothing but headache," he answered, in a voice rendered hard and sharp by excess of anguish.

"I am sorry," she said, simply, and bashfully left him, going into the window by which he was seated, and trimming some rose-trees that grew in rustic baskets there.

He was watching her; she knew it, and grew restless and uneasy. How should they ever understand each other. Our lives, like rose-trees, may be trimmed into beauty and symmetry by very small pruning knives. This is how fate, by the hands of May Lloyd, trimmed the thorns that parted two lives which months before by Divine law had been declared one. The knife was sharp. The mind, utterly absorbed, left its management entirely to the fingers. They, unused to freedom, lawlessly dashed it into the palm of the little white hand. The blood flowed a crimson flood.

Park Lloyd sprang to her side with a cry of mingled agony and terror. She turned deathly pale, and reeled at the pain. He caught her in his arms, carrying her to an adjacent lounge. She sank back in the cushions sick and faint. He knelt at her side, and bound up the wounded hand with his handkerchief, his own strong hand trembling as he did it, then hastily brought her a glass of wine. She did not offer to take it, thus compelling him to place it to her lips. His hand was unsteady; she raised hers, and laid it on his to guide it. At the light touch the man flushed to his very brow; but with fierce setting of the lips, he drove the color back. She drained the glass; then with one quick, bashful look thanked him.

He left her instantly, going over to the window where the flowers were, and standing, his back to the room, his arms folded. The touch, light, frightened, lingering, of that little hand; the look incomprehensible, which he had never seen before in those dark eyes, baffled, bewildered, maddened the man. He could endure this agony no longer. Never before had he questioned the dislike of his wife. Now he said to himself: "The girl either hates or loves me." And with white set lips he determined to know his doom at once, and if the former proved true, to leave her then and forever.

He turned, she had left the lounge, and sat in an easy-chair, drawn in front of a window, through which the wind blew fresh and strong. A slight blush dyed her pale cheeks when he stood beside her.

"May." She could not raise her eyes. Quiet through every excess of suspense, he wheeled an ottoman to her feet and sat down. Since their marriage he had not even so much as touched her hand, now he rested his arm upon her lap, and leant forward, thus bringing his face directly and closely before hers. She did not shrink, only the blush deepened. "May, neither of us can longer endure this. I love you so, that to be longer in your presence without love will drive me mad. The relation we have sustained to each other has rendered indifference utterly impossible, you must either hate or love in return. If the former, bid me instantly leave you; if the latter, renounce that fearful 'marrying in fun,' and show me that now you are my wife in earnest."

He waited, she, paling and flushing before him. Her face drooped, seeking in vain to hide itself from those searching blue eyes. She had not calculated his close proximity; he moved a trifle, their lips met.

A little later, the servants looked in wonder to see so indifferent a couple as the master and mistress come out to dinner arm in arm. Her face brilliant with happiness, his overspread with a proud deep joy.

That evening a notorious gossip called, with her husband. They found Park Lloyd and his wife enjoying the moonlight on their vine-clad veranda. She on a low rustic settee, he reclining with a sort of lazy grace at her feet, his head upon her lap. Her wounded hand was held in his gentle caressing clasp, whilst the other toyed with the light closely cut curls, which she had longed but to touch.

The gossip made but a brief stay, going away delighted with the happiness these two were enjoying, though they had "married for fun."

TO A FRIEND.

BY EMMA NASH.

WHERE'ER they meet thee, all must feel
The goodness which thine eyes reveal
Lying beneath the drooping lid,
E'en as the violets by leaves hid.
At sight of pain thy tears will start—
Flowing in pity from thy heart,
And hungry child, and shivering poor,
Each finds a welcome at thy door.
And ne'er a rude word meets the ear
Of those who love thee and who hear
The gentle accents of thy voice,
At sound of which thy friends rejoice;
For 'tis so like the silver note
That gushes from the graceful throat
Of bird, that all who stop and listen,
Feel their eyes with glad tears glisten.
Thy gentle ways, thy graceful form,
Thy tender words so free from scorn,
Thy lovely smile, thy soft blue eye,
Makes thee a vision of the sky.

WE are ruined, not by what we really want, but by what we think we do; therefore, never go abroad in search of your wants. If they be real wants, they will come home in search of you; for he that buys what he does not want will soon want what he cannot buy.—Colton.

SELF-FLATTERY.—It often amuses me to hear men impute all their misfortunes to fate, bad luck, or destiny, whilst their success or good fortune they ascribe to their own sagacity, cleverness, or penetration. THE HAWTHORN COPSE.

BY LOUISE BARTON.

"I AM awaiting your answer, Mildred."

There was a thrill in the words which jarred on Mildred Ravenstone, as she stood apart in the shadow of the draped bow-window. She moved with an impatient gesture, and glanced round at the speaker. There he still leaned against the mantel, his head bent, just as it had been when she rose up from the low seat, facing him, and came away to gaze out on Ravenstone Cliff, and the valley which it overhung, and see if she could possibly resolve to leave them.

This heterogeneous gray-stone mass, by courtesy *ye*apt The Towers, crested the cliff with odd projecting turrets and eccentric gables. Round them a broad flagged terrace, flanked with a flowery oak-shadowed slope, swept away to the very brink of the precipitous front, whence purple heath, broken by rocks, descended to the dale far beneath. There the Dent River, shrunken in the summer heats, brattled along its bed of solid rock which lifted wave-worn furrows now and then above the waters like storm-black billows. Over it, on either hand, Barking, and other mountains of the winding range, stood up shoulder to shoulder, and well nigh foot to foot, their steep base rife with cultivation. The frequent gills that leaped in foam, or twined in gleaming threads from pasture-perches, white with flocks, lent an Alpine aspect to this Yorkshire vale, sustained by little Denton at its farther end, with overhanging roofs and stairs that mounted outside to the open galleries.

But Mildred's attention had not strayed all the way to Denton. Looking toward that village, Ravenstone Fell was cleft by a turbulent gill, fringed on this side by a tall and straggling hawthorn copse, which veiled the bridge across the stream, and the rock-rent crags beyond. Mildred's eyes flashed while they rested on the copse, as if some memory lurking there angered her. And hastily she reverted to the lovely scenes below.

Could she leave these? All things were cold, uncertain, dead, to her, but this familiar face of the one lonely home she had ever known. Nothing else she loved; she had almost said, had ever loved. A tear plashed down upon her dress, the crape folds of which were crisp and fresh, the outward mourning for her last of near kindred—the brother on whom yesterday shut the ancestral vault of Denton Church. But he was not now more deeply buried from her in the hush and coldness of the tomb, than he had always been in the hush of his great library, the coldness of his never-opened heart. Once in her life had he summoned her to that solemn room to lay before her an offer of marriage from a gray earl, who had met her, shy and silent, and wondrously lovely, at the one or two dull county dinners, her sole glimpse of the world. The young girl had instantly declined the honor, which her brother did not urge upon her. He merely stated that it was an honor, such as did not offer itself every day in a secluded life like hers, and she must be aware that by law of entail his death closed the doors of The Towers upon her, to open them wide for her far-away cousin, Hugh Ravenstone.

She had that day concerned herself as little about prospective homelessness as he in reality about death. While he spoke, she had been fronting the west window, through which wafted the faint breath of those hawthorn boughs, and seemed to whisper words which had thrilled among them not many gloamings past. That whisper shut out from her hearing the formal utterances of the brother.

But to-day a year had passed since then, and these tones of Hugh Ravenstone's were the only sounds which had recalled those passed, she knew not how nor why, out of her life. She only knew that Arthur Vere had said farewell, as if for a brief space, beneath that hawthorn tryst, and he had never come again. In the first months a sick fear smote her that he might be ill, even dead. Until one Sunday, at Denton Church, she met his cousins of the Grange, and heard them mention him as travelling abroad with a gay party, one of whom, an heiress, rumor said—. Mildred would listen no more to their whispers, nor to those of the gloaming hawthorn copse. And the thrilling of Hugh Ravenstone's voice now vexed her with somewhat of the self-scorn with which she turned from her one day-dream faded out so dully. She had almost decided to take The Towers, as Hugh Ravenstone proposed. But that she must also take that paltry thing called Love, was not to be thought of for an instant. She looked again at her cousin, and that second look decided her. Had she beheld a graceful figure, dark and fiery glances, which forced her own to fall before them, then memory must have stirred the mould of pride which she had heaped above it. And then she would have turned her face from him, have turned her face from the beloved one of her home. But that heavy frame; the strongly marked countenance; the deep-set fire of his eyes hidden as they lowered under straight, thick brows, were nothing in her past. She moved from her retreat until she came and stood also on the hearth, opposite to him. He raised his head, shading his eyes from her still.

"I hardly know," she began, composedly, "how to thank you for what you have just said. You cannot understand how dear to me is this ruinous old place. It is the one thing which I have loved—which I love; and to leave it, would be bitterer than death. You say you are waiting for my answer, but the answer you yourself must give. You have asked me not to leave my home; to keep it as your wife. Perhaps, in speaking thus, you thought I was as easy and quick to love as other girls of eighteen are. I tell you, no. All my life long, all feeling has been crushed out from me. I love my home, only my home. Hugh Ravenstone may well find a truer wife than this."

"Hugh Ravenstone will have this wife or none," he said, quietly, without a moment's hesitation.

The glad color rushed back into her face. "You are very good," she began. And, rosily bashful as ever a just-promised maiden should be, she sank once more upon the seat from which she had moved away to the window.

He looked down on her steadfastly. He was paler than his wont, and the gray eyes had a strangely wistful, yet pained tenderness, within their depths. He answered nothing, hardly seemed to have heard her last words, but started as from a reverie when the library-clock chimed out the hour, through deserted halls between.

"Not a moment to lose," he said, "since I must not miss the London train. This day four weeks, then, Cousin Mildred; I shall leave you in undisturbed possession until then. On that day you will make the home you love forever yours. You must let my sister come to you shortly before. And now, good-by! God bless you!"

She rose and gave her cold little fingers to his hold. She hung her head in dread unspeakable, lest he should not be content with that formal farewell. Once only in her life could she remember any one had touched her lips, and he—Kisses, it seemed to her, were only to betray.

Whether her cousin read something of this shrinking in her clear young face, certain it is that he merely grasped the fingers till they grew warmer in that grasp. He merely glanced at the fresh mouth, and watched the fluttering of auburn lashes over warm bright eyes of the same shade. And then he loosed the hand, and the door closed upon him before Mildred had stirred.

She drew a deep breath of relief, then went to the window, hearing his step upon the terrace.

"How good he is!" she said again, and then, watching him cross toward the stables, "How comfortably prosaic!"

Her brow sank on her folded arms upon the window-sill, and did not lift itself again, although Sir Hugh, while waiting for his horse, was walking up and down the terrace, within sound, and more than once glanced toward the window for some sign. The rebellious thought had come to her that this might be her task: to follow at his beck, like any purchased thing, since Ravenstone Tower was her price. Yet no desire to draw back from that sale awoke.

She could not go; the shred of heart she had was there. No, she would not draw back; she would but be free until her time. And so Hugh Ravenstone flung himself upon his horse and rode away, and Mildred rose up smiling, as the hoof-beats rang out on the twilight air. Upon that dewy air stole in the scent of hawthorn, and she shut the window hastily and rang for lights.

"Will he hear of it? Will he be sorry, then?" escaped from her, at the last glance she cast upon the hawthorn copse, the snowy boughs of which brought to her mind white orange flowers.

"Will he hear of it?" The same question was ringing its changes through Mildred's mind, when, on the last day of that month which had seen her sole ruler of The Towers, she escaped from the kindly scrutiny of Hugh Ravenstone's sister and the final arrangements as to the white wedding attire that sister had ordained.

"Will he hear of it? Will he care for it?" She was troubled more and more by these recurring questions, as she wandered from the terrace, and struck into a path which fringed the Denton side. Mechanically she turned into it, without at first appearing to mark where she was. The way led midway down the fell, behind the hawthorn copse—no very secure path for twilight wanderings. But those feet strayed on, as if they did not move by any will of hers, until they reached the pathway's very end, where Ravenstone Fell overhung the dale. The rivulet there made its last plunge down a rock, and lost itself within the Dent, and lashed with spray its strip of margent turf. High above, a mossy bridge, closed by a stile, spanned the ravine, and formed a short cut to the village—disused now, however, since the decaying moss-grown timbers were no longer deemed quite secure.

Notwithstanding which, at this moment, who but Hugh Ravenstone came sauntering up the cliff beyond, and through the Woodland fringe, and set his foot upon the bridge? Who, but Hugh Ravenstone—although he was supposed to be still far enough away, awaiting the morning express to Ravenstone? But he started back when he saw the young girl at the farther end upon the stile. He had longed for the sight. Once, toward the close of Parliamentary duties, he had come up for one hour, and gone away unseen, but with a glimpse of his bride's face to carry back with him. He had longed for the sight; but, as he looked, his eyes grew dark with pain. How little like a bride's that drooping face, from which the shielding hand was now dropped listlessly. The mouth was shut with a harassed weariness, the eyes were set in a hard, cold glitter. He could not bear that apathy, apparent in the features' every line; in the very folding of her hands, as she clasped them with the rosy palms outward, and let them fall listlessly over the railing. He must have gone to her in another instant; but in that instant she had lifted herself up wearily, and turned away.

He went down to the beach again, and there strode up and down a gray, bleak hour before he followed her. He had not yet determined what to do, but followed with the feeling that, when the time was come, he would be given that which he should speak. Mildred had gone on before, and he did not see her until he reached The Towers. But over the bridge, in the shelter of the hawthorns, near where she had stood, there was a knoll all arched in by snowy boughs. Beneath them a something else as white was there. Hugh Ravenstone stooped and raised a dainty handkerchief—quite wet, soaked through with tears. He took it up.

"The poor, poor child! She shall be free, if it is this which makes her wretchedness," he said.

He thought he did not doubt, he did not hope. But his was not the calm of hopelessness, but of self-control. He went on till The Towers gloomed between the gloaming trees. He mounted the steps to the portico. The drawing-room windows opened upon it; and, as he stood there, he heard her voice within that room in which a month ago she had given him his answer; heard it for the first time since she had blushed before him, stammering of his goodness to her. Was it goodness to suffer her to bind herself with fetters she might one day chafe against, yet never break? His resolution did not falter; only he paused one instant that his words, too, might not falter.

In that pause her voice came once again in the deep peace of the twilight—he could see her through the half-drawn curtains where she sat, her head against his sister's knee, while the kind, matronly hand was stroking back the shining auburn hair from the girl's temples—Mildred's voice, so softly, saying:—

"And you will sometimes come to me, sister, will you not? It seems so strange that I shall have love given me—I, whom no one ever loved! You will teach me to be loving, good, and gentle like yourself? You will teach me to forget!"—

"What, dear child?" as the wistful eyes were suddenly hidden in the folds of her dress.

"All this dreary, dreary time," she answered.

"Shall not that be my brother's task?"

"How good, how good he is!" the sweet lips said, again, as on that other evening. And the listener turned and went his way.

She did not love him; that he had not dreamed. But he did dream his task should be accomplished—that she should forget "this dreary time," and learn to be happy, shaking off that strange, ungrish depression which touched him so in her. And, yet, against his breast the handkerchief was lying, wet with the bitter, wrathful, heart-wrung tears wept for another's falsehood, and almost still warm with the sighs in which she had wailed Vere's name, her face pressed down upon the hawthorn-checkered bank.

The marriage morning came, and Mildred stood before her mirror, flushing a brighter flush before the radiant loveliness reflected there.

"If he could see me!" she was saying to herself; and forthwith rose a vision of the quaint, old village church of Denton, sunshine streaming in a rosy flood through long, narrow, painted windows on her white-robed figure; while another—upon his bowed head should flit no ray in his dim, distant corner of the church, but to him be darkness without as within. No third form did she see. All else was misty and vague. Vague, even when Hugh's sister entered presently, and, with a smile of approval, laid her hand on Mildred's shoulder, saying, "Hugh had just arrived, and was so bent on seeing his bride that she must indulge him." Mildred followed in a dream, from which the opening and shutting of the library door failed to arouse her.

Radiant with the triumph of her vision in the church, she did not remember that she was alone with the man who, an hour hence, would be her husband. He turned from the window at the rustle of her dress. A tardy fear had struck him, which he was now here to solve. Was he taking advantage of her helplessness to bind her? Yet, surely, this brilliant creature was no victim adorned for the sacrifice?

"Mildred," he said, slowly, "I must have from your own lips the assurance that you do not fear to trust yourself to me. Even now it is not too late to draw back if you would. Do not think of me in this—or, rather, think of me, remembering that your happiness is mine. If even now you regret!"—

"Regret! Draw back!" An almost scornful emphasis was on the words, uttered in her sweet, clear, ringing tones. "Draw back!" and Arthur Vere believe it might be for his sake!

"Regret! Draw back!" The thrilling voice left no more room for whisperings of fear. His face changed rapturously, and he would have drawn her nearer, would have spoken, but the door swung open. A London friend of Sir Hugh's stood on the threshold, confounded at the bridal apparition. Mildred started, and vanished precipitately through the conservatory; while Sir Hugh, nothing disconcerted seemingly, advanced and gave his friend the hand he had held out to Mildred.

It seemed hardly a moment after that she was walking up the churchyard path, where yew-shades flickered on her floating veil, and the dank scent of rain-beaten grass and flowers, still wet in the shadow of the tombstones, blew chilly on her face through the lace folds. No shadow had darkened that face this morning hitherto. The keeping of her home, the gaining of a sister, the care which should henceforth surround her—all were dimmed, forgotten in the glow of pride and triumph as she thought of Arthur Vere. But now those visions faded out; and, as she glanced around, and saw how she was walking among graves, the color fled her cheek. The shadow of the great yew by the entrance porch, the chillness of the tombs—what was she doing?

Just overhead, upon the yew branch, that so nearly bent to touch her orange flowers, swayed and twittered a sparrow. A dim remembrance crossed her of a shelter where the little helpless and uncared-for sparrow might build her nest in safety. Was she wrong—poor, fluttering, scorned heart!—to nestle in the shelter she had found? The "No" to her tardy self-questioning did not come. All triumph died out. Entering the aisle she cast a shrinking glance around, and saw the thronged, familiar faces of the cottagers, gay and smiling on her over the huge nosegays one and all were wont to bear. There, too, were the young girls from the Grange, the old earl, and a few close friends of Sir Hugh's own; none else. No dark, lithe figure bowed down with remorse; no fiery eyes following her every movement with passionate regret; no lips that quivered, fain to speak, to claim her for his own, while she should sweep by, calm with scorn.

Instead, she glanced up to Sir Hugh, as they two stood together at the chancel railing. He was looking down upon her, with his whole soul in his eyes. For the first time she saw in his gaze a something more than charity, or the fullness of that charity which hopeth all things, trusteth all things. Was she betraying that trust? Giving nothing for everything? Dared she do it?

Dared she do it? The first solemn pause came after the words: "If any man can show just cause why they may not lawfully be joined together, let him now speak, or else hereafter forever hold his peace." Hugh Ravenstone stood erect, conscious of rectitude; but Mildred bowed and quivered, shuddering and white.

The second adjuration followed: "I require and charge you both, as ye will answer at the dreadful day of judgment, when the secrets of all hearts shall be disclosed, that, if either of you know any impediment why ye may not be lawfully joined together, ye do now confess it."

Mildred heard no more. She felt the spirit of the words, and knew that by that spirit she were perjured, keeping silence. There was that which Hugh Ravenstone might well hold an impediment between them. He might turn from her now, and she go forth into the world alone. What matter? She dared no longer deceive him. With every instant she grew deadlier white, and now she held to the chancel rail for support, shivering so that she could hardly stand. She raised her great, wide, frightened eyes to Hugh. There was none other in the church or in the world that moment for her, though before she had not so much as once remembered him. Hugh, watchful of all change in her, saw how the color went and came, and put his arm out. But she stayed him with a repellant gesture.

"Hear me first," she said, in tones that, despite their quivering, were clearly audible, and had in them the strength of her resolute mood. "Hugh Ravenstone, I have dealt untruly with you. There is an impediment between us. There is a heart once given to another man, and flung aside by him as nothing worth."

It was all over, and she trembled no more. She merely bowed down, covering her face, waiting till she should hear his footsteps leave her side; waiting till she should be left alone in the deserted church, when she might steal out unobserved. Whither she did not think or care; only never to her dear old home, never where familiar glance might seem to taunt her with her shame. She waited, but the footsteps did not stir. There was only a faint rustle through the awe-struck church, a fluttered breath of southernwood and thyme in the hundred rude nosegays. The place seemed heavy with it, and she gasped for air. A man's hand touched the braids of her bowed head.

She lifted it up slowly, slowly. Hugh's true eyes looked downward into hers. What had she done? The gray, bleak look upon his face smote her. The manly breast was heaving as with passionate struggle, and the firm lips set. She shrank away, shame-stricken at her work.

"Forgive, forgive!" she moaned, "and I will go, will never cross your path again."

With evident effort, he returned: "Mildred, you have told me all?"

"All. I dare not perjure myself."

"You love that man?" He spoke with greater effort still, and his voice sank, audible to her alone or to God's priest who stood so near.

"I do not love that man, Hugh Ravenstone." Her reply was audible enough, and she lifted herself haughtily.

One step and he was at her side. One movement and he grasped her hand.

"You have heard," he said, quietly, to the clergyman. "There is no impediment. You will proceed."

He did proceed, unhesitatingly, reading the two faces turned to him. His voice, more earnest than ever, was broken by the low sob of the bride, who leaned against her lover. And when the last words of the service were pronounced, she clasped both hands upon Hugh's arm, and looked up to him with flashing eyes.

"God has made one noble man," she said.

And she walked out proudly through the aisle and down the path among the graves, seeing none save her husband ; needing no sunbeam even underneath the yew-tree glooms, and in the shadow of the tombs.

They were bright days, those that followed that morning begun so drearily. Mildred's life had hitherto been bounded by the narrow Denton glen, shut in by Barking and his fellow mountains, as completely as was ever Rasselas within his Happy Valley. Her lonely life had known little change, save when new and then, in some escapade of her childhood or earlier girlhood, she had gone with her old nurse to the "knitting rounds," when man, woman, and child, among the peasantry assembled in some cottage to knit and tell old legends, and to sing their knitting-songs together. But now she saw beyond the mountains, and that "beyond" was surely a new world. Her utmost day-dream had been once to see the Tower of London. But now she went much farther, even across the channel—to Paris—and at last actually up the Rhine.

She had gazed eagerly up to the "Castled crag of Drachenfels ;" had listened to the syren echoes of the Lurlei Berg ; passed the ruined Schonberg Castle, where in the river's bed slept its seven fair countesses, all turned to stone for their stony-heartedness to faithful knights. And now she must also visit that crowning glory of the Rhine, its falls of Schaffhausen.

It was a jewelled crown indeed, as Mildred and her faithful knight, Sir Hugh, watched it one evening standing on a bridge which crossed from a wooded promontory to a slender tower on an insulated pile of rocks. There had been a thunder shower, from which she had sought refuge in the tower, and now she stood with Hugh upon the balcony and watched the misty rainbow spanning the river to the other shore, which stretches back in long and lofty undulating ranges. Three straight towering rocks uplift themselves in the fall of fifty feet, and the water dashes round and past them in great showers of spray that, as the setting sun breaks forth from clouds, flash out and crown the river with a gem-like glow and glitter. Mildred lingered, facing them, and glancing ever and anon up to the far-off mountains, when a voice below her startled her.

She could not see the speaker, for he must be on the bridge just under her balcony. But it was a man's voice, speaking English, and she once had listened for those tones too eagerly to be mistaken in them now. At first she flushed and drew herself up with a proud smile toward Hugh, who was looking down absently into the water. Upon her wedding morning she had wished for Arthur Vere's presence in the village church, simply because she longed to see in him some sign of wishing for the prize beyond his reach. But now his presence brought no such feeling ; brought only a glow of pride in the man at her side. With the instant, however, both glow and flush vanished. She remembered her confession to Hugh in the church, and she knew that he remembered it. He had borne himself toward her not like a man who has won, but rather as one who hardly yet begins to woo. He anticipated her every wish ; he walked, and rode, and talked with her ; but she often strove to check her growing liking for him, because she could not be sure that he felt more than kindly and generously toward her. "The hand of the giver is ever above that of the receiver ;" and Mildred's was so freighted down with his gifts that it could not steal up to meet his. As she thought over all this, she became nervously anxious that Hugh should not meet Arthur Vere ; and she was engrossed in thinking how a meeting could certainly be avoided ; so engrossed that Hugh observed she no longer took any interest in the scene around, and so he proposed to set forth on the return to Schaffhausen, which was more than a mile distant.

"Ah ! no, not yet," began Mildred. But then, as she heard a footstep ascending the flight of steps to the tower, she amended, hurriedly : "Yes, yes, let us go." And she put her arm in his, and drew him round the balcony in the opposite direction to those mounting steps.

She had grown so suddenly pale that Hugh stopped, anxiously.

"I was very wrong to linger here so long," he said, with concern. "You are really thoroughly chilled. What was I thinking of?"

"Of my pleasure, as usual," she said, smiling up at him.

For the first time, she saw another expression than the calm and friendly one she was accustomed to, in the eyes which met her own. The narrow stairs were reached just then ; were descended ; and, as he stopped to offer his arm again, he lifted the little ungloved hand and just touched it with his lips. But Mildred turned abruptly away ; so abruptly that he immediately believed she was offended. Without a word she passed on before him, never looking back nor pausing until she reached the end of the bridge. For there, close by the stairs, leaning on the railing of the bridge, and gazing over toward the falls, stood two Englishmen. Mildred's dress brushed against them in the straitened passage, and she needed but one glance at the face averted from her to tell her one was Arthur Vere. She passed unseen ; the peril was over, but she was deathly white as she stopped for Hugh to join her.

"Sir Hugh," she said, breathlessly, "cannot we go to Berne early to-morrow ? You know we were to see the Bears of Berne," she added, trying to smile.

Sir Hugh looked at her gracefully, and the words faltered on her lips. He too had observed the Englishman ; more, had observed Mildred's glance and manner in passing him. He needed not to be told who that man was, nor why Mildred was seized with so sudden a desire for visiting Berne, and for leaving Schaffhausen, where they had only that day arrived, and with which she had expressed herself so delighted as to be eager for a stay long enough thoroughly to explore.

But he only replied, "Certainly," to her tremulous question. And the next morning saw them on the way to Berne, while Arthur Vere was left behind, unconscious that Mildred had been near him.

Mildred congratulated herself upon her clever avoidance, and her presence of mind upon the bridge. So gay and bright she was now, and so at ease, that she did not think of closely observing Hugh, and never noticed that although he was still ready to follow her every whim, the zest of travel was over for him. He was not slow to second her movement at last toward home.

"That hawthorn copse, Mildred—it is that which breaks the view of picturesque little Denton. What do you say—shall I give orders to cut it down to-morrow when the shrubbery is trimmed?"

Hugh Ravenstone was just mounting his horse, and Mildred stood above him on the terrace. They had been pacing there together till the lengthening shadows warned him to use good speed if he would make his ride by set of sun. Yet he lingered unaccountably. Mildred's hands were full of bright October roses, and their breath was blown to him by the freshening breeze. Mildred herself was radiant as those roses—more radiant with a sudden flush, as she started at his words.

She hesitated, looking towards the hawthorn absently.

"Yes—no—yes, cut them down," she said. "Their blooming is long over, and—their blooming was not sweet, I think."

She watched him while he wheeled his horse round rapidly, and with a wave of the hand dashed off. And as she watched, vividly recurred the first time she had seen him ride away from Ravenstone Fell. She recalled her thoughts then, mockingly—"One might be a little proud of him, however." The words which now rose to her lips she stifled with a sigh.

She went within-doors to the library, no longer closed and dim, but with signs of life in books and music and sketches carelessly strewn on the tables; while upon the window ledge there sat a dainty work-basket with a half-mended riding glove of Hugh's. She arranged her flowers on his writing-table, idly whirled the leaves of his book lying open there, touched a cord or two on her piano. But all did not drive out the spirit of restlessness which possessed her, and she went out once more on the terrace to watch for Hugh's returning.

Up and down she strolled, with a strange sinking at the heart—a foreboding of she knew not what, which wearied for Hugh's homecoming. She mocked at herself for childishness, and tears stood in her eyes. She sauntered from the terrace down across the flowery slope, and struck into a path beside the hawthorn copse, which, in the summer and the early autumn rains and suns, had sprang up, arched above her head in wilder growth than ever, intergrown with longer, darker shades of sapling birch or ash. And on the other, the steep gorge of rocks, in the clefts of which the mountain cistus swayed, or crimson geranium found shelter by ferny mosses. Now and then an oak upreared its head just under Mildred's feet; and lower yet the gill was brawling.

This was but the second day since her return to Ravenstone from the prolonged bridal tour upon the Continent. She was truly glad to be at home again; but on this evening the past weighed upon her. Nearly eighteen months ago, just here in the gloaming, Arthur Vere had loitered by, admiring the sunset-view—had started when he saw her there, and had come and leaned beside her. Just here, too, upon the eve of her marriage, she had flung herself upon the sword, and wept and sobbed in bitterness of heart—not with love, but wrath, for him who had gone his way and left her to herself—not that the morrow would build up an everlasting wall of separation between him and her, but that she could not hope that wall would cast a chilling shade across his life. No sob, no tear, came now—no thought for shadow or for sunshine upon him. The only bitterness still in her heart was, that through him she had been forced to speak words which all this while stood between herself and Hugh. True, Hugh was ever gentle, thoughtful of her every wish. But he never forgot her avowal.

She sighed as she seated herself. The branches of the copse and of the trees on the ravine's farther brink, were rustling in the twilight breeze. But to her ear a louder rustling came. She glanced around. With just the bridge between herself and him, there stood a man. The branches threw dense shadows on him; yet she lifted herself to her full stature, and with very slightly heightened color, said:—

"Colonel Vere, I believe."

He crossed over hastily, and stood close by the stile in the full light of the last sunbeam. A dark, handsome man—a passionate face—waxing still more passionate before her.

"It is you! in the old place!" he cried, borne on past the bounds of prudence by the hurrying tide of memories.

"Why have you come here?" she asked.

"Mildred! can you ask?"

"I need not," she said, haughtily. "You have heard of the words I spoke before the altar. You have dared to dream I loved you still—and dreaming thus, have thought to enact an idyl underneath the hawthorn boughs, as once—”

“On my soul, you wrong me!” he broke in, paling even to the lips. “I did not hear of your return. I came here because—O Mildred, you would have some mercy, did you know how I have wrecked my whole life!”

“Was it your fault, mine is not also wrecked?”

“And are you happy, then?”

“No, Arthur Vere!” she cried out, hotly. “No. Although the memories you came to seek here, died long months ago; although I love my husband with a life-abiding love, before which such a dream as I dreamed here flits like the vision of a moment, I am not happy. Because the words which you forced from me on my marriage-day—”

She broke off in a storm of tears, and, sinking on the stile, crossed her arms there and bowed her head upon them.

The agony in his face was terrible. But he made no sign—only it seemed he could not drag himself away; could not withdraw his gaze, which, once removed, must never more rest on her.

For he had loved her all this while. That he had struggled against this love—had striven to convince himself that she would not remember the week’s trysting by the stile—had tried to turn to the fair heiress who could build again his fallen fortunes—that he had so striven, and so failed, was but in keeping with the character strong to feel and weak to will: and it brought its own most bitter punishment.

She was still weeping there, oblivious or careless of all presence save that of her own grief, when a firm, quick step approached along the lawn. Though Arthur Vere heard nothing, Mildred’s ear had far too often yearned and listened for that footstep, ever to be closed to it. She rose up, dashing the drops from her lashes, and when her husband stood beside her, she turned and put her arm in his.

“Colonel Vere,” she said, “let me present my husband. Sir Hugh, Colonel Vere is an old friend.”

Hugh Ravenstone colored angrily, for he was not slow to read the man before him. But he met his wife’s clear glance, uplifted. At once he advanced, still with her arm in his, and shook hands with the stranger, without shrinking or mistrust.

Arthur Vere, still deadly pale, with difficulty commanded himself so far as to apologize for his intrusion on the ground of ignorance of Sir Hugh’s and Lady Ravenstone’s return. Then followed sundry comments on the beauty of the evening and the scenery. And then he bowed and would have taken his departure.

But Mildred stayed him.

“Good-by!” she said, gently. “If you ever think again of Ravenstone Fell, think of it as you see it now—calm and peaceful through the twilight shades.”

“I will,” he said, hoarsely but firmly—wrung her offered hand, and forgetful of Sir Hugh, recrossed the bridge and plunged into the wood.

Hugh had been courteous as his wont, but his grave brow lightened when the young soldier disappeared. Mildred sank upon the stile again, as if she watched the shadows gathering and chasing one another through the dale. Not Arthur Vere had gazed on her with more of passionate yearning than this man, so calm and unimpassioned in her sight. The silence tortured him, and presently he said the dew was falling, and—

She interrupted.

“Sir Hugh, do you know who Colonel Vere is?”

Her voice, full of tears, her humble shrinking manner, moved him. In an instant he had thrown himself beside her on the stile.

“I would know only that which my little wife—my true, sweet girl!—would have me know. I trust her utterly.”

She kept away no more a downcast head; she turned and laid her two white hands upon his shoulder, looking in his eyes. But something she saw there, put to instant flight her hardihood. Her lashes drooped, quick flushes flitted after one another, and she stammered:—

“You trust me utterly?”

“Because I love you utterly.”

“Hugh—it cannot be!”

“And you?”

But what need to ask? One glance from the shy brown eyes, and they were hidden on his shoulder.

An hour later, when they reached the terrace, he paused, and again he said:—

“Mildred, that hawthorn copse—it breaks the view just there. Shall I give orders to-morrow—”

A rosy palm laid on the mocking lips.

“The hawthorn copse has blossomed for the first time this night, Hugh; and its blossoming is—”

“Sweet!”

SONNET—TO SUNSET.

BY C. E. L. HOLMES.

FROM Orient to Occident once more
The sun has whirled his blazing chariot rims;
And, now, his coursers bathe their wearied limbs
In that aerial jasper sea, which pours
Its baptism of golden spray sheer o’er
The crimsoned bastions of that high sea wall,
Upon the foreheads of the hills to fall.
Day passes outward through the jewelled doors;
And star-eyed twilight—timorous, dusky maid!—
Steals in, with backward glance and dainty tread,
Of e’en her own sweet, shadowy self afraid;
She dances coyly through the fading light,
To rest in the enamored arms of night.

SELF-EXAMINATION.

HUMAN nature, in all its various phenomena, has occupied the attention of the most learned moral philosophers, both of ancient and modern times; and after all their research and study it still remains a sealed book.

The mysterious combination of mind and matter, the motives of action, must always remain a problem, never to be solved till we bow before the throne of Him, "in whom we live and move, and have our being." The most accurate knowledge of human nature, at which we are permitted to arrive, is probably derived from a thorough investigation of our own hearts; for, "as in water face answereth to face, so the heart of man to man." Thus, by a strict examination of ourselves, we can judge more justly of other men's characters. This, of itself, is very advantageous to us in our intercourse with the world, enabling us to exercise an influence over the minds and actions of men, which we could not otherwise attain. The power thus obtained, is invaluable, both to the philanthropist and to the votary of the world.

In the social circle, where the softer feelings of our nature are supposed to prevail, one, who has a nice perception of the secret operations of the inner man, can, by soothing words and gentle smiles, illumine the cloud with which sorrow has draped its victim. And this influence can be duly appreciated by the manly heart, which has been bowed down by the frequent disappointments in the battle of life, and is taught by it to look upwards to the image of Hope, beckoning him to more enduring efforts.

The corrupt and designing man, too, derives peculiar advantages from the exercise of this power. He is much more likely to succeed in his dark plots and nefarious schemes by so intimate an acquaintance with the ground which he has to traverse. But as this is the abuse, rather than the use, of self-examination, and the close inspection of such a career would be revolting to the purer feelings of our nature, it will be best to pass it over, without further remark. It has been the habit of great and good men, throughout all ages, to indulge in this practice. The Psalmist says, "I will commune with my own heart, upon my bed."

There is nothing better calculated to elevate us in the scale of being than this habit of self-examination. The contemplative man can scarcely be oblivious to the immense disparity that exists between himself and the most imperfect celestial beings, of which any knowledge has been vouchsafed to us. This reflection should arouse to action any mind at all imbued with a desire of improvement, and should have a tendency to strengthen his endeavor to rise above the low standard of human perfection. When we behold the dignity of virtue, we feel more inclined to regulate our lives according to the precepts of the divine Philosopher, and to emulate, in our degree, the purity of the angels.

But how few of us are even willing to deal ingenuously with our own souls! Who is willing to take a brilliant action to the caverns of his heart, and there, disrobed of its attractive attire, behold it in its new deformity? The world, with its syren voice, applauds, and its pleasant smile greets us, and we would fain believe that it is "an offering worthy of Heaven." But in self-examination the plain story is told. There is no flattering deceit available here. Conscience points to the base, selfish motive that prompted us to action, and the blush of shame involuntarily mantles the cheek of the world's hero. "What in me is dark, illumine; what is low, raise and support," might well be the prayer, arising from such a heart, to the throne of the Eternal. To the good man, self-examination is a source of most sustaining comfort; for, where he has erred, he makes resolutions of amendment, and he knows where to procure the necessary strength to resist evil and to do good. Thus, knowing the sincerity of his own heart, "he lies down to pleasant dreams," amidst the tumult of this restless world.

VENTURES.

BY MARY E. NEALY.

I.

OUR ships sailed out on a summer's day,

Willie's, and Tom's, and mine,
And they parted each on a separate way
Across the glittering brine.

Willie's was lost in the deep mid-sea,
Tom's on a foreign strand,
And mine alone, of all the three,
Came back to our native land.

And mine alone came back again,
But tattered, and broken, and old;
And I learned how the dreams of youth are vain,
And how little that gleams is gold.

II.

We set our hearts afloat one night—
Afloat upon Love's dear stream,
While Hope shone out for a beacon light,
Like the starlight in a dream.

Willie's came back with another as pure;
Poor Tommy's was cast away;
While mine, ah! I cannot say, I'm sure,
That I never have rued the day.

But ships will venture the treacherous wave
For the chance of a golden prize;
And Love—it will risk an early grave
For the light of answering eyes.

POLITENESS.—He that is truly polite knows how to contradict with respect, and to please without adulation; and is equally remote from an insipid complaisance, and a low familiarity.

WORK DEPARTMENT.

CHILDREN'S CLOTHING.

CLOTHING FOR A GIRL EIGHT YEARS OF AGE.

(For Figs. 1, 2, and 3, referred to, see last month.)

Dress and Tunic.—It is very usual now for little girls to wear frocks of two colors, or black and a color, and consisting of body, tunic, and petticoat. These skirts are entirely gored, and have no plaits at the waist. Fig. 4 is an illustration of one made of black vel-

Fig. 4.

Fig. 7.

veteen and blue Cashmere. The petticoat has four entirely gored widths, cut like Figs. 2 and 3, and a front width gored away each side till it is as narrow at the top as at the side gores (see Fig. 5). The side gores are joined on to the front, as shown in Fig. 1, and the slopes meet at the back, as shown in Fig. 6. When completed, it must not measure more than twenty-six inches round the waist. The back can be left partly open as a placket hole, and here it must have false hems of the material, cut on the straight, of ribbon. A false hem is a piece run on the right side, turned over, and hemmed down on the wrong side like a real hem. To strengthen placket and pocket holes in children's dresses, put a transverse piece of ribbon or tape, as shown at A in Fig. 7, on the wrong side, and hem it down neatly and strongly. Also make a loop and overcast it at B. Cut a lining for the gored breadths of the petticoat in gray twilled calico. Tack each breadth of Cashmere to a corresponding breadth of lining; then stitch them together, and overcast the wrong side—it is lined to allow it to bear the weight of the flounce; hem the bottom. Cut a number of pieces on the cross of the Cashmere nine inches wide, for the flounces, and join the breadths. It may be hemmed or bound with black velvet at the lower edge. Finely plait all the length at the top, and afterwards arrange it on the skirt with pins, and finally neatly stitch it all round, or run it merely at the top. Before plaiting it, tack down about half an inch all round the top. Put the waist of the petticoat into a two-inch wide band, or sew it to a body made of gray Derry. The latter is very preferable, because skirts on bands drag round the waists of children, and spoil their figures. Put no sleeves to the Derry body, and merely hem the neck and armholes narrowly. The length of each breadth of the skirt is twenty-six inches; half an inch of this is allowed to turn in at the waist and one inch for the hem. When finished, it should measure ninety-four inches all round the hem of the skirt and twenty-six round the waist. If it is a little fuller in the waist, make a few plaits at the back. The flounce, when completed, is seven inches wide. From the waist of the skirt to the top of the flounce should measure seventeen and a half inches, when complete.

The tunic is either cut in the same way in gored breadths, or, if the velveteen is wide enough, is cut out in one like a cape. The gored skirt of the petticoat should be folded in half, the fold coming at the back seam and down the front. Lay it on paper, and cut out the pattern. Newspapers may be joined with pins when not large enough, and afterwards tacked together with needle and thread. Cut the pattern double in newspaper, make it eight inches shorter than the petticoat, by cutting off the lower part. It then serves to spread on the velveteen as a pattern. The tunic looks best if cut wide enough at the waist behind to allow all that part to be gathered which joins to the back of the body; but it may be plain all round. The tunic measures sixteen inches long. Down the centre of the front it must be exactly on the straight of the material. Cut out the turrets as shown in Fig. 4. They are each three inches long and three wide, making three-inch wide tabs. See that one comes exactly in the centre of the front, and that they meet well behind. If the skirt is in breadths, the breadths must be joined before these tabs are cut. There is also a space of exactly three inches between each tab. Run a half-inch wide strip of black muslin lining, cut on the cross, on the right side all round the edge of these tabs, very easily; turn it over on the wrong side, and hem it down. If it will not stretch enough to be flat, it must be snipped at the corners. A better way is to tack a four-inch wide strip of soft black Victoria lawn all along the right side of the tabs or turrets. Run the tabs all round to this. Then cut out the lining between the tabs. Untack it; turn it on the wrong side; tack it down again, and finally hem it. The tabs are handsomely trimmed all round with narrow braid and jet beads.

Fig. 9.

Fig. 8 shows the front of the body of black velveteen. From A to B the waist is twelve inches; from C to A, the side, it is fourteen inches; D to D, the dotted line of the neck, is seventeen inches; E to E, the square of the neck, is eight inches; F to F, the dotted line which shows the length of the brace, is twelve inches. The brace comes to the top of the shoulder seam; it is not carried behind. The back, Fig. 9, measures from G to H, the dotted line at the neck, nine inches; from H to L, the length of the back, nineteen inches; from J to L, the waist, seven inches. This does not allow for turnings. It will be noticed that, although the back of the neck is cut square in shape, it is very much higher than the front. Fig. 10 is the shape for the brace, twelve inches long from A to B. When the pattern of the body is cut out, the braces are lined (the shape must be reversed for the two sides) with Victoria lawn. Trim them by a pattern with narrow braid and jet beads. The braces are then to be joined to the body by the dotted line, shown in Fig. 8, taking corresponding slopes both sides. The wrong side of the brace is first tacked and then stitched to the right side of the body, and turned over. This is accomplished by rounding both conveniently over the hand. Tack the brace at the shoulder to the front of the body and also at the waist. Then join the backs and fronts of the body, stitching the sides and shoulders, and hemming the back full an inch broad. No allowance was made for this hem in the size. Next pipe the waist, using black silk or satin; then pipe the neck. It is better not to hem down the piping, but leave it raw and narrow, and run a ribbon or a tape over it. Children's dresses are better without bones at eight years of age; otherwise bone casings are run on before the pipings. Pipe the armhole.

Fig. 10.

Next cut the sleeve by Fig. 11. From A to B this measures eighteen inches long, and from C to D eleven and a half. It may be cut in two pieces, and joined together. One piece is hollowed by the dotted line from A to C. The rounded side is put to the top in stitching it in, and the seam an inch behind the shoulder seam. Pipe the cuff, and line it a few inches up with black silk or satin. Braid and bead it to correspond with the tunic. Round the neck of the dress a deep lace is tacked inside, and drawn round the throat by a narrow ribbon. The braces cover the tops of the sleeves like epaulettes. A handsome blue sarcenet sash completes this pretty costume. The shoes should be blue or trimmed with blue bows.

A charming summer dress can be made like Fig. 12. The measurements and pattern may easily be taken from the previous costume. The under-skirt and low body is of silk; any color, or even black, may be used. A light grayish sage-green is pretty. The skirt is quite plain, and gored like Fig. 1, with plain back breadths. Over this is a fine sprigged book muslin tunic. It is gored first like the front breadth in Fig. 1. (A), but wide enough at the top of the waist to go from one side-seam of the body to the other; the slope in the skirt, of course, proportionate. It is hollowed out at the waist to sit well, and scalloped at the hem.

Fig. 12.

Fig. 13.

Fig. 13 is an illustration of it. Cut the pattern first in tissue paper, try it on the child over the silk skirt, and make any necessary alteration. It is to cover the front like an apron, A and A forming a seam straight from the side-seam of the body down the skirt as shown at B in Fig. 12. The back is a single straight breadth, rounded at the lower part from C to C, see Fig. 14. From D to C, each side, it must be the same length as from B to A, in Fig. 13; but it hangs much longer in the centre, from E to F. Join these two breadths at the side by a mantuamaker's seam; hen all round the lower edge very narrowly indeed, and neatly sew on an inch-wide insertion and a narrower edge, both Valenciennes lace. Gather the back breadth, without turning down the edge, from D to D, having first made a placket-hole at E. Set the waist into a very narrow band, hemmed over it both sides. Cut the bodice, by the help of a low body pattern, in the way shown in Fig. 15; the dotted lines represent the corslet, now to be cut from the muslin. The body of the tunic is a good guide for this one, and can be cut away in the manner shown in Fig. 15. Make a very narrow hem round the top, after joining the sides and shoulders, and run the insertion over the muslin, not beyond it, as in the skirt. Hem the waist, and fasten it to the skirt-band. A handsome sash of a corresponding color to the dress is worn over this, and bows on the shoulders and on the skirt, as in Fig. 12. As an out-door dress in summer, a short loose jacket, cut up in the centre of the back a few inches, completes the costume. Place a ribbon bow at the neck. The hat should be white, of a color like the dress. We shall shortly give directions for making a mantle.

Fig. 15.

The articles on dress-making, which will be published in future papers, will be a great assistance in the making of the clothing of children over four years of age, because the principles are generally the same in regard to the rules and methods of cutting and placing.

KNITTED BERCEAUNETTE COVER.

THIS cover is knitted with white, blue, pink, red, and black wool, and fine wooden knitting needles. Cast on eight stitches, and knit a strip as long as you wish the cover to be, in plain knitting, and always with wool of two colors; for instance, white and blue, white and pink, black and red, or two shades of one color. When you have worked a sufficient quantity of strips, join them together from illustration, passing one strip alternately over the next one, and under it, alternating the colors. On each square place a silk button or a small tuft of white wool. Then work a fringe for the cover. Our pattern consists of chain-stitch loops of two colors, finished off with small tassels. Any other fringe you prefer can be worked round the cover.

CROCHET SQUARE.

(See Plate Printed in Blue, in Front of Book.)

THIS crochet square, which imitates darned netting, forms a pretty cover for a toilet pin-cushion; arranged with other squares, it makes a handsome couvrette, or antimacassar. The original pattern is worked with crochet cotton, in rows backwards and forwards. The raised pattern in the centre is sewn upon the grounding when completed.

GARTER AND INITIALS IN EMBROIDERY.

MADE of fine cloth, and ornamented with chain-stitch in different colors.

LEAD CUSHION FORMING A WORK-BAG.

THIS lead cushion consists of a deal box seven inches long, four inches and four-fifths wide, two inches high. On the bottom of the box place a flat piece of lead two-fifths of an inch thick, then cover the box on the out and inside with calico, then with green silk. The plaited on the other side. The sewing-on of the ruche is covered with green silk cord.

WALL BASKET.

A WALL basket of willow work is the foundation. It is lined at the back with bright scarlet silk. The drapery shown in the full size in cover consists of a thin piece of deal, covered inside with calico and green silk, and quilted on the outside. It is then covered with green silk, and ornamented in the manner seen in il-

Fig. 2 is of scarlet velvet, with a little embroidered medallion, worked with floss silk on white satin. The draperies should be pinked, according to design, and embroidered with purple silk.

ustration with flowers of green purple silk worked in satin stitch. Then sew the cover on to the box; ornament the edge of a box with a ruche of green silk ribbon, edged on one side with white guipure lace, and box-

A gold braid is sewn on above the scallops. The basket is also ornamented with ruche trimmings. Two designs in the proper size are given in Figs. 3 and 4. Fig. 3 is made of scarlet silk, with a satin rouleau and knots.

Fig. 3.

Fig. 4

Fig. 4 is of ribbon, of two widths. The arrangements of ribbon and cord, with tassels, by which our model is suspended, is very tasteful, and should be carefully copied from the design.

COVER FOR INFANT'S PILLOW.

This cover is of muslin, trimmed on the edges with an embroidered ruffle an inch and a half wide, and on the upper part in the manner shown by the illustration, with plaited strips half an inch wide, which are worked in button-hole stitch on the edges, and headed by strips of muslin a fifth of an inch wide stitched down. This trimming is edged along the sides with tatted insertion an inch wide underlaid with ribbon, and again edged on the outside with a plaited ruffle; both these are also headed by stitched strips of muslin. Cut of muslin one piece of double material from engraving, and of the same another piece sixteen inches and a half long and seventeen inches wide; then cut of single muslin two pieces each sixteen inches and a half long and eight inches and a half wide. Having hemmed these latter pieces on one side and on the ends, bind the other side between the double material of the other piece. Furnish the hemmed sides with several tapes, by means of which they are fastened. Run the edges together on the remaining rounded edges, sewing in the ruffle at the same time. Then arrange the trimming on the upper layer of the smaller upper piece in the manner shown by the illustration, run the edges together, and join the under edge of the upper part with the principal part, fastening in a ruffle at the same time. On the upper corners of the upper piece, and on the corresponding places in the under piece, sew on tapes, by means of which the over piece is tied on.

VISITING CARD BASKET.

THIS tasteful basket, which not only serves its purpose as a receptacle for visiting cards, but would also prove an ornament to any drawing-room, is formed principally of crystal beads. Of course, it is impossible in the design to give the brilliant effect of the reality, but our readers may believe us when we assure them the result of carrying out this triumph of bead-work is charming.

Begin with the foundation. Form five strong rings of iron wire. For the relative sizes we refer you to the illustration. The foundation is surrounded by scallops, also formed of wire, adorned with strings of crystal beads. The outer and under scallops are twelve in number. The wire of which they are formed is bound round with cotton, and then surrounded with beads strung on white silk. A section of the basket, Fig. 1, gives better directions (as to the manner in which wire is either threaded with crystal beads or surrounded by beads already strung on strong silk) than mere written explanations can convey.

Both the foundation and the sides of the basket are supported by staves (straight wire), covered with crystal beads. The illustrations must serve as guides for the use of the larger or smaller beads, and the thick or slighter wire. This visiting basket should only be undertaken by those who have talent, ambition, and a decided taste for fancy work.

SALADS AND SALAD MAKING.

THE art of making a salad is one of those attributes with which every person credits himself, whereas, in truth, it is possessed by a very small number of the favored few. The English, as a rule, are as crude and coarse in their salads as in their cooking. A hard, overgrown cos lettuce, some tough, pungent, fibrous, or woolly radishes, a few onions, and a bunch of watercress put into a dish, with some common malt vinegar, pepper, mustard, and salt, constitute to the majority of English people the beau idéal of a salad. We would as soon graze with Nebuchadnezzar, or turn ruminant at once.

There are, however, salads, and salads graduating from the simple repast got together extemporaneously to the most elaborately prepared viands, culminating in the glories of a delicious lobster salad. Even the simplest form of salad admits of preparation on several different principles. Our own method is diametrically opposed to the common practice, but let our readers give it a trial; they can but return to the other system if they do not like our directions.

The ordinary plan may be exemplified by the following directions for a lettuce salad: Wash and pick two or three well-bleached lettuces, taking off the outer leaves; then dry them well in an open wicker-work basket, swinging it to and fro at arm's length to get rid of the water, and cut them across a few times (not very small); mix a saltspoonful of salt into a tablespoonful of vinegar until dissolved, and pour it over the salad, adding half a spoonful more of vinegar to suit the palate if desired; then pour in three tablespoonfuls of Lucca oil, sprinkle a little pepper over this, and mix the whole with a wooden spoon and fork, and keep turning the salad over and over as you mix it, until it has well imbibed all the ingredients. A few nasturtium flowers are often added, which give a far more pleasant zest than Cayenne pepper; watercresses, or mustard and cress, may be introduced if agreeable. In this plan the vinegar is first added to the washed salad, and a large amount of stirring is required to diffuse the oil, so that the salad should not taste oily.

Our system is the opposite. The lettuce should not be washed if the process can be dispensed with; but if necessary each leaf should be separately wiped, cut up, and put into the bowl; now add the oil, and stir until each portion is covered with a thin film; then stir together in your salad spoon the salt, vinegar (which should be real French), pepper, and a little powdered white sugar, without which no good salad was ever made. Add these to your lettuce, stir, eat, and be thankful.

If you like additional flavors, they may be added. Mustard may be mixed with the vinegar, and Cayenne used with or instead of common pepper. The remotest suspicion of scraped onion may be added—not large slices, which will make you odoriferous for a week, and other vegetables, as beetroot, cresses, lamb's lettuce, etc., may be introduced, but let the grand principle still remain, namely, that the salad be dry, and that the oil be universally diffused before the vinegar is added. By so doing the salad is never greasy, and the vinegar and other adjuncts preserve their true flavor, not being absorbed by the vegetables. So much for the preparation of a simple salad.

Mayonnaise Salad Dressing.—Beat up well the yolks of two fresh raw eggs, a teaspoonful of salt, and Cayenne to taste; mix with this by slow degrees four tablespoonfuls of oil, till it is about the consistence of cream, and then stir in gradually two tablespoonfuls of Chili or tarragon vinegar. This excellent sauce is frequently used for meat or fish salads; like all salad sauces, it requires great care in mixing.

PEAS AND THEIR PREPARATIONS.

GREEN peas, the most delicious of vegetables, are now coming into season. Every one knows how to cook them, although, after cooking them, some spoil them by the addition of melted instead of plain butter. The ingenuity of French cooks has devised many other modes of preparing peas in addition to the plain boiling. Some of these may be new to many of our readers, and others may like to try them. We therefore subjoin a few French receipts:—

Peas à la Bourgeoise.—Put your peas, which should not be old, into a clean stewpan with butter, in the proportion of half a pound to a quart of peas; add the heart of a good large lettuce, a bunch of parsley, a few small onions, and a pinch of salt; let them stew together slowly till done; thicken before serving with a little butter and flour; add a little white sugar in powder, and serve. Some cooks thicken with the yolks of two eggs instead of flour.

Petits Pois au Lard.—Fry thin bacon in small pieces in a stewpan. Moisten with a little water or sour stock; put the peas into this with some white onions, the heart of a lettuce, and a bunch of herbs; simmer till done, then take off the fat and serve.

Another.—Fry some fat bacon cut in dice; drain your peas well, after washing them; put them into a stewpan with a piece of fresh butter; let them heat, then add a little stock; put in your bacon in dice, add a bunch of parsley and thyme, pepper and salt; put them on a quick fire, and let the fire diminish so as to stew them slowly until done enough; skim your sauce, take out the parsley. Serve.

Purée of Peashells for Soup.—The French even utilize the shells of the common pea when young and green. They carefully reject all the damaged shells, wash the remainder carefully, and boil them in water until tender. They are then pulped through a cullender, which is most conveniently done by using a coarse-holed cullender first, and then a finer one. The purée is then flavored, and used either with or without some peas as stock for vegetable soup.

VIRTUES OF BORAX.

It may not be generally known how very valuable borax is in various purposes of household use. We find it the very best cockroach exterminator yet discovered. One half-pound, costing but fifty cents, has completely cleared a large house formerly swarming with them, so that the appearance of one in a month is quite a novelty. The various exterminating powders puffed and advertised have been found not fully effective, tending rather to make the roaches crazy than to kill them. There is something peculiar either in the smell or touch of borax, which is certain death to them. They will flee in terror from it, and never appear again where it has once been placed. It is also a great advantage that borax is perfectly harmless to human beings; hence no danger from poisoning. It is also valuable for laundry purposes. The washerwomen of Holland and Belgium, so proverbially clean, and who get their linen so beautifully white, use refined borax as washing-powder instead of soda, in the proportion of a large handful of borax powder to ten gallons of water. They save soap nearly one-half. All the large washing establishments adopt the same mode. For laces, cambrics, etc., an extra quantity of powder is used; and for crinolines, (requiring to be made stiff) a stronger solution is necessary. Borax, being a neutral salt, does not in the slightest degree injure the texture of linen. Its effect is to soften the hardest water, and therefore it should be kept on the toilet-table. As a way of cleaning the hair nothing is better than a solution of borax in water. It leaves the scalp in a most cleanly condition, and the hair is just sufficiently stiffened to retain its place. This stiffness, however, can be readily removed, if objectionable, by washing with water. Borax is also an excellent dentifrice; dissolved in water, it is one of the best tooth-washes. In hot countries it is used, in combination with tartaric acid and bicarbonate of soda, as a cooling beverage.

MISCELLANEOUS COOKING.

Calf's Liver and Bacon.—This is commonly tossed in butter, the liver sliced moderately thin, is first dressed, and the rashers of bacon afterwards; serve garnished with the latter. Calf's liver may also be fried; dip the slices into seasoned beaten egg and olive oil, and fry quickly. In France, similarly shaped pieces of liver and bacon are skewered together, then dipped into oil, and subsequently sprinkled with bread-crumbs, and broiled; season and serve. When tossed without the bacon, a glass of wine may be poured into the pan, and served in the dish, with the liver arranged round.

Cooking New Potatoes.—New potatoes, when they first appear, are considered a delicacy, though not so wholesome as the old, unless they are perfectly ripe, and can be cooked without being made waxy. If they are plainly boiled, a sprig of mint will be found a most pleasant addition. The following is an excellent though more elaborate way of dressing them: Choose the potatoes as nearly of a size as possible; wash them, and rub off the outer rind; then wipe them dry with a clean napkin. Put a quarter of a pound of fresh butter into a stewpan; set it on the fire, and when it boils, throw in the potatoes. Let them boil in the butter till they are done, taking care to toss them every now and then, so that they may all go successively into the boiling butter. They must be carefully watched, because if done too much, they shrivel up and become waxy. When the fork indicates that they are done, they must be taken out before they lose their crispness, put into a dish, and some salt sprinkled over them. As soon as they are taken from the boiling butter, a handful of parsley may be thrown into it, and, after it has had a boil or two, laid upon the potatoes as a garnish. They must be eaten immediately. This is a beautiful dish to serve up with fish, or it may be eaten alone. The butter in which the potatoes were dressed may be poured into a jar, and serve again for the same purpose. Old potatoes may be cut into round pieces about the size of a large walnut, and dressed in the same way.

Curries.—With Oriental people it is mutton; with the French it is veal; and with the English it is chicken, which most frequently forms dishes of curry. Rabbit, too, is particularly good curried; but it is an unpardonable error to make use of flour in the composition of this dish. When cold meat is warmed up as a curry, it is only requisite to cut it up, and toss it in butter, then pour in some curry, mixed in either wine, gravy, milk, or lemon-juice and water. It may subsequently be thickened with tomato sauce, yolks of eggs, or cream. Fried onions, apples, or cucumbers are often added. Serve surrounded with capscums or other strongly spiced pickles. For a curry made with meat not previously dressed: first, toss in butter some neat rashers of bacon; when done, take them up and put in the meat, which should be cut into moderately-sized pieces; if a rabbit or a fowl, the thick parts of the joints should have the flesh scored across; toss it till done, then pour in the curry, mixed as above directed; replace the bacon, stir it about till the meat is well colored, and dish it up with the sauce poured over it. There are no fixed rules for the quantity of curry to be used; tastes differing and the strength of the powder varying; but it should always be piquante in flavor. A few chopped pickles, such as gherkins, shalots, etc., are an advisable addition.

Tomato Soup.—Slice two onions, and fry them in butter until brown; then fry two dozen tomatoes just sufficiently to heat them through, and put them into a stewpan with their gravy and the onions, adding a head of celery and a carrot sliced; stew these gently for half an hour. Add three pints of gravy, and stew for an hour and a half; then pulp the whole of the vegetables through a sieve, season with white pepper, salt, and Cayenne, and serve with toasted bread cut in dice.

Scrambled Eggs.—Break four eggs into a saucepan into which a large pat of butter has been thrown, and keep stirring the whole until they are cooked, which will be in a few minutes. You will know when they are done by their appearance, as they will get into lumps. Some buttered toast should be ready on which to spread the eggs, and then pepper and salt them. Some people add the latter while cooking. They are easily prepared, and very good.

Ham Toast.—Chop some lean ham fine, put it in a pan, with a little pepper, a lump of butter, and two eggs beaten; when well warmed, spread on hot buttered toast, and serve.

Hashed Mutton.—The remains of cold roast shoulder or leg of mutton, six whole peppers, six whole allspice, a faggot of savory herbs, half a head of celery, one onion, two ounces of butter, flour. Cut the meat in nice even slices from the bones, trimming off all superfluous fat and gristle; chop the bones and fragments of the joint, put them into a stewpan with the pepper, spice, herbs, and celery; cover with water, and simmer for one hour. Slice and fry the onion of a nice pale-brown color, dredge in a little flour to make it thick, and add this to the bones, etc. Stew for a quarter of an hour, strain the gravy, and let it cool; then skim off any particle of fat, and put it, with the meat, into a stewpan. Flavor with ketchup, tomato sauce, or any flavoring that may be preferred, and let the meat gradually warm through, but not boil, or it will harden. To hash meat properly, it should be laid in cold gravy, and only left on the fire just long enough to warm through.

Apple Trifle. (A Supper Dish.)—Ten good-sized apples, the rind of half a lemon, six ounces of pounded sugar, half a pint of milk, half a pint of cream, two eggs, whipped cream. Peel, core, and cut the apples into thin slices, and put them into a saucepan with two tablespoonfuls of water, the sugar, and minced lemon-rind. Boil all together until quite tender, and pulp the apples through a sieve; if they should not be quite sweet enough, add a little more sugar, and put them at the bottom of the dish to form a thick layer. Stir together the milk, cream, and eggs, with a little sugar, over the fire, and let the mixture thicken, but do not allow it to reach the boiling-point. When thick, take it off the fire; let it cool a little, then pour it over the apples. Whip some cream with sugar, lemon-peel, etc., the same as for other trifles; heap it high over the custard, and the dish is ready for table. It may be garnished as fancy dictates, with strips of bright apple jelly, slices of citron, etc.

Buttered Eggs.—Beat together the yolks and whites of four or five eggs, put a quarter of a pound of butter into a basin, and put that in boiling water, continuing to stir the butter till it is melted; then put the melted butter and the eggs into a saucepan. Keep a basin in one hand, and hold the saucepan with the other over a slow part of the fire, shaking it one way; as it begins to warm, pour it into the basin and back, then again hold it over the fire, keeping it stirring in the saucepan and pouring into the basin, more perfectly to mix the eggs and butter, until they are quite hot without boiling. Serve on toasted bread, or in a sauce tureen to eat with salt fish.

Carrot Preserve.—To make carrot jam, boil some carrots till quite tender, and rub them through a sieve. To one pound of the pulp add three-quarters of a pound of loaf sugar; boil it to a jam, and when nearly cold, add the juice and grated rinds of two lemons and half a teaspoonful of essence of cloves. The latter may be omitted if the flavor is not agreeable. For Carrot Marmalade: Well wash and scrape some carrots, cut them into pieces of about two inches in length, and put them into a pan with only as much water as will prevent the contents from burning. Cover them close, and let them stew over a moderate fire until they are quite tender; then mash them thoroughly and pass them through a hair sieve. Prepare and clarify a syrup, using for every pound of pulp a pound of sifted sugar, and half a pint of water; clarify it, and boil it up until it adheres to the spoon; put in the pulp, and boil it up until it forms a fitting marmalade; then put it into pots.

ECONOMY DISHES.

Old Mush.—Cut it in thin slices, and fry brown; serve with syrup or molasses.

Pie Crust, left over.—When any is left after baking, work in all the flour possible, and form it in crackers.

Remnants of Preserves, to use to advantage.—When several jars of preserves have been opened, and a little of each left without being enough of one kind for a dish, mash and cook them down to a jam with the syrups, and use the jam for tarts, or save the syrups to put in pudding sauces, and make jam of the fruit only.

Cold Potatoes.—These can be prepared in many different forms; the best are fried, broiled, and in hashes.

Cold Corn.—Grate it, and make in cakes with egg and a little flour, fry brown.

Cold Peas.—Mash them; boil cream and thicken with peas, or make a soup with water and butter thickened with peas; beans can be used in the last-described manner.

Cold Egg Plant.—Egg plant can be heated over, as also squash, turnips, onions; beets are better used cold. Parsnips are better heated the second time than the first; cold sweet potatoes are nice fried or broiled; soup, if not left in iron, can be warmed several times, but to be kept sweet long, it must either be heated boiling hot each day, or be kept very cold.

Dry Bread.—When bread has accumulated and there is danger of losing it, it is well to make a plain beef soup, and boil in it as much bread as the family will use. Bread left from the table each day should be thoroughly dried, and kept in a dry place, where it can neither mould nor contract unpleasant tastes. For dressings, thoroughly dried bread is much better than when only moderately dry or stale.

Rusked Bread.—Dry and brown very gradually slices of old bread; it should be browned through without scorching; pound it in a mortar until as fine as Indian meal; use in it milk as a meal for children or lunch for adults. Use with clams, fish, cutlets; to thicken soups, in scalloped fish, or dressings for geese, duck, or pigeons. Dried bread without browning is nice for scalloped oysters, to make griddle cakes and puddings, etc.

CONTRIBUTED.

Rhubarb Pie.—Cut the stalks into small pieces, and stew them soft in a small quantity of water. When sufficiently done, sweeten with sugar, and allow them to cool. Then bake as we do other pies in two crusts of rich paste. They should be used the same day they are cooked, for after the first day they become insipid.

Chf's Foot Jelly.—To five quarts of jelly put two pounds of loaf sugar, one quart of Maderia wine, one glassful of good vinegar; lemon-juice, mace, and cinnamon to taste.

Red Currant Wine.—To eight quarts of currants put one quart of water, press and strain, and put three pounds and three-quarters of sugar to one gallon of juice. Let it set twenty-four hours. Skim and fill the demijohns. Do not boil it at all. It can be used in a month. Wine made from this receipt took the premium at Lynchburg Fair in 1860. It was made by my friend, Mrs. Col. T. F. M., of Bedford Co., Va.

Gems or Breakfast Cakes.—One pint of sweet milk, two eggs, one teaspoonful of salt, one of baking powder, flour to make to the consistency of sponge cake. Bake in small cake rounds. Splendid. Mrs. A. V.

Marble Cake (Black Part).—Two cups of brown sugar, one of molasses, one of butter, the yolks of seven eggs, two tablespoonfuls of cinnamon, two of cloves, two of allspice, one nutmeg, one teaspoonful of black pepper, half a cup of sour cream, half a teaspoonful of soda, five and a half cups of flour. White Part.—Two cups of white sugar, one of butter, half a cup of sour cream, the whites of seven eggs, two teaspoonfuls of cream of tartar, one of soda, three cups and a half of flour, and lemon to taste. Put one layer of black, and then one of white, and put black upon white, and white upon black. There is another way to put it. Take a spoon and run it round with either that you want, black or white; and then, if it is black, put white on top. That makes a very nice cake, too. Mrs. N. B. D.

Pearl Starch Cakes.—Two cups of white sugar, two of butter, one and a half of pearl starch, one and a half of flour, the whites of eight eggs, one cup of sweet milk, and three teaspoonfuls of baking powder. Starch to be rolled fine and mixed with flour. Stir the butter and sugar together, stir the whites of the eggs to a stiff froth, add milk, then other ingredients; flavor to suit taste, and bake in a slow oven. M. E. F.

Scotch Mince Collops.—Take any quantity of good beef off the round, and chop it up very finely with a mincing knife on a block; it cannot be minced too fine; season with black and Jamaica pepper and salt to taste. Mince some onions, and add to it. Put it into a large stewpan, adding a little water, and dredging in some flour. Then take a collop mincer, which is a piece of wood about twelve inches deep, and four across, with the end sharpened, and beat the collops for a few minutes till they do not cling together; then cover them, and let them slowly stew. About four pounds would take half an hour to cook in this manner. Toast some bread, and cut in diamonds; put the collops on a large dish, and lay the toast all round the edge of the dish. A few poached eggs laid on top is an improvement. If desired, a little mushroom ketchup may be added to the collops. Mrs. T. P. B.

Editors' Table.

EGOTISM IN POETRY.

THERE is a disposition among young and inexperienced writers of verse to make their own experiences and feelings the subjects of their rhyme. As these are the topics of greatest interest to themselves, they are apt to suppose that their readers will be equally interested in them. It is a serious mistake. A shrewd writer long ago enunciated the truth which these youthful bards would do well to bear in mind, that "self is a subject on which all are fluent and none agreeable." Indeed, if they were talking, or writing plain prose, they would probably have a consciousness that it would not do to take up much of the time of their hearers or readers with descriptions of their state of mind, or complaints of their ill fortune, but they imagine that by setting forth the same matters in harmonious verse, they can make them interesting. If they were aware of the impatience or indifference with which these productions, that delight themselves so much, are perused by others, they would be not a little surprised and mortified.

The greatest poets have been the most forgetful of themselves. Homer, as is well known, gives not the slightest direct hint, in his poems, from which we can learn who and what he was. So utterly impersonal is he that some German critics, as is well known, have denied his individual existence altogether, and have maintained that he was at least half a dozen poets at once. Shakspeare avoids all reference to himself throughout his plays and other poems, except, perhaps, in a few of his sonnets; but it is now supposed that these sonnets were written for a friend, who, being in love, desired to have his feelings expressed by the poet in this manner. Milton alludes to himself only three or four times, and then with a grave dignity and resignation which, considering the greatness of his sufferings, make these passages rather a rebuke than an example for the writers of ordinary egotistical verse.

The kind of poetry to which we refer is generally of a melancholy and bemoaning cast; and one objection to it is the strong impression which the reader usually receives that it is all a delusion. He feels pretty sure that the demand upon his sympathies is a mere pretence, and he has a notion that if he could come upon the hapless poet or poetess who had just finished a little effusion, in which the loss of dear friends or the wreck of fortune is bewailed in mournful numbers, he would find the writer speculating on the probable success of the poem, in a very comfortable and self-satisfied frame of mind.

It is true that some poets of undoubted genius have written about themselves in strains which the world was glad to possess. But before doing so, they had attained an eminence which made their inner life and their experiences matters of interest to their readers. Any writer of poetry who has gained the celebrity of a Goldsmith, a Byron, or a Longfellow, may safely assume this hazardous privilege, which his natural good taste and acquired tact will then keep him from abusing.

Our advice to all young writers of verse would be to exclude the first personal pronoun from their compositions altogether. Let them forget themselves and their own trials and troubles entirely. They have the whole world besides, all history, all romance, and all the wide field of the imagination, in which to look for subjects. If they find in all this scope no topics to suit them, they may rest assured that the impulse which urges them to write is not the hunger of genius for expression, but the craving of vanity for applause.

OUR MOTHER TONGUE.

To teach the young to use their native language—or, as the Germans appropriately call it, their "mother speech"—correctly and elegantly, is a special and recognized point of woman's work. The capacity for giving this instruction can only be attained by study and by much practice. Many useful works have appeared, of late years, designed to aid the student in this branch of scholarship, and the manner in which they have been received shows the great interest that is felt in the subject of which they treat. We commence this month a series of "Hints on Language," prepared by a contributor who has given much attention to this subject, and who will dwell more particularly on those points which are likely to be of practical use and interest to writers and speakers. Some of these will doubtless be "moot points," concerning which there may be differences of opinion. Indeed, questions of language are often merely questions of taste, and about these, according to the well-known maxim, it is idle to dispute. We can only inquire in regard to such questions, what views have been maintained by those who are deemed the best authorities on this subject. For this and other information, the reader is referred to our correspondent's "Hints," in which questions of this character will be discussed, and the conclusions of the best writers respecting them set forth, as fully as can be done in the space to which the articles must of necessity be limited.

HINTS ON LANGUAGE.—NO. I.

WORDS UNDER BAN.

SOME words, like some people, appear to be specially unfortunate. They have, perhaps, no actual defect or demerit. They are, in every way, as proper and as useful as others that are received without objection. Yet they fall, somehow, under a cloud. Some stigma—perhaps a mere nickname—gets attached to them, which cannot be shaken off, and they are ostracized from the best circles, or admitted with hesitation and apology. A good example of words of this class is our old and much-debated friend, talented. Why should this unlucky word not be as well received, for instance, as moneyed? Both are examples of adjectives formed after the manner of participles, and yet formed not from verbs, but from nouns. If this be an objection, both are equally objectionable; and so, indeed, are many other words to which no exception has ever been taken, such as turreted, bigoted, lettered, and the like. Who ever thought of objecting to the adjective in Tennyson's beautiful line:—

"Oh, saviour of the silver-coasted isle!"

As to antiquity, if moneyed is used by Lord Bacon, talented is employed by Archbishop Abbot, who lived in the same age, and was one of the translators of our Bible—that "well of English undefiled." It seems, however, that talented then went out of use for a time—at least, in England—and, when it was revived, an absurd notion got afloat in that country that it was a newly coined "Americanism." This epithet was enough. The critics assailed it. Even such a large-minded writer as Coleridge left his "objective and subjective" abstractions to assail the word as "that vile vocable." Though, under this sort of ban, it still survives and holds its place, simply because it is needed for an idea which no other word exactly expresses. Able, intelligent, intellectual will not convey the meaning. Gifted comes nearer, but has a sanctimonious air, and is, besides, almost as much disparaged as talented.

Then there is the verb to progress. The noun is unexceptionable, but the verb, it seems, is naught. Its history is curiously like that of talented. It is an old English word, used by Shakespeare, though with the accent on the first syllable. In Doctor Johnson's time it was, as his dictionary affirms, "not in use." Later it was revived, with the accent on the last syllable, as in digress, with which, in origin and formation, it corresponds. Why, it may be asked, should digress be admitted into the best society, and progress shut out? Without undertaking to answer so grave a question, we shall simply maintain our right to "progress" as well as "digress" at our pleasure, leaving others to go their way unchallenged.

Then we come to lengthy—a dreadful word, we are told by some critics. "Why not say long, at once? And then," they add, "look at its absurd formation. First, from an adjective, long, you make a substantive, length, and then from this substantive you make another adjective. It is an abuse of the English language. If we are to have lengthy, why not also strengtheny, depthy, heighty, and breadthy?" But the defenders of the word are not put down. They reply with arguments which are, if we may venture to say so, both "lengthy" and "strengtheny." "We use the word," they say, "because it furnishes us with an expression for a shade of meaning different from that conveyed by long. And as to its formation, why is it not as correct as healthy, from health, which is itself derived from hale; or wealthy, from wealth, which comes from well; or droughty, from drought, which goes back to dry?" It is not for us to decide between such linguistic doctors. Fearing the imputation of lengthiness, we pass on to another of the unfortunates.

It is a little odd, considering its meaning, that the word reliable should be one of the most sharply questioned words in the language. Mr. Grant White discusses the word at much length, and condemns it utterly, as Dean Alford and others had done before him. To be properly formed, we are told, it should be rely-on-able, and there is no need of it, for we have trustworthy, which expresses the same meaning. But the word finds advocates. They adduce other terms similarly formed (as they consider), such as available, indispensable, and unaccountable. And as to its use, we may well ask, will the newspapers be satisfied with trustworthy as a substitute? It is true that we no longer hear of the "reliable gentleman," who, during the war, kept coming through the lines, bringing us such interesting news, which, after being corroborated by an "intelligent contraband," usually turned out to be a fine fabric of the imagination. But though gone in one shape, he reappears in another. Trustworthy, we all feel, is too heavy and precise an epithet for him. Reliable is exactly the word. However much we may admire the force of Mr. White's attack, we suspect that the "reliable gentleman," supported by a strong army of reporters and correspondents, will break through his lines, and come out victorious.

Why so simple and useful an adjective as spare should fall under the critical ban, it is not easy to imagine. In England, however, it has been denounced as an "Americanism," which seems to be, or rather to have been in times past, the favorite term of condemnation; while it has been defended in the same country as a "well-applied" term, and as "the proper correlative of dense." The mere controversy has been enough to induce some timorous writers to avoid the use of the word.

Two other new words, of Latin origin, donate and recuperate, are sharply criticized by Mr. White. Indeed, it is not easy to see why they should be allowed to displace the good and every way satisfactory English words, give and recover. Still, there are some speakers and writers, as well as readers and hearers, who are specially fond of large, mouth-filling expressions. If any one of these chooses to "donate" a liberal sum to any charitable purpose, the gift will, doubtless, be cordially welcomed, and the recipients will gladly pray that the generous and magniloquent donor may "recuperate" from all the ills which flesh is heir to. After all, recuperate, pompous and useless as it now seems, is no worse than desiderate, which is used by some good writers, when others would prefer desire.

The special characteristic of the English language is its irregularity, to which are due its abounding variety and richness. As the English people, and still more the Americans, have been wont to welcome all strangers who come to settle among them, whatever their origin or their oddities, so long as they prove themselves useful members of society, in like manner the English language has received accessions of all sorts, and from every quarter, under the same liberal system. No doubt, this freedom has been abused. Criminals and paupers make an undesirable accession to any population. That very useful body of word police, the critics of language, have done good service in expelling some utterly lawless and useless expressions. They have fair game in the whole rabble of slang terms, and in the ever-shifting rout of grammatical (or ungrammatical) corruptions. But as regards the harmless and sometimes useful words which we have cited, the case is somewhat different; and we suspect that most, if not all, of them will maintain their ground. Cautious writers, on this side of the Atlantic, may, for some time, avoid them; but in England, where the charge of "Americanism" is beginning to tell with less effect, all these words are more freely used. Even the least defensible of them, reliable, comes under our notice, as we write, in the recent translation of "Mommson's History of Rome," made by the Rev. W. P. Dickson, "Classical Examiner in the University of St. Andrews." We there read that "In the age of the Homeric poetry, there was an utter want of reliable information respecting Sicily and Italy." Elsewhere the same translator uses trustworthy. The truth is, that mere synonyms are often desirable, to vary the form of expression. The language cannot afford to lose any word, however uncouth, which expresses an idea, and which is not, like slang, repulsive in its character or association. N.

THE EARTHLY PARADISE.

AT last Mr. Morris has finished his great work, destined by the universal judgment to remain as one of the enduring literary achievements of the age. It is seldom, in this world of incompleteness and disappointment, that we see an undertaking involving both genius and labor carried so bravely to perfection. Mr. Morris never flags through his fifteen hundred pages. Our space forbids us to do more than make a short extract:—

DECEMBER.

Dead lonely night, and all streets quiet now,
Thin o'er the moon the hindmost cloud swims past
Of that great rack that brought us up the snow;
On earth strange shadows o'er the snow are cast;
Pale stars, bright moon, swift cloud make heaven so vast
That earth, left silent by the wind of night,
Seems shrunken 'neath the gray unmeasured height.
Ah! through the hush the looked-for midnight clang!
And then, e'en while its last stroke's solemn drone
In the cold air by unlit windows hangs,
Out break the bells above the year foredone,
Change, kindness lost, love left unloved alone;
Till their despairing sweetness makes thee deem Thou once were loved, if but amidst a dream.

ASLAUG MEETS HER LOVER.

When upon the beach she came,
A bright thing in the sun did flame
'Twixt sun and shipside, and the sea
Flamed, as one waded eagerly
Unto the smooth and sea-beat sand.
And for one moment did she stand
Breathless, with beating heart, and then
To right and left drew back the men;
She heard a voice she deemed well known,
Long waited through dull hours bygone,
And round her mighty arms were cast;
But when her trembling red lips passed
From out the heaven of that dear kiss,
And eyes met eyes, she saw in his Fresh pride, fresh hope, fresh love, and saw
The long sweet days still onward draw,
Themselves still going hand in hand
As now they went adown the strand.

With these two imaginative landscapes, in which Mr. Morris so excels, we take our leave of him, heartily congratulating him upon having added much to that small legacy of immortal verse which our age will hand down to posterity.

PHILADELPHIA has been called the City of Homes, in reference to the number of its dwellings compared with its population. But the name holds good in another sense. The charities for the poor, especially the refuges which she provides for the helpless, distinguish her among great cities. Several new enterprises of this sort have lately been undertaken; among them The Home for Little Wanderers, whose anniversary showed the success and usefulness of the good work. Another is now projected whose importance may be seen by the following communication. The good it may do is incalculable:—

A PLEA FOR THE WOMEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION OF PHILADELPHIA.

This association has been formed for the purpose of extending help, protection, and sympathy to the working girls of our great city; throwing around them, by means of Christian love and charity, influences that shall conduce to their temporal, moral, and religious welfare. Among other enterprises, it has been determined to establish boarding-houses, under the charge of competent matrons, where these girls may be provided with irreproachable homes at the mere cost of living.

Although not organized until the 12th of December, 1870, a house (1605 Filbert Street) has been purchased, and as soon as some necessary repairs and alterations are completed, will be ready for occupants. This, however, is but one branch of our work. We design opening a restaurant as soon as the means can be procured, in some central locality, where store girls and women engaged in other work that takes them from their homes, can get good substantial food at a merely nominal cost. Those who have never given this subject careful consideration have no idea of the great good such an establishment is calculated to do. It will reach the wants of a class who would rather starve than acknowledge that they had not, or could not spare the wherewithal to purchase a dinner. It will keep out of temptation many a fair young girl who to-day is obliged to resort to an ordinary restaurant for her meals. It will be under the immediate supervision of Christian gentlewomen, who, following the example of their Lord and Master, will ever strive to say the right word at the right time, and it shall be their duty to see that no sad looking stranger ever leaves their rooms uncounselled or uncomfortable.

We wish to secure a large membership, and as our platform is broad and liberal, embracing all Christian denominations, our desire and prayer to God is, that every Christian woman of Philadelphia be impelled to extend to us her aid and influence in this important enterprise.

NOTES AND NOTICES.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.—There seems some danger that this question may be forced on Congress before the members have really been informed of the feeling about the suffrage among women themselves. To aid in showing how little such a power is desired by the great majority of our sex, we insert the following petition. The editors of the LADY'S BOOK hope that those of their readers who disapprove of the proposed extension of the franchise will take up the matter in earnest. Let ladies copy the petition, and obtain signatures, each in her own neighborhood, sending it then to one of the persons named below; and at the next session of Congress we will be able to show that for one woman who desires there are fifty who disapprove.

Should the person receiving this approve of the object in view, his or her aid is respectfully requested to obtain signatures to the annexed petition, which may, after having been signed, be returned to either of the following named persons:—

Mrs. General W. T. Sherman, Mrs. John A. Dahlgreen, Mrs. Jacob D. Cox, Mrs. Joseph Henry, Mrs. Rev. Dr. Boynton, Mrs. Rev. Dr. Samson, Mrs. Rev. Dr. Butler, Mrs. Rev. Dr. Rankin, Mrs. B. B. French, Miss Jennie Carroll, Mrs. C. V. Morris, Mrs. Hugh McCulloch, all of Washington, D. C.; Mrs. Senator Sherman, Mansfield, Ohio; Mrs. Senator Scott, Huntington, Pa.; Mrs. Senator Corbett, Portland, Oregon; Mrs. Senator Edmunds, Burlington, Vt.; Mrs. Luke P. Poland, St. Johnsbury, Vt.; Mrs. Samuel J. Randall, Philadelphia, Pa.; Mrs. Catharine E. Beecher, 69 West Thirty-Eighth Street, New York City.

Please attach to this a paper for signatures:—

THE PETITION OF THE UNDERSIGNED,

To the Congress of the United States, Protesting against an Extension of Suffrage to Women.

We, the undersigned, do hereby appeal to your honorable body, and desire respectfully to enter our protest against an extension of suffrage to women; and in the firm belief that our petition represents the sober convictions of the majority of the women of the country.

Although we shrink from the notoriety of the public eye, yet we are too deeply and painfully impressed by the grave perils which threaten our peace and happiness in these proposed changes in our civil and political rights longer to remain silent.

Because Holy Scripture inculcates a different, and for us higher sphere, apart from public life.

Because, as women, we find a full measure of duties, cares, and responsibilities devolving upon us, and we are therefore unwilling to bear other and heavier burdens, and those unsuited to our physical organization.

Because we hold that an extension of suffrage would be adverse to the interests of the working-women of the country, with whom we heartily sympathize.

Because these changes must introduce a fruitful element of discord in the existing marriage relation, which would tend to the infinite detriment of children, and increase the already alarming prevalence of divorce throughout the land.

Because no general law, affecting the condition of all women, should be framed to meet exceptional discontent.

For these, and many more reasons, do we beg of your wisdom that no law extending suffrage to women may be passed, as the passage of such a law would be fraught with danger so grave to the general order of the country.

SAYINGS OF CHILDREN.—From "Great Mysteries." By John Neal:—

"Tit for tat. A pretty, four-year old midget went out to play on the sidewalk. When she returned, with wet and muddy feet, showing that she had been somewhere else, her mother began to look serious; whereupon the child, anticipating the worst, murmured, with her head in her mother's lap: 'Now, mamma, you be dood to me, and I'll be dood to you.'"
"A fine, manly little fellow of five years tumbled on the door-step and cut his upper lip, so that a surgeon had to sew it up. He sat in his mother's lap during the operation, pale and speechless, though large tears gathered in his eyes and seemed ready to fall. 'Oh, dear!' said she, 'I'm afraid it will leave a bad scar.' 'Never mind,' said Charlie, patting her on the cheek, 'never mind, mother, darling, my moustache will cover it.'"

A TRUE STATEMENT.—In no profession is woman's right to work so clear as in that of medicine; and the ladies who are by their success quietly establishing the fact that women are suited to the profession, and even to its higher branches, are doing more for the true advancement of women in the matter of the right to a livelihood than can any oratory.

THOMAS HUGHES said the Philadelphia Girls' Normal School was the finest institution of the kind in the country.

NEW JERSEY LEGISLATURE, 1871.—Trenton, Feb. 6. The Senate to-night passed the bill giving mothers equal authority with fathers in the custody of children.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.—Four hundred women of the Illinois Normal School have sent a remonstrance to Washington against woman suffrage.

AN EXPERIMENT IN IOWA.—The Board of Registers of Clarendon, Iowa, have decided that women are entitled to vote in that city, and the names of all ladies of proper age were placed on the rolls. Several gentlemen, not liking this movement, erased the names of their wives. Several ladies also erased their names. On the election to-day no women claimed the privilege, and the men had it all their own way.

A GOOD result from a foolish experiment:—
"The Wyoming papers say that the people of that Territory are about to 'abandon woman suffrage as both mischievous and impracticable.'"

We are glad to see that the intelligent men of Wyoming find themselves capable of performing their own duties.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—The following articles are accepted: "Starving"—"Mince Collops"—"Life's Retrospect"—"Prince Charlie and Prince John"—"Flowers of June"—"Only an Old Maid"—"What Can Women Do?"—"A Fancy of Childhood"—"Mr. Dawson's Holiday" and "The Books We Read."

The following are declined: "Night"—"To the Mississippi"—"To the Young Ellen Moore"—"Of the Past in All Its Beauty"—"Anniversary Humbugs"—"Wedding Presents" and "Return, Return, Once More I Ask."

NOTICE.—Manuscripts must in all cases be accompanied with the name and address of the authors, and stamps for their return, if not accepted. The utmost care will be taken and all possible expedition used with regard to them; but it must be understood that the editor is not responsible should a MS. be mislaid or lost.

SALT RHEUM.

THE word salt rheum conveys a vague and indefinite meaning to the mind of the practicing physician. It is a word not to be found in the pages of medical literature. Yet it is constantly made use of among all classes of people, and seldom understood in the sense that it should be.
